Rescuers entering the alley wrapped themselves in wet blankets as they attempted to reach victims whose clothes were on fire.

"We were choosing those who we thought were still alive to carry them out," said Hassan Moosawi, 26, one of the rescuers. "Their flesh was scalded by the fire."

Police and hospital officials said 22 of the dead were women and eight were children. At least 36 people were injured.

The attack in Sadr City, a poor, predominantly Shiite neighborhood of 2 million people, was a setback for U.S. efforts to pacify the capital, which has been ravaged by sectarian carnage and paramilitary killings since the February bombing of the Shiite shrine of the Golden Mosque in Samarra.

The alley blast took place as the holy month of Ramadan began for Sunnis and neared for Shiites.

U.S. and Iraqi officials had predicted an increase in violence during Ramadan, when Muslims fast during daylight hours. Since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, violence has flared each year during Ramadan.

A buildup of U.S. and Iraqi forces in August briefly slowed the pace of killings in Baghdad, which topped 1,800 in July, but the rate has been increasing. On Friday, a U.S. commander said that although 4,000 additional U.S. troops were patrolling the city's streets, only a fourth of the 4,000 expected Iraqi troops had shown up.

While the rescue of blast victims was still in progress Saturday, onlookers vented their wrath at the Iraqi government and the United States.

One man, who declined to identify himself, argued that the increased presence of the U.S. military in Baghdad had weakened Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi militia, which has provided security in Sadr City.

"Before, our youths used to search and protect the people gathering here, but the Americans started to detain them," the man said. "This is the result."

Sadr City is a major center of support for Sadr, who controls more than 30 seats in the Iraqi parliament. His militia has been linked to Shiite death squads and has clashed repeatedly with the U.S. military.

Another Sadr City resident, Hussein Radhi Khafaji, suggested that the neighborhood close itself off from the rest of Baghdad.

"We have the capability not to allow the Americans to enter our city! Neither the government nor the Americans will stay here," he said.

U.S. Army officials said Saturday that they had begun patrols in Sadr City, but out of political considerations had avoided a full-scale operation.

Observance of Ramadan follows a lunar calendar. Sunni Muslims began their fasting Saturday. Based on a different interpretation of when the new moon appears, Shiites will start Monday.

A shadowy group calling itself the Sahaba Soldiers said in an Internet posting that it was responsible for the bombing, and that the blast was a reprisal for attacks on Sunnis, including "forced displacements, burning of mosques, kidnappings and assassinations" by Sadr's militia.

The claim could not be verified. The group said it had used a car bomb, but the evidence at the scene did not support that claim.

DOJ_NMG_0068423

Although authorities had not determined the nature of the bomb, some witnesses said they believed that it was detonated by a woman who mixed with the crowd.

Sadiq Abbas, 36, said survivors told him that a woman wearing a veil put a jerrycan near the entrance and beckoned others to come closer. "Then the explosion happened," Abbas said.

The bomb went off next to a door in one of the walls. The victims had carried jerrycans to the door, where attendants from an adjacent gas station dispensed gasoline for home generators and kerosene, which was being stockpiled for the coming winter.

The fuel erupted into a fireball.

"A teenager was burning," said Khafaji, 32. "He climbed this wall to fall on the other side."

An abaya, the black robe worn by many Iraqi women, was snagged at the top of the wall. Adil Rauf Miftin, 27, said it belonged to his neighbor, Bahiya Sultan, 55, a mother of seven who died, possibly as she was trying to scale the wall. A crumpled bicycle nearby belonged to a 9-year-old boy who also died, he said.

Hundreds of ball bearings from the bomb lay scattered around the alley, where the victims were trapped between two walls a few feet apart.

A prominent Shiite leader said the attack highlighted the desperation of the attackers.

"Only women were there to receive the kerosene," said Hadi Amri, a parliament member and leader of the Badr Brigade, one of Iraq's largest Shiite paramilitary groups. "Attacking poor innocents who have no power is their strategy now."

In another attack in Sadr City, a booby-trapped motorbike exploded near a U.S. military convoy, killing a civilian and wounding six.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Army reported the deaths Saturday of three U.S. soldiers. One was killed by a roadside bomb in north Baghdad, and two were killed and three were injured by a roadside bomb in Hawija, in the northern province of Al Tamim. Their names were withheld.

The State Department also reported that an American contractor for the consulate in the southern city of Basra had been killed in a rocket attack Friday. It did not disclose his name.

Also in Basra, the Associated Press reported that a Danish soldier was killed and eight were wounded by a roadside bomb.

A grisly scene unfolded in Baiji, 120 miles north of Baghdad, when armed men in a car tossed a plastic bag containing nine severed heads into a marketplace. Identity cards in the bag named the victims as members of the Iraqi army.

In Tikrit, the predominantly Sunni Arab hometown of former President Saddam Hussein, Police Brig. Gen. Ismael Ijhian was assassinated by a group of men as he left the house of a friend.

In another development Saturday, Iraqi authorities announced the capture of a man they described as a terrorist leader whose group had claimed responsibility for several attacks in the north. U.S. officials had no comment on the report.

Maj. Gen. Qasim Almusawi, a spokesman for the Iraqi Defense Ministry, said a joint U.S. and Iraqi force had arrested Muntasar Hmoud Ilawi Aljiboori, head of Ansar al Sunna, and two subordinates in an area of orchards about 30 miles west of Baqubah. The same group said in an Internet message Saturday that it recently had ambushed 10 Indian and Pakistani pilgrims on the highway to Syria. It claimed they were agents for Shiite militias, and said the 10 had been killed.

The successor to slain Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi resurfaced Saturday in an Internet video.

In the video, three masked men are seen standing behind a kneeling man who is described as a Turkish hostage. Later in the video, a hand with a pistol appears and fires three shots into the man's head. The shooter is identified as Abu Ayyub Masri, named to lead the group after Zarqawi was killed in a U.S. airstrike in June.

doug.smith@latimes.com

U.S. Contractor Killed By Rocket In Iraq (AP)

AP, September 24, 2006

An American contractor working for the State Department was killed in a rocket attack in Basra, the U.S. Embassy said Saturday.

The contractor was killed in an attack on the city, 340 miles southeast of Baghdad on Friday, the embassy said in a statement.

"As a member of our embassy community, this American citizen worked toward assisting the people of Iraq build a stable, democratic, and prosperous country," said Daniel Speckhard, the U.S. Embassy's charge d'affaires. "On behalf of the U.S. Embassy and the entire American community in Iraq, I would like to extend our deepest sympathies to the family and friends of our colleague."

No further details were released.

DOJ_NMG_0068424

Terror Group Denies Leader's Capture (MST/AP)

By Maamoun Youssef

Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP, September 24, 2006

An Internet statement posted Sunday said that the leader of an al-Qaida-linked terror group had not been captured, contradicting an Iraqi government report.

Iraq's armed forces announced the arrest Friday of Muntasir Hamoud Ileiwi al-Jubouri, a senior leader of the Ansar al-Sunnah group, and two of his aides near Muqdadiyah, 55 miles northeast of Baghdad.

"At the time we deny this report," said the statement posted on a Web site used by Islamist militants and attributed to Ansar al-Sunnah. It charged that the announcement of the arrests "indicates clearly the weakness and bankruptcy of this government."

The statement whose authenticity could not be verified, said "our jihad continues as well as our operations."

Ansar al-Sunnah's statement contained no information demonstrating that al-Jubouri or his aides remain at large.

The Sunni militant group has claimed responsibility for numerous suicide attacks as well as the August 2004 execution of 12 Nepalese hostages, and a December 2004 bombing that killed 22 people at a U.S. military mess hall in the northern city of Mosul.

It's Moving Day, All Over Iraq (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

BAGHDAD

THE threats come in different ways: a telephone call at night, a bomb placed by a car, a bullet left on a shop counter.

For the family of one 23-year-old Sunni Arab, who insisted on being identified as Abu Ahmed rather than his full name, the threat came in a note delivered last December to the doorstep of the family's home in Shuala, a Shiite neighborhood in northern Baghdad controlled by the militia of the radical cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

Abu Ahmed said his mother picked it up and began crying. "Leave the house and go away; otherwise we will slaughter you," the note read, he recalled. It had his father's name on it. The family fled to Ghazaliya, a Sunni-dominated neighborhood in western Baghdad.

So goes de facto partitioning of Iraq, with extremist groups forcing people to segregate themselves by sect across the country and within Baghdad. They are moving from neighborhood to neighborhood or city to city, a tide of migration that is hardening the Sunni-Shiite divide. The movements began in large numbers after the February bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra and accelerated over the summer.

The Iraqi Ministry of Migration and Displacement estimated that as of Sept. 4, about 39,000 families had relocated, the vast majority since February. That number was 44 percent higher than in late July and 10 times the total in mid-March. Many go to places where they can live with relatives. A few live in small camps until they can find housing.

The areas that receive the most migrants are either overwhelmingly Sunni or Shiite and thus less prone to sectarian violence.

Najaf and Karbala, two Shiite holy cities in the south, are popular destinations for Shiite families, particularly ones from Baghdad, which is plagued by insurgents, militiamen and criminal gangs. Many Sunni-Arab families flee to Falluja, a former Sunni insurgent stronghold 35 miles west of the capital.

That was where Turki Abdullah, 56, brought his family recently after execution-style killings began to rise in their western Baghdad neighborhood of Jihad. In one incident there last July, Shiite gunmen killed up to 50 people during the day after dragging them from their cars and homes and checking their ID cards to see whether they had Sunni or Shiite names.

Mr. Abdullah said he knew at least a dozen Sunni-Arab friends who had moved their families from Baghdad.

Friends who have stayed in the capital "tell us that the militias and interior ministry commandos carry out patrols at night and call through loudspeakers for the Sunnis to leave," Mr. Abdullah said in a low voice, as he stood in the hallway of a relative's home in Falluja. "They threaten the Sunnis by saying the families will regret staying in the neighborhood."

In recent weeks, tribal sheiks have been urging families not to relocate, and some Iraqis who had fled their homes are now returning.

But, "there is a huge amount of distrust," Mr. Abdullah said. "This is the start, and the end will be bigger than this."

Al-Zarqawi Successor's Video Shown Again (AP)

By Maggie Michael

AP, September 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068425

The man purported to be the new leader of Al-Qaida in Iraq appeared in previously released video showing him execute a Turkish hostage, the terror group says in a statement posted on the Internet along with a repeat of the recording.

If described accurately, the images would be the first of Abu Ayyub al-Masri to be released since the group announced that he had succeeded Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by a U.S. air strike in Iraq on June 7.

The posting appeared Friday night on a Web site frequently used by Islamic militants just as Sunni Arabs in Iraq began Ramadan, the Islamic holy month. U.S. officials have warned that attacks could intensify during Ramadan, and the video could be a signal from al-Masri to his followers.

The video, which the statement described only as "old," first appeared on Aug. 2, 2004.

In the video, three masked men stand behind a hostage seated on the ground wearing a tan shirt. The militant in the middle, identified in the latest Web posting as al-Masri, reads a statement in Arabic, then the hostage, Murad Yucer from Ankara, reads a statement in Turkish.

After Yucer finishes, the militant in the middle shoots the now-blindfolded hostage three times in the head.

The scarves make it impossible to identify the three militants. However, the statement says the execution was performed by Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, al-Masri's militant name.

Al-Masri, a Sunni Muslim, has been relatively silent since taking over control of al-Qaida in Iraq — a sharp contrast with al-Zarqawi, who frequently issued audiotapes and even a videotape that showed his face a few weeks before he was killed.

A statement appeared in al-Masri's name shortly after al-Zarqawi's death and earlier this month an audio recording attributed to him was posted on the Internet.

Yucer was an employee of a Turkish company that subcontracted for a Jordanian company providing services to U.S. military bases.

Several Turks have been kidnapped and killed in Iraq and at least seven Turkish companies have announced their withdrawal from Iraq to secure the release of kidnapped staff.

Video Purportedly Shows Americans Burned (AP)

By Omar Sinan

AP, September 24, 2006

An al-Qaida-linked group posted a Web video Saturday purporting to show the bodies of two American soldiers being dragged behind a truck, then set on fire in apparent retaliation for the alleged rape-slaying of a young Iraqi woman by U.S. troops from the same unit.

The Mujahedeen Shura Council — an umbrella organization of insurgent groups, including al-Qaida in Iraq — posted a previous video in June showing the soldiers' mutilated bodies, and claiming it killed them. It was not clear whether Saturday's video was a continuation of that footage, or why it was released.

The new footage came hours after the posting of another al-Qaida video, an apparent re-release of a tape showing the execution of a Turkish hostage — by the man purported to be the new leader of Al-Qaida in Iraq.

The images would be the first of Abu Ayyub al-Masri to be released since the group announced that he had succeeded Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who was killed by a U.S. airstrike in Iraq on June 7.

Both videos appeared just as Sunni Arabs in Iraq began Ramadan, the Islamic holy month. U.S. officials have warned that attacks could intensify during Ramadan.

It was impossible to identify the bodies in the second video, but it was believed to show Pfc. Kristian Menchaca, 23, and Pfc. Thomas Tucker, 25, who went missing after being attacked by insurgents on June 16 at a checkpoint south of Baghdad. Their remains were found three days later, and the U.S. military said they had been mutilated.

The video showed masked men dragging the corpses and later setting them on fire. Below the graphic footage is a subtitle: "The two soldiers belong to the same brigade of the soldier who raped our sister in Mahmoudiya."

The U.S military has charged four soldiers of the 101st Airborne Division — Spc. James P. Barker, Sgt. Paul E. Cortez, Pfc. Jesse V. Spielman and Pfc. Bryan L. Howard — in the March 12 alleged rape and murder of 14-year-old Abeer Qassim al-Janabi in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad. Sgt. Anthony W. Yribe is accused of failing to report the attack but is not alleged to have been a direct participant.

A fifth suspect, Pfc. Steven D. Green, was discharged from the army because of a "personality disorder" before the allegations became known. He has pleaded not guilty to rape and murder charges and is being held in a civilian court in the United States.

Mahmoudiya is an extremely violent region in Iraq in an area known as the "triangle of death" for the numerous attacks by insurgents.

The two slain soldiers also were from the 101st Airborne Division.

DOJ_NMG_0068426

The video of the Turkish hostage first appeared on Aug. 2, 2004. It shows what has since then become an iconic scene of violence in Iraq — three masked men standing behind a hostage seated on the ground.

The militant in the middle, identified in the latest Web posting as al-Masri, reads a statement in Arabic, and then the hostage, Murad Yucer from Ankara, reads a statement in Turkish. After Yucer finishes, al-Masri shoots him three times in the head.

The scarves make it impossible to identify the three militants. However, a statement posted alongside the video says the execution was performed by Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, al-Masri's militant name.

Al-Masri, a Sunni Muslim, has been relatively silent since taking over control of al-Qaida in Iraq — a sharp contrast with al-Zarqawi, who frequently issued audiotapes and even a videotape that showed his face a few weeks before he was killed.

_____

Associated Press Writer Maggie Michael contributed to this story from Cairo.

The Army Vs. Spec. Richmond (WP)

By Anne Hull

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Edward Richmond Jr. says he was doing his duty when he shot a civilian in Iraq, but the Army convicted him of manslaughter. His father's mission is to clear his name.

GONZALES, La. E ddie Richmond's son got back from the war in June. He wanted nothing in the way of a homecoming, no yellow ribbons tied around trees, none of the piles of boiled crawfish that sent him off.

While other sons came home from Iraq with duffel bags that spilled sand from the desert, 22-year-old Edward Richmond Jr. carried release papers from an Army jail.

Edward had been among the first soldiers to be sent to prison for killing a civilian in the Iraq war, and among the first to walk out of prison. What waited for him was a parole officer in heat-struck Louisiana.

Ascension Parish was the same -- green and mossy lowlands afloat with Whataburgers, Starcuts, daiquiri drive-throughs and gas stations that sell hot shrimp by the pound -- but Edward was different.

He didn't like anyone standing too close. He slept on the floor instead of the bed. When he went through a box the Army had sent home, he found his uniform, infantry badges and ribbons. The vestments of a soldier's life. Edward put all of it in the trash.

His release coincided with a wave of investigations into U.S. soldiers killing civilians in Iraq. After an incident at Haditha, more than a dozen Marines are being questioned in the deaths of as many as two dozen civilians. Some blamed the fog of war or the stress of combat. Others said they only did what they were trained to do.

"War is not a pretty thing," Edward's father often said. "Things happen in a war zone."

The Army had trained his son to kill. Then Edward went to Iraq, and the Army decided he had killed someone the wrong way.

For two years now, his father has asked the Army why his son was prosecuted.

Even after Edward's release from prison, the 52-year-old Richmond's war rages on. He owns an air conditioning and heating business, and as he changed out compressors in the mosquito-rife back yards around Baton Rouge, sweating and heaving, Iraq was with him. He cited page numbers and footnotes from his son's case, like a record needle dropping down mid-song: "In Captain Morgan's statement on the 28th . . . "

Edward was a casualty of something, and so was his father.

In Gonzales, a large American flag hangs outside the Richmond house on two shaded acres. If the family feels any shame or anger, they keep it to themselves.

Eddie Richmond strolled into a coffee shop one afternoon and proudly told the owner, "Edward's home, he's healthy as a mule, he's just getting settled."

But many in Gonzales know about the father's crusade against the Army. It is an awkward fight for someone who drives a truck with a decal that says, "Home of the Free, Because of the Brave." Eddie gets his news from Fox and his accent from the rural hills of north Louisiana. His own father was a decorated Marine disabled in the Korean War. He served three years in the Air Force.

What fueled his frustration was a cache of confidential Army documents he had gotten his hands on that described how another soldier in Edward's brigade with the 1st Battalion, 27th Infantry Regiment, had shot and killed unarmed civilians. But Edward was the one who went to prison.

There seemed little left to fight for. Edward had served his time, been dishonorably discharged, lost his right to vote or carry a firearm, and couldn't leave the state without permission from his parole officer.

DOJ_NMG_0068427

The general who commanded the 1st Infantry Division in Iraq and convened Edward's court-martial, retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste, said he has faith in the military justice system. "If I were Dad, I would be focused on Donald Rumsfeld and his leadership, which took our great military to war without a strategy, with insufficient troops on the ground, which allowed chaos to rein in early 2004," Batiste said.

So Iraq was a mess and Edward was folded into the mess. This was unacceptable to Eddie Richmond.

Father and son shared the same name, but it was the elder Richmond who went by "Eddie" and his son the more formal "Edward." The son was always the guarded one in life, and he came home from prison burning with mistrust. At Fort Sill, Edward spent much of his time in a segregated cell for discipline violations. "You gotta understand, he didn't believe he belonged there," said Charles W. Gittins, a civilian lawyer handling his appeal.

It is impossible to know whether Edward wanted his name cleared as much as his father. He refused to be interviewed for this story.

His second week back, Edward got a job at a foundry outside Gonzales. He woke at 4 each morning and spent the next 10 hours near a furnace so hot that his boots smoked. One day his boss called him "jarhead." People knew his story.

While Louisiana sweltered and beer signs blinked in the windows of the bars where the Blind River Outlaws played "brain-busting, spine-tingling Southern metal," all Edward did was work.

His schoolteachers had always imagined that the exceptionally bright boy would be a mathematician or an engineer. His parents liked to say he joined the Army after 9/11, but Edward was less a twin towers avenger than an 18-year-old who needed a fresh start.

As a boy, he preferred playing computer games to hunting squirrels with his dad. He took medication for attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. He competed on the math team and was described as a "genius" by two former teachers.

But Edward refused to follow instructions if he thought they were pointless. His father made many trips to meet with administrators at East Ascension High School, including assistant principal Gwynne Pecue, who found him overprotective but struggling to understand his son. At the start of 11th grade, Edward announced that high school had nothing more to teach him, and he dropped out.

He was involved in an altercation with some local boys the next year, and he was charged with resisting arrest and disturbing the peace. His next run-in was more serious. A few months shy of his 18th birthday, Edward was arrested with crack cocaine and marijuana in an undercover drug sting. After deputies swooped in, he punched an officer in the chest and tried to run. He was charged with possession of cocaine with intent to distribute, possession of marijuana, battery of a police officer and resisting arrest.

Edward did a 30-day stint in rehab, passed his GED and enrolled at Louisiana State University, but he still faced felony drug charges. The military was his answer.

"There was the understanding that if you don't do this, the DA will prosecute you," said his attorney, Carl E. Babin of Baton Rouge. A soldier was born. The prosecutor did not seek a conviction.

A recruiter who worked in the Gonzales office at the time said Edward scored high on his tests and said he wanted to serve his country. "He had some problems, but it wasn't anything that we couldn't put him in the Army for," said the recruiter, who was not supposed to discuss Edward and asked that his name not be used.

From basic training, Edward shipped to Schofield Barracks in Hawaii, home of the 1st Batallion/27th Infantry Regiment of the 25th Infantry Division. He broke his jaw in a bar fight and joined the headquarters company mortar platoon. In "Lightning Thrust Warrior" training exercises, Edward was chosen as best gunner and "hero of the battle."

His father counseled him about challenging his superiors. "Regardless of whether they are right or not, they are wearing stripes," he said.

"Daddy," Edward answered, "dumb people are hard to deal with."

For a kid from the middle-class suburbs, he could trash-talk like a thug, "but when he put on those glasses and buried his nose in a book, his whole attitude changed," said Sgt. Shaun Mittler, Edward's squad leader in Hawaii.

Sometimes he came off as a know-it-all. By the time his mortar platoon got its orders for Iraq, "everybody turned on him," said his buddy, Pfc. Frederick Sidney. "He would speak out. Everybody else was trying to suck up."

Spec. Richmond went home to Gonzales before deploying. Yellow ribbons were tied around the oaks in his yard. A photograph shows Edward at a picnic table giving his little sister a playful headlock. In another shot he is shirtless and handsome, with deep-set eyes and vacation stubble, staring steadily into the camera.

"I'm ready," he told his mother.'Frightening and Chaotic'

Iraq was cold and rainy when the mortar platoon got there in February of 2004. The mud was frozen around Forward Operating Base McHenry, a primitive outpost south of Kirkuk. To fend off sniper attacks, a 10-foot mound of dirt, topped with triple-stand razor wire, surrounded the base. Beyond the wire were outlying roads littered with bombs, especially on the way to Hawija.

DOJ_NMG_0068428

"We didn't know anything about the people or their land," said Mittler, the sergeant. "We all had our finger on the trigger. It was frightening and chaotic."

Late one night, according to Army court documents, Edward's squad was briefed on a mission. Word came that high-level insurgents were hiding in the village of Taal Al Jal, possibly with weapons. The plan was for Alpha Company to perform the raid while Edward and the mortar guys set up a security checkpoint outside the mud wall of the village. Sgt. Jeffrey Waruch relayed their orders: Shoot any males fleeing the village, but check with him if possible before firing.

The raid started at daybreak. Edward could hear screaming in Arabic and English, and shotguns blowing the locks from doors. After the sun was up, cow and sheep herders from the village made their way into the fields with their animals.

A call came over the radio to detain all males leaving the village. Edward saw a cow herder in a field about 200 yards away. Waruch would later testify that Edward asked if he could shoot the man; Edward said he asked if he was supposed to shoot the man.

Waruch said no and set out for the cow herder, telling Edward to come along.

The man wore sweat pants, a baggy top and a head scarf. As the two soldiers approached with rifles and plastic flex-cuffs, the Iraqi became angry and began pointing back to the village.

Waruch pantomimed for the man to put his hands in the air. As the soldiers came within three yards of the Iraqi, Waruch told Edward to stand guard with his rifle while he handcuffed the man. Waruch did a quick upper-body search. As he tried to pull the man's wrists down to handcuff him, he resisted, and Waruch ordered Edward to raise his weapon to "high ready."

Edward would later say that Waruch told him to "shoot him if he moves," a statement Waruch would deny making.

Edward was at close range, but he flipped his rifle scope up, training its red dot on the cow herder's head.

The man stopped resisting as Waruch cuffed him, and the sergeant turned to lead him back to the road. As they walked on the uneven field, the man lost his balance and stumbled into Waruch.

A single shot from Edward's M4 rang out. The Iraqi dropped. Waruch squatted down, covering his ears.

Edward was pale and holding his rifle with one hand. He said the Iraqi had jumped at the sergeant.

Brain matter was seeping from the man's eyes. His cows were wandering away in the field.

Another soldier came up. Seeing the dead man's bound hands, he said to Edward with profane prescience, "You are f - - - - - ."

Edward had been in Iraq less than three weeks.A Soldier's Trial

Eddie Richmond bought a $1,700 ticket from New Orleans to Kuwait, then caught military transports the rest of the way in. A hot, sandy wind swirled through the Black Hawk helicopter that carried him to the 1st First Infantry Division's headquarters in Tikrit. Edward's battalion, normally with the 25th Infantry Division, fell under the command of the 1st Infantry Division in Iraq.

As the months had passed, Eddie felt sure that the Army would drop its case against Edward. "I know my son, and he would not just shoot someone," he said. "How many of our kids over there hesitate and die?"

But the Army charged Edward with unpremeditated murder and scheduled his general court-martial in Tikrit in August. He faced life in prison.

The trial was held in one of Saddam Hussein's former palaces near the Tigris River. At night, father and son slept in a room with some special operations soldiers. Eddie found it surreal: The same Army that was his gracious host was prosecuting his son.

He sat behind Edward in the makeshift courtroom. When the prosecution showed photos of the dead cow herder on a projection screen, Eddie felt a knot in his stomach. The man's name was Muhamad Husain Kadir. Part of his head was missing.

The key witness against Edward was Waruch. The sergeant testified that after he handcuffed Kadir, he patted him on the shoulder and said to Edward, "He's good, let's go." Waruch said he even saw Edward lower his rifle. Then came the blast.

Edward took the stand, wearing his desert camouflage and glasses. His accent dripped like the river parish he came from.

Edward testified that Waruch ordered him to shoot Kadir if he moved, so he raised his rifle and aimed at the man's head. Looking through his scope, he was unable to see Waruch put the handcuffs on. When he saw what looked like Kadir lunging at Waruch, he believed that his sergeant's life was in danger.

The defense tried to keep out a statement Edward gave a month after the incident, admitting that he was pumped on adrenaline and "had to know" that Kadir was cuffed "before I shot him but it just did not register in my mind at that time." Edward signed the statement after an agent with the Army Criminal Investigation Command (CID) told him he flunked a polygraph; he really hadn't.

Prosecutors goaded him. Hadn't it been obvious that a herder walking in a field with cows was not fleeing the village?

DOJ_NMG_0068429

"You don't look at everybody as Saddam Hussein himself, sir, but until it is clarified otherwise, you have to be suspicious," Edward answered. "I mean, people are dying every day, so you have be suspicious of everyone, sir."

"Answer the question," the prosecutor said. "Did you or did you not assume that Mr. Kadir had escaped from the village?"

"I knew he had come from the village, sir," Edward said. "I didn't know. I hadn't formed an opinion based off that."

Two of Edward's fellow soldiers testified that he often talked about wanting to kill an Iraqi. But under cross-examination, they said most soldiers did. Edward's sergeant said he was one of the better soldiers in his platoon.

Waruch's credibility was also on trial. Staff Sgt. Marcus Warner testified that Waruch was a "compulsive liar." His nickname was "Shady Jay."

Eddie Richmond watched his son, admiring his confidence. Edward never second-guessed himself. "Daddy, I've done my job, and I did what I thought was right," he said. He believed he would be acquitted.

He was only partly right. The jury found him not guilty of unpremeditated murder but guilty of voluntary manslaughter. The prosecution was recommending eight years in prison and a dishonorable discharge.

Edward had one chance to address the court before sentencing. Instead of asking for mercy, he expressed a vague regret.

"If I had known everything then that I know now, it wouldn't have happened, and I am sorry that it had to come to this," he said.

The jury gave him three years, a demotion in rank and a dishonorable discharge. He was shipped to the Fort Sill Regional Correctional Facility, an Army prison in the hills of Oklahoma, where he was diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder.Sadness Turns To Anger

His father went home to Gonzales.

"You could see the mourning," said his friend Marvin "Bud" Ragland, a retired rice farmer. "His son -- his oldest child -- went to war for his country and was branded by that country as a murderer."

But Eddie received something in the mail that would shift him to outrage. Inside an envelope with no return address were confidential Army documents. One page was stamped "Serious Incident Report." It was part of an Army investigative file, known as a 15-6. The subject was Sgt. Jeffrey Waruch.

Eddie sat in his kitchen and began to read. Waruch had shot three female civilians, one of whom died. Eddie vaguely remembered the sergeant being asked about it at Edward's trial, but the judge had limited the questions. Edward never mentioned it to him. The documents Eddie held in his hand -- sworn statements by Waruch and several other soldiers -- laid out what happened in detail.

Ten days before Edward shot the cow herder, the mortar platoon was riding in a convoy to Al-Abassi when a roadside bomb exploded. Soldiers began firing from the sides of their vehicles. No one was seriously hurt by the bomb, but orders went out to stop any Iraqis fleeing the area.

Waruch began running across farmland after a group of several Iraqis in the distance. After crossing a muddy stream in pursuit, he fired warning shots in the air and screamed for them to stop.

According to his written statement, Waruch said he was 200 yards away when one of the Iraqis knelt down with what looked like a tube-like object, possibly a rocket-propelled grenade. Waruch fired about five times, knocking down two bodies. This subdued the group, but as he moved closer, two other Iraqis suddenly started to run toward him, with one reaching into her clothes. He fired five more rounds.

Arriving at the group in the field, he saw that a girl was shot in the head and her pulse was gone. Another female was hit in the thigh and going into shock. Another was shot in the knee.

Waruch had fired on a mother and her two daughters, killing a 14-year-old. The survivors would later tell a reporter that they had been weeding a bean field and had started to run as the Americans ran toward them.

Waruch was initially cleared of any wrongdoing, but a second review found that he had violated the rules of engagement. The girl had been trying to surrender when she was shot. No weapons were found.

As a result of the shootings, the battalion commander ordered that the soldiers be retrained: no spraying of bullets, aimed shots only, and only when under hostile intent.

Eddie felt his eyes burning with tears. Whoever sent him the file wanted him to see that the prosecution's key witness against his son was under investigation for his own civilian casualties. As he studied the documents, he saw that one soldier had escaped punishment and that another was needed to pay for the platoon's mistakes.

Eddie wrote to members of Congress and the Army CID. When a reporter from the Dayton Daily News in Ohio called, researching a story on civilian deaths in Iraq, Eddie shared his documents and pushed the Army for more. Eddie wanted the same spotlight that burned on his son to burn on Waruch.

DOJ_NMG_0068430

In May 2005, more than a year after the incident, the CID opened an investigation into the shooting of the three female civilians. Waruch left the Army early this year. The investigation remains open. Attempts to reach Waruch for comment for this story were unsuccessful.

Edward turned 22 in prison. He subscribed to the Wall Street Journal, gorged on science fiction novels and built muscle. He refused to bend to the will of Fort Sill, spending much of his time in a segregation cell for discipline violations.

"It's a mental war," he wrote his parents. "I'll be fine."

Eddie contacted Defend the Defenders, an organization that raises funds for the legal defense of soldiers and Marines accused of crimes in combat. It was founded by Merry Pantano, whose son, Marine 2nd Lt. Ilario Pantano, was charged with murdering two Iraqis but was acquitted last year by the Marine Corps. Pantano agreed to fund Edward's appeal.

Eddie slapped his truck with "Defend the Defenders" stickers and wore the group's T-shirt that said, "Who's Got Their Backs?" The war in Iraq roiled on, but for Eddie it was frozen on two days, 10 days apart, in February 2004.

Then came a break. In April, the Army's clemency board granted Edward parole.

When he was released in June, he had served nearly two years of a three-year sentence. He called from the airport in Lawton, Okla., and told his parents, "I'm a free man." They picked him up in Baton Rouge. He was pale but rock-hard from exercise, and still had a grunt's haircut.

He soon received a congratulatory call from Ilario Pantano, the Marine acquitted of murder. In a sense they both belonged to the same fraternity of the misunderstood.

Edward told his father he didn't want anyone feeling sorry for him. He wanted to start over. But his father could not let go so easily. After Edward put his Army uniform and ribbons in the trash, Eddie retrieved them and took them to the charity bins behind the grocery store in town.

In Iraq, the Army has tried to make up for the tragedies.

The family of Muhamad Husain Kadir was paid $1,000 for his death.

The Army paid more than $4,000 to the family of the girl killed by Waruch, among them her wounded sister and mother, whose leg was amputated. The 1st Battalion commander wrote a sympathy letter to the family. "I ask for your continued support as we attempt to provide a safe and secure environment," wrote Lt. Col. C. Scott Leith. He closed by quoting the Koran: "We belong to Allah and to him we shall return."

The former 1st Infantry Division commander in Iraq, Batiste, is now the president of a steel company.

Edward is earning $10 an hour at the foundry.

The chapter was closing, but not for Eddie Richmond.

"I just want the truth to come out," he said. As summer turns to fall, he wears his Defend the Defenders T-shirt, waiting for word on his son's appeal.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Jane, We Hardly Knew Ye Died (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

LT. EMILY J. T. PEREZ, 23, a West Point graduate who outran many men, directed a gospel choir and read the Bible every day, was at the head of a weekly convoy as it rolled down roads pocked with bombs and bullets near Najaf. As platoon leader, she insisted on leading her troops from the front.

Two weeks ago, one of those bombs tripped her up, detonating near her Humvee in Kifl, south of Baghdad. She died Sept. 12, the 64th woman from the United States military to be killed in Iraq or Afghanistan. Eight died in Vietnam.

Despite longstanding predictions that America would shudder to see its women coming home in coffins, Lieutenant Perez's death, and those of the other women, the majority of whom died from hostile fire (the 65th died in a Baghdad car bombing a day later), have stirred no less — and no more — reaction at home than the nearly 2,900 male dead. The same can be said of the hundreds of wounded women.

There is no shortage of guesses as to why: Americans are no longer especially shocked by the idea of a woman's violent death. Most don't know how many women have fallen, or under what circumstances. Photographs of body bags and coffins are rarely seen. And nobody wants to kick up a fuss and risk insulting grieving families.

"The public doesn't seem concerned they are dying," said Charles Moskos, a military sociologist at Northwestern University who has closely studied national service. "They would rather have someone's else daughter die than their son."

What's more, no one in the strained military is eager to engage in a debate about women and the risks they are taking in Iraq because, quite simply, the women are sorely needed in this modern-day insurgent conflict. As has happened many times in war, circumstances have outpaced arguments. They are sure to be taken up again at some point, only this time, the military will have real-life data on the performance of women in the field to supplant the hypotheticals.

DOJ_NMG_0068431

Like most soldiers on the job, Lieutenant Perez, who will be buried at West Point on Tuesday, was focused on her mission, not on her groundbreaking role in a war that seems to have dispelled a litany of notions about women warriors.

For the first time, women by the thousands are on the ground and engaging the enemy in a war that has no front line, and little in the way of safe havens. In this 360-degree war, they are in the thick of it, hauling heavy equipment and expected to shoot and defend themselves and others from an enemy that is all around them. They are driving huge rigs down treacherous roads, frisking Iraqi women at dangerous checkpoints, handling gun turrets personnel carriers and providing cover for other soldiers.

It is not so much the job titles that have changed — the policy shift that allowed women to serve in combat support units close to the front lines occurred in 1994. Rather it is the job conditions.

"We are asking far more of our female soldiers than ever before in history," said Elaine Donnelly, director of the Center for Military Readiness, a conservative think tank.

But a line in the Iraqi sand exists. Under the 1994 Pentagon policy, women were still barred from serving in ground combat forces — infantry, armor, field artillery — but are allowed to serve as fighter pilots and on warships. In Iraq, women were not involved in the initial invasion; they did not clear insurgents from Falluja; they don't drive tanks or, in most cases, kick down doors in house searches.

They are also barred, technically, from "co-located units" that support combat troops. A woman can serve as a medic, for example, but not as a medic in a unit that "co-locates and remains" or accompanies a unit on the front line, like an infantry unit.

In reality, though, this so-called co-location is taking place, analysts say, although it is unclear how widespread it is. The Pentagon has stretched the language of the policy, mostly because there are not enough troops, men or women. It has done so because the language is fuzzy. An effort by some House Republican leaders last year to challenge the practice was beaten back by the Pentagon, which argued that it could not sustain the mission without women in these jobs.

"It says you can have female medics, but they can't see combat," said Capt. Megan O'Connor, who served in Iraq for a year and a half in the New Jersey Army National Guard as a medical operations and plans officer. "It's all combat in Ramadi. It's so gray. They put the rules down on paper. It looks good. It reads good. But for a commander to implement, it's impossible."

"The women were itching for it," she added, and accumulating commendations and medals for bravery along the way.

Ms. Donnelly said the Pentagon was openly flouting current policy and sending women out directly with combat troops, with no debate, no hearings in Congress and, so far, no consequences. She has no qualms about women, who make up 10 percent of the troops in Iraq and Afghanistan, doing the jobs they are assigned in dangerous circumstances. That is standard. But to send them out with combat troops is illegal, she said.

"I have enormous respect for these women," said Ms. Donnelly, who opposes allowing women into ground combat forces. "My criticism is not of the women in the military. They are fulfilling their responsibility to the greatest degree, and that, too, is unprecedented. The policymakers should not be ordering them into areas that are not gender integrated."

But the fact that the Army is successfully using women in this way is likely to lead policymakers to revisit the rule, some analysts say. "It's that policy that when this war is over is going to have to change, even if we have to keep women out of the infantry per se," said Lory Manning, a retired Navy captain who is the director for the women-in-the-military project at the Women's Research and Education Institute, a nonprofit public policy group. "The next door to open is ground combat. That's the last frontier. A lot of the social conservatives have powerful feelings about training mothers to kill."

Conventional wisdom has long dictated that women were not suited to the battlefield — too frail, emotionally and physically, to survive combat pressure. Men, it was said, would crumble at the sight of a bloodied female soldier, or put themselves at risk to protect her. The public would not stomach women coming back in body bags or suffering life-changing wounds. And mixing men and women — with all the sexual and emotional pitfalls — would strain the unit dynamic, which can lead to deadly mistakes.

Those sorts of arguments were revived last week when the former Navy secretary James Webb, running for Senate in Virginia, was reminded of his assertions 30 years ago that women could not, and should not, fight, assertions he has distanced himself from.

None of this, so far, has come to pass. "They are pulling their own weight and performing as well as men," Ms. Manning said. "And the American public is not any more upset about women coming home in body bags than men."

Mady Wechsler Segal, a professor of sociology at the University of Maryland and the associate director for the Center for Research on Military Organization, said succinctly, "If they weren't doing a good job, we would be hearing about it."

Certainly, women in Iraq and Afghanistan face different challenges, both at war and at home. Incidents of sexual harassment on military bases are common enough, and fending that off without offending peers and superiors is tricky. Sexual assault, while less common, only intensifies combat stress, leading to greater vulnerability. It also leads to new complications. What if your attacker is also the person you must defend, or must defend you?

DOJ_NMG_0068432

A whole crop of veterans are suffering from post-traumatic stress and lost limbs, circumstances that sometimes prove more difficult for women who often fill the role of nurturers to their families.

And there are practical considerations. Women on smaller bases in Iraq often share sleeping quarters with men. Equipment in women's sizes can sometimes be harder to come by. Some women use newer forms of birth control to make their periods less frequent. Even urinating can become a problem. The military has disbursed portable contraptions the women affectionately call a weenus, for use on long truck drives.

Women also face resistance among some male commanders, who are not keen to put women at risk, some women who have served in Iraq say. But many commanders, they added, treated them no differently.

Capt. Tammy Spicer, who commanded a transportation company for the Missouri National Guard, said women were often being watched to see if they are up to the job. Driving trucks is dangerous work in Iraq, and her company drove a million and a half miles with no enemy-related casualties.

If anything was taxing, she said, it was in 2003 in Kuwait, when she and four other women shared a tent with 45 men. The women shared showers with men, on rotation, and always got the worst hours, she said. "Their bickering, their cursing, their body noises," she said, laughing. "They would leave their food out and we would have rats. There was no relief from men."

NATO Kills 23 Insurgents In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, September 24, 2006

NATO aircraft have killed 23 suspected insurgents in southern Afghanistan, the military alliance said Sunday.

A helicopter attacked 20 insurgents who shot at a NATO patrol in Helmand province on Friday, killing 15 of the suspected insurgents, the alliance said.

An attack helicopter fired on another group of insurgents who shot at a support helicopter in the same province on Thursday, killing eight of the militants, the statement said. There were no NATO casualties in the attacks.

In recent months southern Afghanistan has seen some of the fiercest fighting since the U.S.-led invasion toppled the Taliban regime in 2001.

Rockets Rain After Taliban Deal (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek, Daily News Washington Bureau

New York Daily News, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON - Since Pakistan signed a pact meant to defang the Taliban on its side of the border with Afghanistan, U.S. forces have been hit with "highly unusual" attacks there, the Daily News has learned.

Although stressing it's too early to gauge whether the Pakistani government's Sept. 5 deal with tribal leaders in the Waziristan area will thwart border-hopping insurgents, a military spokesman said the fighting has continued.

"Just in the last two days along the Paktika province border, we've had two series of a large number of rockets fired at a couple of our bases along the border," Army Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, spokesman for the U.S.-led coalition in Afghanistan, told The News on Friday.

Fitzpatrick said 78 Katyusha rockets were fired "from just inside the border of Pakistan" in two attacks last week on U.S. firebases in Gayan and Bermel.

Neither attack caused casualties, but he added, "To have a battery of rockets fired at us at our bases is highly unusual."

"We've been in quite a few firefights, particularly in the border region," Army 1st Lt. Shawn Parnell, a platoon leader in Bermel, said in a coalition statement.

The same statement quoted other commanders calling the Bermel district "a major infiltration route," where "engaging in firefights is almost daily life."

Since the Waziristan truce - which calls on tribal elders to ensure that foreign fighters live peacefully - the Taliban also has issued two statements making claims of 17 attacks along the border.

Some Afghan officials have called the truce a deal with the Taliban.

Asked about the deal last week, President Bush said Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf assured him it was a good idea, adding, "I believe him."

But counterterrorism officers who have fought Al Qaeda in border combat have expressed skepticism to The News.

The 82nd Airborne Division is set to return by year's end to take over from the Fort Drum, N.Y.-based 10th Mountain Division. They will join 20,000 U.S. troops who have turned east to fight Al Qaeda at the border with Pakistan as NATO takes over patrolling southern Afghanistan, Fitzpatrick said.

Despite the Pakistani truce, military coordination has never been better with Musharraf's army, Fitzpatrick said.

DOJ_NMG_0068433

Last year, red tape often frustrated U.S. commanders in Afghanistan from chasing ambushers as they fled into Pakistan. But a half-dozen times this year, Pakistani forces have nabbed or killed fleeing insurgents upon request, he said.

"The border is not a sanctuary anymore," Fitzpatrick said.

British Army Defends Itself Against Criticism From Officers (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 23 — For the second time in two days, the army defended itself on Saturday against charges by middle-ranking officers in Afghanistan that British ground troops had received inadequate air support and other backing in their fight against the Taliban.

British officers in the field have traditionally tended to keep their complaints within the military. But with many soldiers using e-mail messages and video technology, it is easier for complaints to spread, possibly beyond where the officers intended.

The army's statements came in response to critical e-mail messages from officers that were leaked to the news media. Military specialists have said soldiers may be voicing their concerns more openly out of fear that the British public is unaware of the ferocity of the war in Afghanistan. This month, television news aired video recorded on a soldier's digital camera or cellphone showing troops in desert camouflage fatigues and full battle-dress in a furious firefight with Taliban insurgents.

With around 5,000 troops in the restive Helmand Province in the south, Britain is part of a NATO force trying to subdue insurgents to permit reconstruction.

But as Defense Minister Des Browne acknowledged in an address this week to the Royal United Services Institute, a security research organization, "we do have to accept that it's been even harder than we expected: the Taliban's tenacity in the face of massive losses has been a surprise, absorbing more of our effort than we predicted it would.''

During his speech, he rejected suggestions that British forces were poorly supported, describing conditions in Helmand as "hard, dirty and beyond the experience of most of us to understand.'' Like other NATO officials, he said the alliance was making inroads into Taliban resistance.

But in two sets of e-mail messages leaked to British news organizations later in the week, mid-ranking officers voiced serious complaints. On Thursday, Maj. Jon Swift said in a message from Afghanistan, "The scale of casualties has not been properly reported and shows no sign of reducing.'' His comments were posted on a regimental Web site, but were quickly withdrawn, the domestic Press Association news agency reported.

On Friday, several British broadcasters quoted from an e-mail message written by Maj. James Loden. "The R.A.F. have been utterly, utterly useless,'' Maj. Loden was quoted as saying, referring to two instances involving Harrier warplanes during close ground combat.

"A female Harrier pilot 'couldn't identify the target,' fired two phosphorous rockets that just missed our own compound so that we thought they were incoming RPG's, and then strafed our perimeter, missing the enemy by 200 meters,'' he wrote, according to British news reports. RPG stands for rocket-propelled grenade.

In contrast to Britain's Royal Air Force, Maj. Loden said, the United States Air Force had been "fantastic.''

Publication of the remarks represented an acute embarrassment for the military leadership, prompting a string of rebuttals by high-ranking officers.

Sir Richard Dannatt, the Chief of General Staff, said in a written statement, "The way the R.A.F. has performed in support of our operations in Afghanistan has been exceptional. Irresponsible comments, based on a snapshot, are regrettable.''

The Ministry of Defense in London said of Maj. Loden's remarks: "It must be remembered that this is the opinion of only one man. The general view is very different.''

In a television interview, Sir Richard also denied that the British authorities were seeking to underplay casualty figures. "We have got nothing to hide as far as that is concerned," he said. "The truth is what matters."

The officers' complaints reflect concern in the British military and elsewhere that, with 7,000 troops in southern Iraq, the army is overstretched.

On BBC radio, Sir Richard said Saturday that while the army was "coping'' in Afghanistan, it could not take on further deployments.

The debate over British troops in Afghanistan coincided with fresh displays of public opposition to the war in Iraq. Tens of thousands of protesters gathered in the northern city of Manchester Saturday, the eve of the annual conference of the governing Labor Party there, to demand that Prime Minister Tony Blair withdraw British troops from Iraq, then quit.

The police said some 20,000 people joined the protest, but organizers put the figure at 60,000.

The Key To Afghanistan: More Time (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0068434

By Jim Hoagland
The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

American commanders worry that Afghanistan is "the forgotten war" as it recedes into the shadow of the bloodier, more divisive conflict in Iraq. But they take some comfort from their relative obscurity: They need time, and they will take it any way they can get it.

The biggest challenge that U.S. and NATO forces face is not on the battlefield. It lies in building confidence in the country's rural tribes and sparse urban population that Western governments will stay deeply involved in Afghanistan for a decade or longer. If Afghans do not believe that, they are unlikely to take the risks of vast social and political change being demanded of them today.

In government-speak, this is called "pushing out the timelines." It means that Washington and other NATO capitals should accept the idea that they are providing a long-term military presence and significant development funding to Afghanistan as a matter of routine and strategy, rather than as a temporary military emergency.

Being "forgotten" in that sense is better than being at the center of the kind of urgent and partisan debate that Iraq has sparked. Whether the White House is willing to admit it or not, Iraq's particularities have eclipsed or altered the Bush administration's strategies of pushing democracy forward in the Middle East and of fighting the war on terrorism abroad rather than on American soil. The conflict there has become a war with Iraqi characteristics rather than an abstract struggle about greater goals and principles.

Afghanistan, on the other hand, still illustrates in fairly clear form the consequences and dynamics of fighting jihadist terrorist networks and their supporters in a failed Islamic state. Making a long-term commitment to Afghanistan as a matter of routine would require Congress to overhaul obsolete budgeting priorities that starve U.S. reconstruction and development projects. Europeans would have to fund expeditionary forces that are today ill equipped and ill trained for distant counterinsurgency operations. Both changes are desperately needed.

"Show me where the roads end, and I will show you where the Taliban begins," Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, the U.S. commander in Afghanistan, says often to his staff. But while the United States spends about $10 billion a year to field about 20,000 troops there, Congress frequently rejects or blocks creative approaches to development and peacekeeping that would cost much less.

Recent NATO decisions to take greater command responsibilities and to put several thousand more soldiers into the country's most active war zones are seen by U.S. officials as promising signs of shifting attitudes in Europe. NATO currently has 20,000 troops in Afghanistan operating under a British general.

"As new commanders come in, they see the need to be building bridges and schools to buy space for development and to keep the Taliban out," says one U.S. senior officer. "That should generate requests back to their capitals."

Even so, managing expectations and hopes has become a major task for the United States, Canada, the European nations of NATO and the beleaguered government of President Hamid Karzai. The greatest Afghan challenge may lie in the fact that the very progress brought by five years of Western involvement stirs fierce resistance in a tradition-bound, poverty-stricken Islamic society.

The number of girls in elementary and secondary schools has gone from zero to 2 million in those five years. That is a stunning accomplishment -- and no doubt a great recruiting tool for the Taliban as it seeks to reestablish the savagely misogynistic version of Islam that helped tie it to al-Qaeda.

That is why "pushing out the timelines" is vital: Only when it becomes clear to Afghans that the changes brought by the toppling of the Taliban are durable and will shape their options a decade from now will they commit to building a more tolerant society. That is broadly true throughout the Middle East and Central Asia.

Afghanistan turned out not to be a model for waging the war on terrorism. The quick success that U.S. forces scored in the autumn of 2001 misled commanders and their civilian chiefs about what would happen in Iraq. The 2001 lightning campaign was not even a doctrinal model for what would come in Afghanistan: The United States has more troops there now than at any time in the conflict.

But how the long-term counterinsurgency is waged in Afghanistan will foreshadow the outcome of the broader struggle against jihadist extremism. The struggle there needs resources, it needs time -- and it needs never to be forgotten.

jimhoagland@washpost.com

Our Five Iraq Wars (WT)

By James Jay Carafano, The Washington Times
The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068435

America has fought five wars in Iraq -- not merely one. And we've won or are winning four of them. Winning the last war, however, is all that counts. To cut and run now would leave America less safe than when we started.

War 1: Battling Saddam. The United States waged war in Iraq for one reason -- to remove Saddam from power. This was really a continuation of Desert Storm. After all, we halted the first Gulf war based on a host of promises Saddam made but never kept. Few doubt the United States, the peoples of the Middle East, and especially the Iraqis are better off with the Butcher of Baghdad out of power.

War 2: Combating chaos. Despite the scenes of rioting when the regime collapsed, America and its coalition partners managed to quickly avert a wide-scale humanitarian crisis. Although Iraq was (and is) hardly a danger-free zone, there was no mass starvation, floods of refuges, or disease outbreaks that usually accompany the aftermath of conflict.

War Three: Confronting al Qaeda. In the wake of the war, lacking any real success elsewhere in the world, transnational terrorists leaped into the vacuum in Iraq. In the first years following the regime's collapse, they accounted for the lion's share of murdering -- killing primarily innocent Iraqis. Even insurgent groups within Iraq that initially cooperated with al Qaeda in Iraq soured on the indiscriminate slaughter. Indeed, Ayman al-Zawahri (Osama bin Laden's deputy) warned that the terrorism in Iraq was alienating Muslims both inside and outside the country from the cause of al Qaeda.

Arguably, al Qaeda has lost in Iraq. Its most senior leadership has been killed or captured. Its popularity is low. And it no longer commands a significant following among the Iraqi insurgents.

War 4: The Sunni insurgency. The Sunni minority in Iraq largely abstained from the political process established to form a legitimate government. Democracy went on without them. Led by the other major groups, the Shi'ites and the Kurds, the Iraqis wrote a constitution, held a series of successful elections and seated an interim government. A Sunni insurgency first rose up to forestall the march of democracy. That failed. The insurgents then tried to force more compromises on the government. Over the last year, it appeared key Sunni leaders were giving up on the insurgency and were increasingly interested in negotiating a more equitable seat at the table and resolving key power-sharing issues.

War 5: Fighting the proxy war. Unfortunately for the United States, the wavering of the Sunni insurgency coincided with a decided increase in attacks by Shi'ite militias. These provocations have resulted in an increasingly cycle of retaliatory sectarian strikes between Sunnis and Shi'ites, as well as concerted efforts to kill more American soldiers using more deadly and accurate improvised explosive devices. This latest war may be the toughest to win because its principle authors are probably not inside Iraq. They are in Iran.

The most recent uptick in violence in Iraq parallels closely U.N. efforts to pressure Iran to give up its nuclear programs. Instability serves Iran's purposes. It diverts attention from the issue and undermines U.S. interests in the region.

There is a good deal of evidence to make this case. Weapons and funds to fuel the Shi'ite insurgency come across the border from Iran. In addition, Hezbollah, Iran's stooge in Lebanon, initiated a violent confrontation with Israel that also has shifted the focus away from what Iran's mullahs are up to.

Cutting and running in the face of this latest threat would yield only one result: It would empower Iran and make its radical government more aggressive, more reckless and more dangerous. That's obviously not in America's interest.

What the United States needs to do is finish the job in Iraq -- and that means strengthening Iraq's security forces so they can handle the insurgency. At the same time, it needs to focus on the other threats to regional stability -- helping empower the Lebanese government to disarm and defang Hezbollah and marshalling the international community to isolate and punish Iran for its adventurism.

That way, we can ensure that War 5 ends the same way the first four did.

James Jay Carafano is senior research fellow for national security and homeland security at the Heritage Foundation and author of "G.I. Ingenuity."

Closing Of A Nation (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

It's an elementary principle of child psychology: safety leads to exploration. The child who feels securely loved at home will venture out and try new things. The child who is insecure will be more passive and cling to what is known.

What's true of children is true of adults, and in Iraq we now have a case study in human insecurity. The people of Iraq have endured decades of dictatorship, war, insurgency and civil strife, and the psychological costs have been ruinous. Iraq is the most xenophobic, sexist and reactionary society on earth.

Researchers from the invaluable World Values Survey have interviewed over 2,300 adults from all over Iraq. The results have just been published by Ronald Inglehart, Mansoor Moaddel and Mark Tessler in the journal Perspectives on Politics.

DOJ_NMG_0068436

Inglehart, Moaddel and Tessler describe a people who, buffeted by violence, have withdrawn into mere survival mode. They are suspicious of outsiders and intolerant toward weak groups, and they cling fiercely to what is familiar and traditional.

The researchers asked the Iraqis if they would mind living next door to foreigners. In most societies, there is a small minority who say they would mind. Nine percent of Americans say they would mind, and in the median country internationally about 16 percent say they would mind. Ninety percent of the Iraqi Arab respondents rejected foreigners as neighbors.

As Inglehart, Moaddel and Tessler write, Iraqis "reject foreigners to a degree that is virtually unknown in other societies throughout the world, including more than a dozen predominantly Islamic countries."

Iraqi Arabs almost universally reject Americans, Britons and the French, and roughly 60 percent reject Iranians, Kuwaitis and Jordanians, the groups they are least hostile to.

Iraqis also viscerally resist social reform and deviation from the traditional ways of doing things. For example, 93 percent of Arab Iraqis said men made better leaders than women, the highest proportion of any group in the world.

Iraqi Arabs were asked which values they would like to instill in their children. They emphasized "obedience" and "religious faith" more than any of the 80 other societies that have been studied. They were less likely to try to instill "independence" in their children than people in 74 of the study's 80 societies.

Meanwhile, Iraqis cling fiercely to their primal identities. Roughly 86 percent of the Arab Iraqis said they were very proud to be Iraqi, and the Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds were very likely to trust members of their own community. Such in-group solidarity is almost without precedent.

Iraqi Kurds stood apart from the world in all these various measures, but Iraqi Arabs stood apart even more. This suggests that Saddam's tyranny had already had a corrosive effect on Iraqi society by 1991, when the Kurds were effectively liberated, but over the past 15 years, things have become much worse. It's impossible to tell how much of the trauma has been caused since the American invasion.

We do know, however, that American policy makers were surprised to learn how religious Iraqi society had become during the 1990's. (Iraqi exiles had not prepared them for this.) And we also know this climate of opinion works against the Iraqi leaders as they try to create a functioning nation.

In essence, Iraqis are like turtles trying to pull into their shells, but the big tasks now require non-shell behavior. They require getting Shiites and Sunnis to trust each other enough to negotiate a settlement on sharing oil revenue. They require getting Shiite policemen to crack down on their own, and on Moktada al-Sadr's Shiite militia.

The larger lesson, as we think about future efforts to reform the Middle East and combat extremism, is that the Chinese model probably works best. That is, it's best to champion economic reform before political reform.

We know from a wealth of historical experience that when people see their standard of living rise, they reject the reactionary survival mentality and they become more open to others and to change. If people already see their lives improving materially, they will be more likely to keep their cool as their political institutions are reinvented.

In the age of terror, statesmanship means knowing how to create a sense of security so you can lead people on a voyage of reform. Most of all, it means that if you're going to do nation-building, you have to understand the values of the people you're going to build a nation with.

Stuff Happens Again In Baghdad (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

IT'S not just about torture. Even if there had never been an Abu Ghraib, a Guantánamo or an American president determined to rewrite the Geneva Conventions, America would still be losing the war for hearts and minds in the Arab world. Our first major defeat in that war happened at the dawn of the Iraq occupation, before "detainee abuse" entered our language: the "Stuff happens!" moment at the National Museum in Baghdad.

Three and a half years later, have we learned anything? You have to wonder. As the looting of the museum was the first clear warning of disasters soon to come, so the stuff that's happening at the museum today is a grim indicator of where we're headed in Iraq: America is empowering the very Islamic radicals this war was supposed to smite. But even now we seem to be averting our eyes from reality on the ground in Baghdad.

Our blindness back in April 2003 seems ludicrous in retrospect. As the looting flared, an oblivious President Bush told the Iraqi people in a televised address that they were "the heirs of a great civilization that contributes to all humanity." Our actions — or, more accurately, our inaction as the artifacts of that great civilization were carted away — spoke louder than those pretty words. As Fred Ikle, the Reagan administration Pentagon policy chief, puts it in Thomas Ricks's "Fiasco," "America lost most of its prestige and respect in that episode."

DOJ_NMG_0068437

That disaster might have been mitigated if our leaders had not dismissed the whole episode as a triviality. But Donald Rumsfeld likened the chaos to the aftermath of a soccer game and joked that television was exaggerating the story by recycling video of a single looter with a vase. Gen. Richard Myers defended our failure to intervene as "a matter of priorities" (we had protected the oil ministry). Lt. Gen. William Wallace, countering a wildly inflated early claim by a former museum employee that 170,000 artifacts had been destroyed, put the number of objects still unaccounted for at "as few as 17." (The actual number was closer to 14,000.)

The war's many cheerleaders in the press fell into line. In keeping with the mood of the time, administration enforcers like Charles Krauthammer and Andrew Sullivan damned Mr. Rumsfeld's critics as fatuous aesthetes exploiting a passing incident to denigrate the liberation of Iraq. In a column in Salon titled "Idiocy of the Week" (that idiot would be me), Mr. Sullivan asked rhetorically who was right about "the alleged ransacking" of the museum, Mr. Rumsfeld or his critics? "Rummy, of course. He almost always is."

Of course, dear old Rummy's what-me-worry take on the museum was the tip-off to how he would be wrong about everything that would follow: he reacted with exactly the same disdain and indifference to the insurgency happening under his own nose and to Abu Ghraib. There would be a hasty corrective to the looting, at least: a heroic Marine Reserve colonel, Matthew Bogdanos, commanded a team that ultimately tracked down a bit more than a third of the vanished objects. (It was too late to rescue tens of thousands of additional treasures in Iraq's National Library and National Archives, both also looted and torched.) But Mr. Rumsfeld's "Stuff happens!" proved indelible because it so resonantly set forth an enduring theme of the occupation: that the Americans in charge of Iraq were contemptuous of the local populace to whom they were so grandly bequeathing democracy and other fruits of civilization.

The cavalier American reaction to the museum looting was mimicked in the $22 billion reconstruction effort, an orgy of corruption and waste that still hasn't brought Iraqis reliable electricity. In a new account of the civilian nation-builders in the Green Zone, "Imperial Life in the Emerald City," Rajiv Chandrasekaran of The Washington Post details how L. Paul Bremer III and his underlings enlisted cronies and apparatchiks rather than those who might actually know anything about the country's people or their needs. Thus we saddled Iraq with Bernie Kerik, G.O.P. fund-raisers and politically connected young ideologues chosen over more qualified job applicants who knew Arabic. They saw Iraq as a guinea pig for irrelevant (and doomed) experiments, including an antismoking campaign and an elaborate American-style stock exchange. Mr. Chandrasekaran's book, while nonfiction, is as chilling an indictment of America's tragic cultural myopia as Graham Greene's prescient 1955 novel of the American debacle in Indochina, "The Quiet American."

Our public diplomacy efforts were equally tone-deaf to Iraqis and their neighbors. In the early going, the State Department hired a Madison Avenue whiz who made sunny TV testimonials about America's love of Muslims. These ads won no hearts or minds, but wasted tons of money and even more valuable time. Now this job belongs to Karen Hughes, the presidential flack, whose patronizing photo-op tour of the region last year earned mostly ridicule.

Our broadcasting outreach there is supervised by a longtime Karl Rove pal, Kenneth Tomlinson, who last month was found by State Department investigators to be using his office — literally — to run a "horse-racing operation." One of Mr. Tomlinson's thoroughbreds is named Karzai, in supposed honor of the Afghan president. If that's his idea of lifting America's image in the Muslim world, he might as well be on Al Jazeera's payroll. On Wednesday, ABC News reported the bottom line of such P.R. misfires: a confidential Pentagon survey found that 75 percent of Iraq's Sunni Muslims support the insurgency, up from 14 percent in 2003.

Speaking before the United Nations last week in what may be the run-up to our new war, Mr. Bush was still on his battle-for-civilization kick, flattering Iranians much as he has the Iraqis. "We admire your rich history, your vibrant culture, and your many contributions to civilization," he said. All Iranians have to do is look to the Baghdad museum today to see that such words are worth no more now than they were in 2003.

It's symbolic of the anarchy throughout Iraq's capital that the museum's entrances are now sealed with concrete to keep out new hordes of killers and thieves. But the violence, which seems to spiral with each declaration of a new security crackdown, is old news. More revealing is the other half of the museum's current plight: it is now in the hands of Iraq's version of the Taliban. That sad denouement is another symbol, standing for our defeat in the larger war of ideas.

The museum changed hands in August, when Donny George, its longtime administrator and the chairman of Iraq's official antiquities board, fled the country fearing for his life and for the treasures in his care, both at the museum and the country's many archaeological sites. Mr. George is a Christian and had good reason to fear. The new government minister placed in charge of the museum, a dentist, is an acolyte of the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, whose goal is to make Iraq a fundamentalist theocracy. To Mr. Sadr and his followers, the museum's legendary pre-Islam antiquities, harking back to the ancient civilizations of Mesopotamia, are infidels' idols to be sacked.

DOJ_NMG_0068438

You might think, given Mr. Sadr's radicalism, that he is a fugitive terrorist on the lam as, say, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was. After all, Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army, is a font of death squads at the heart of the sectarian warfare; he's an enthusiastic ally of Hezbollah besides. But he is instead a major player in the "democracy" we have installed in Iraq, controlling at least 30 of 275 seats in the Parliament and six government ministries, including the power centers of transportation and health.

Back in 2004, the Americans made plans to take down Mr. Sadr, but as Larry Diamond, a senior adviser to the coalition authority in Baghdad, writes in his book "Squandered Victory," those plans were shelved for "various reasons, including political calculations in Washington." American forces arrested some Sadr aides last week, but such periodic skirmishes notwithstanding, his influence continues to grow. He is a crucial ally of the prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, who would not be in office without his support. In the past few days, both Tony Snow and Condi Rice have been reaffirming that the administration has what the secretary of state called "enormous confidence" in Mr. Maliki, despite Washington chatter to the contrary.

One of the first Westerners to warn strongly of the dangers of someone like Mr. Sadr was Gertrude Bell (1868-1926), the legendary archaeologist, explorer, author and British political officer who masterminded the unlikely cobbling together of the modern Iraq state after World War I. She warned that a Shiite theocracy in the new country would be "the very devil." As it happened, it was also Bell who created the Iraqi National Museum in 1923.

The fortunes of her museum, once considered the finest in the Middle East, have been synonymous with the fate of Iraq ever since. That's because, like any such national institution, it is not merely some building that houses art but a repository of a country's heart and soul. That America has stood helplessly by as Mr. Sadr folds the museum into his orbit of power is as ominous a predictor of what lies ahead in this war as was our callous reaction to the looting of 2003. For all of America's talk of stamping out a "murderous ideology" and promoting civilization and democracy in Iraq, we are now handing the very devil the keys.

Spin Doctors (WP)

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

A columnist accuses the Bush administration of replacing facts with public relations gambits.

THE GREATEST STORY EVER SOLD

The Decline and Fall of Truth from 9/11 to Katrina

By Frank Rich

Penguin Press. 341 pp. $25.95

Throughout George W. Bush's presidency, no columnist has been more perceptive than Frank Rich of the New York Times. A longtime film and drama critic, Rich, for the past decade, has used his insights into performance and stagecraft to explain a political culture increasingly dominated by simulation and spectacle.

Exploring the news each week through the lens of pop culture -- the film "United 93" or the TV show "24," for example -- Rich teases out implications that escape straight-news pundits. The technique allows him to illuminate not only the submerged political currents of mass entertainment but also the theatricality of Washington politics today.

Now Rich has written The Greatest Story Ever Sold , a gripping, witty and devastating indictment of President Bush's reliance on public relations to market his Iraq and counterterrorism policies. Future historians will turn to other works -- by James Bamford, Thomas E. Ricks, James Risen, Ron Suskind and Bob Woodward -- to understand White House and Pentagon decision-making after 9/11. But Rich's overview will be indispensable for grasping how Americans experienced the events of these years.

For those who have largely opposed Bush's policies, reading Rich's book summons up familiar feelings of outrage and helplessness. Those readers who have tipped from being Bush supporters to critics may gain some wisdom into why they were originally led astray. And even die-hard Bushies may appreciate this volume as a shrewd study in the history of political PR -- if, that is, they can get past Rich's wry, withering tone.

As in his columns, Rich uses cultural touchstones such as Philip Roth's novel The Plot Against America and the movie "Chicago" to help us see how populist demagoguery works or how a huckster can con a press pack. But the book's core is a survey of the White House spins and shams since 9/11, including then-national security adviser Condoleezza Rice's "mushroom cloud" scare tactics, Colin Powell's Adlai Stevenson impersonation at the United Nations and, of course, Bush's May 2003 "Mission Accomplished" declaration on the flight deck. Rich deftly arranges these and other public moments alongside cases of secret government propaganda -- the payola to working journalists, the fake "video news releases" slipped into local TV news shows -- to construct a persuasive picture of an administration bent on creating "our own reality," as one Bush aide famously put it.

DOJ_NMG_0068439

Rich does let a few people off the hook. He's too easy on Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald, who, while fashioning himself as the second coming of Watergate prosecutor Archibald Cox, has abetted the president's anti-press campaign by jailing one reporter for not playing ball and threatening others.

In my view, Rich lays too much blame for the free hand that Bush has enjoyed at the door of the Fourth Estate. Rich doesn't go as far as some other recent books that lambaste reporters as lapdogs, but he laments that "there was only sporadic digging into the war-ennobled administration by mainstream journalists" and that TV news "barely raised any questions at all."

Obviously, individual outlets, including the New York Times for which Rich writes, erred badly in overplaying claims about the menace Saddam Hussein posed. Some Washington correspondents went native, identifying too closely with insider sources. The tabloid tenor of most broadcast news -- about which Rich has written brilliantly -- fanned Americans' crudest urges.

But Rich's well-researched narrative testifies to the dogged, independent-minded reporting that -- despite this oppressive climate -- revealed official mistakes, lies and violations of law. In recounting the long trail of administration deceptions and blunders, Rich credits the reporters at The Washington Post, the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal who discovered them. He cites scoops from outlets as diverse as Roll Call, the National Journal, the Smoking Gun, Vanity Fair and the New Yorker. Even the generally abysmal TV news shows did some worthy investigation, he tells us: CBS News exposed the abuses at Abu Ghraib, and anchors such as Diane Sawyer, Tom Brokaw and Ted Koppel grilled Bush and other evasive heavies at key moments.

What The Greatest Story Ever Sold illustrates is that most Americans did not back the Iraq invasion because they were credulous, though many were, or even because the administration was dishonest, though it was -- reprehensibly so. In the end, notwithstanding the hype, the truth wasn't all that hard to see; even Bush's misleading claims that Saddam Hussein was about to acquire nukes were debunked on the front pages, as Rich points out, before the invasion began. Yet most citizens, despite access to evidence, chose to follow the president anyway. Rich doesn't get into why they did so, but I think the reasons boil down to a widespread popular desire to exorcise post-9/11 feelings of shame and vulnerability with the nationalistic pride achieved through the exercise of military might.

Many people who might have supported the Iraq war under different circumstances remained intractably opposed because they believed Bush hadn't proven that Baghdad was making nuclear weapons or working with al-Qaeda. They held this view because, among other reasons, in the months and years after 9/11, they were reading the smart, critical and blessedly spin-proof writings of Frank Rich. Â·

David Greenberg is a professor of history and media studies at Rutgers University and the author of "Nixon's Shadow: The History of an Image" and the forthcoming "Calvin Coolidge."

What Would Jefferson Say About Iraq? (PHI)

By R.K. Ramazani

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 24, 2006

In the next few days - and only a few days are left of this term of Congress - both houses are expected to embrace the compromise between leading Republicans and the White House on the treatment of prisoners of war. When they strike this agreement, they will do more than protect American troops captured abroad; they also will uphold the Founding Fathers' principle of humane treatment of prisoners of war.

Since President Bush has made the Middle East region the centerpiece of his foreign policy, the American public should expect that the founding principles of the American republic would apply to the invasion of Iraq and the promotion of democracy there, as the model for the broader Middle East. American treatment of prisoners of war should be nothing less than a model as well.

In contrast to Bush, Thomas Jefferson, the intellectual father of America, decried what today are called "wars of choice." He clearly considered the one war for which he was U.S. commander in chief, the war against the Barbary Pirates, a defensive war. He said he banished "the legitimacy of war to dark ages" and in 1797 said, "I abhor war and view it as the greatest scourge of mankind." While Jefferson would have seen U.S. military operations in Afghanistan as justified after 9/11, he would not have advocated a so-called preventive attack on Iraq.

What would Jefferson have thought about the Bush administration's approach to promoting democracy in Iraq, the broader Middle East, and the world? Jefferson wrote: "I hope and firmly believe that the whole world will sooner than later feel benefit from the issue of our assertion of the right of man." For Jefferson, this was an aspiration, not a foreign-policy goal.

Jefferson would have opposed the imposition of democracy on any society by military action for several reasons. He believed that coercion is incompatible with liberty and that a society must undergo an evolutionary process before it will embrace democracy and the liberal values of justice, public education and a free press necessary for it to function. Jefferson would have faulted the Bush administration's launch of democratization in Iraq without regard to the realities of Iraqi society, in which most people still have higher loyalties to family, religion and tribe than to the nation-state. The U.S. Department of State produced such an assessment of the Iraqi situation in its 2002-03 "Future of Iraq" project, but the Pentagon rejected the findings of the study, and the invasion of Iraq proceeded.

DOJ_NMG_0068440

Instead, if asked how best to spread democracy, Jefferson would have suggested three alternative and peaceful methods. First among these would be America's own example of liberal democratic practices. In 1801, he wrote: "A just and solid republican government here will be a standing monument and example for the aim and imitation of people of other countries."

Second would be effective use of what we now call public diplomacy. That includes widespread sharing of information and a fair degree of transparency in our dealings with other countries. He wrote in 1810: "No one more sincerely wishes the spread of information among mankind than I do, and none has greater confidence in its supporting free and good government."

Third, and most important, Jefferson would have stressed support for the American system of higher education. In today's parlance, he would have advocated expanding American educational initiatives, such as the Fulbright exchange program. Jefferson firmly believed that public education was a vital weapon in uprooting authoritarian rulers and promoting the creation of democratic governments. In his memorable words: "Enlighten the people generally, and tyranny and oppression of body and mind will vanish like evil spirits at the dawn of day."

And regarding the treatment of prisoners of war, Jefferson would have insisted on upholding the principles of international law in general, and the Geneva Conventions in particular. There are echoes of the Jeffersonian precepts of 1781 in Article 3 of the Conventions - which has been the focus of so much negotiation between the president and Senate Republicans - and in the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. Both Article 3 and Hamdan bar inhumane treatment of war prisoners. More than 200 years ago, Jefferson urged that Americans should endeavor "as far as possible to alleviate the inevitable miseries of war by treating captives as humanity and national honor requires."

Strong presidential power is important in times of war. Even so, the checks and balances embodied in Congress and the courts are vital to the democratic process. Congress was created to check "the dog of war," as Jefferson put it. Regarding prisoners of war, he would have called for their just treatment to show the United States as a beacon of liberty and justice throughout the world.

Jefferson would have been appalled by Bush's misguided policy in the Middle East as tactically shortsighted, strategically ineffective, and above all, dishonorable. He would have applauded the Supreme Court's ruling in June against the Bush administration's position on allowing military tribunals to withhold evidence from prisoners of war, as depriving the accused of due process guaranteed in the Bill of Rights. And he would have endorsed the efforts of Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.) and other congressional leaders to put the brakes on Bush's foreign policy and redirect the country, even in these difficult times, to a path that preserves the morals of our founders: duty, justice and national honor.

Otherwise, what are we defending?

Dividing Iraq Would Just Mean More Threats (LAT)

By W. Robert Pearson, W. Robert Pearson Was U.s. Ambassador To Turkey From 2000 To 2003.

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

Separate Sunni, Shiite and Kurd states are a seductive solution, but a single central government is Iraq's best chance for stability.

PROMINENT EXPERTS have begun to argue that dividing Iraq into three parts — Sunni, Shiite and Kurd — is more viable than trying to build a single, central Iraqi state. They reason that the only solution to sectarian violence is for Sunnis and Shiites to live apart. The Kurds, they argue, have demonstrated their ability to live autonomously since 1990. Nothing else has worked, so why not let the pieces fall where they may? But this is not a plan; it is a destabilizing default strategy.

Thoughtful observers, such as Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Leslie Gelb, former president of the Council on Foreign Relations, have argued for a federated Iraqi with near-statehood status for the three regions and an agreement on dividing the oil money. If such a deal could be struck, and if the breakup could be halted there, Iraq might see greater stability. But the more likely outcome is a loose federation plagued by conflict, with one or more parties trying to win full independence. Confederation could prove a Pandora's box for the U.S. and the region.

Dividing Iraq would invite Tehran to make even more mischief within the Iraqi Shiite community, especially to further exploit the rivalry between the two major clerics, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani and Muqtada Sadr. If the Shiite areas in southern and eastern Iraq fell under Iranian influence, would Tehran not be tempted to turn its attention to the Sunnis in the west and the Kurds in the north? How would the global energy situation be affected if Iran were to gain influence over a rump Shiite state as its protector? How would neighboring Sunni states — Jordan and Saudi Arabia — react? Would Hezbollah, Iran's proxy against Israel, not feel strengthened in Lebanon?

DOJ_NMG_0068441

All the countries in the region with sizable Kurdish populations would oppose the creation of an independent Kurdish state, fearing territorial claims and divided loyalties among their ethnic Kurds. Turkey worries most of all. U.S. acquiescence in an independent Kurdistan would confirm the Turks' worst fears about American engagement in Iraq. Turkey has the largest Kurdish population in the Middle East — four to five times greater than that in northern Iraq. The Turks fear that an independent Kurdistan on former Iraqi territory would agitate to include Turkish Kurds. It was just in 1999 that Turkey brought to a close a 20-year battle with its Kurdish insurgency in which more than 30,000 people died. And since the beginning of the Iraq war, Turkey has watched the same insurgency renew a guerrilla campaign. Meanwhile, its decision not to allow the U.S. to launch a northern front to invade Iraq via Turkey cost Ankara both its influence in northern Iraq and any chance to cooperate with the U.S. in shaping postwar Iraq.

Although many Americans rightly praise Iraqi Kurds as allies who helped us in the 2003 war, the U.S. should think twice about giving security guarantees to an independent Kurdistan. The Iraqi province of Kurdistan has no access to the sea and is wholly dependent on its neighbors for the export and import of goods, including the oil it wants to control. Is the U.S. willing to have a permanent military presence in an independent Kurdistan, putting our troops at risk for no strategic benefit?

Finally, Kurds might ask themselves whether they really want full independence. With no powerful protector in the region, they would have to stand alone among unfriendly neighbors. In addition, the Kurds' current unity masks deep rivalries between two major factions, each possessing independent armies. And they aren't alone in the northern province. The Turkmens will continue to look to Ankara for support. Disputes continue with the Iraqi Arabs, who for years were sent north by Saddam Hussein to displace local Kurds. Add the struggle for control of Kirkuk's oil fields to the mix and the ethnic and political tensions rise further. Civil wars have erupted over less. Shiites and Sunnis won't support an independent Kurdish state unless it shares the Kirkuk fields. Would Kirkuk then be internationalized? The history of internationalized cities is not a happy one.

An Iraqi split might seem seductive, but those who are tempted might recall Horace Greeley's advice in 1861 to deal with the South by letting the "erring sisters depart in peace." Greeley later changed his mind and urged the North to fight to preserve the Union.

As hard as it is to imagine, the consequences of a divided Iraq could be even worse than the woes of today. The United States should use whatever influence it has in Iraq, and in the region, to foster a central government in Baghdad capable of moving the country toward stability through negotiation among the contending parties — whatever we may think of their arrangements. That would be the best protection — under the circumstances — for all Iraqis.

Rally On Mall Supports Troops (WT)

By Tarron Lively

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

Backers of the war on terrorism rallied on the Mall yesterday for the second annual Support the Troops and Their Mission Weekend in Washington.

A crowd estimated at between 70 and 100 people waved U.S. and military flags as they listened to speeches by family members of soldiers and representatives of groups such as FreeRepublic.com, the sponsor of the rally; Project 21; and Military Families Voice of Victory.

Kristinn Taylor, co-founder and spokesman for the D.C. chapter of Free Republic, moderated the event, which honored Gold Star and Blue Star families.

"The myth is that we've all come together after 9/11, which isn't entirely true," he said. "The left [wing] is the left. It will always attack America first, will always blame America first, will always work with our enemies to bring down America.

"So, we made a vow that we would not allow the anti-American left to do to this country and this generation of our military what they did to them during Vietnam, and we've kept that vow for five years now," he said.

Mychal Massie, a member of Project 21, a network of black conservatives, agreed.

U.S. troops "place service to America before service to themselves, realizing that service to America is indeed service to us all," Mr. Massie said. "They need to know that we support their families, their friends and, most of all, their children. ...Tomorrow's freedom rests on their [children's] shoulders."

Richard August of North Kingstown, R.I., whose son, Matthew, was an Army captain killed in Iraq two weeks before his 29th birthday in 2004, said he doesn't regard his son's death as a tragedy.

"My son died in the service of his country," he said. "He and eight other soldiers of his company died during their deployment because, in my son's words, they were in Iraq trying to help the majority of Iraqi people overcome the brutal effects of a dictator's rule over 30 years.

"Theirs were not tragic deaths. Theirs were noble deaths," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068442

Richard Linn of Chesterfield, Va., said his son, Lance Cpl. Karl R. Linn, 20, was killed with three others from his unit in January 2005 in an ambush in Iraq's Anbar province.

"One thing Karl and I agreed on was, despite whatever reasons we've got [for being] over there, that the only thing to do was to finish the job correctly," he said. "And to that end, I support our efforts, and I support our troops to this day."

Leo Flood of Fort Hood, Texas, who has a son in the Navy, said he opens his home and his wallet to all military members whom his son brings home to visit.

"We shouldn't even have to be here," he said of the rally. "It should be an automatic assumption that we support our troops and their mission in any way, shape, form or fashion."

Evan Sayet, a comedian and political commentator, said he was a liberal until he witnessed their reaction to September 11, which he said ultimately showed their disloyalty to the country when they railed against the war.

"The left rejects fact, reason and logic as an act of bigotry," he said. "How do they think they're making a better world by siding wholly with evil over good, wrong over right, and the behaviors that lead to failure over those that lead to success?"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Dangers Of A World Without Rules (NYT)

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

IT was just another ho-hum week on Wall Street: the Federal Reserve held rates steady, stocks were about flat — and a hedge fund called Amaranth Advisors lost $6 billion.

Amaranth and its investors are still sorting out the fund's huge, wrong-way bet on natural gas prices that appears to have cost it two-thirds of its $9.25 billion in assets. In the meantime, where were commodities regulators as Amaranth amassed its positions that in the unwinding have had such an impact on energy prices?

To answer that question, we must travel back to Dec. 15, 2000, the final day of the 106th Congress, when a last-minute provision was inserted into legislation removing regulatory oversight from energy commodities traded on over-the-counter electronic exchanges.

The provision was an early Christmas gift to a company that had worked hard to persuade members of Congress that electronic energy exchanges and all the trades made on them should be exempt from regulators' prying eyes. The company was Enron.

With one swift kick, the Commodity Futures Modernization Act, as the legislation was called, booted commodity cops off a now-large segment of the energy trading beat. While the New York Mercantile Exchange requires its participants to file so-called large trader reports with the Commodity Futures Trading Commission to help it spot manipulation, over-the-counter electronic exchanges do not make such filings. Instead, the electronic energy markets are left to pretty much regulate themselves.

Many of Amaranth's monster trades in the natural gas markets were conducted on over-the-counter markets or with so-called voice brokers and so were not on regulators' radar screens.

It is too soon to tell what role Amaranth's gamble had on natural gas prices. But speculators played a significant role in the astonishing rise in energy prices in recent years.

Such is the conclusion of a compelling Congressional report produced in June by the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs. The 49-page report detailed the explosion in energy speculation on unregulated trading markets and recommended eliminating the so-called Enron loophole that put electronic energy trading off the regulatory reservation.

The Oil and Gas Traders Oversight Act of 2006 would close the loophole. Until last week the bill was languishing. With any luck, the Amaranth debacle may change that.

The bill is sponsored by four senators: three Democrats — Dianne Feinstein of California, Carl Levin of Michigan and Maria E. Cantwell of Washington — and a Republican, Olympia J. Snowe of Maine.

"We didn't need more evidence that there is a big Enron loophole that's gaping in our regulation of these energy traders, but we sure got it" with Amaranth, Mr. Levin said. "This is proof that you've got to have oversight."

Mr. Levin said that a similar amendment was narrowly defeated several years ago. "We've got a unanimous consent agreement to bring the bill up, but the Republican leader is not going to schedule it," he said, referring to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, "which probably reflects the power of the oil and gas industry around here."

Speculators have been a force in the rise in energy prices in recent years. Supply has not been a problem — the amount of natural gas in storage since mid-2004, for example, has exceeded the previous five-year average, except for a Katrina-related shock.

DOJ_NMG_0068443

Even so, prices of natural gas have also exceeded their five-year average. This highly unusual situation has occurred as investors, disappointed with middling returns elsewhere, have poured money into commodities.

Philip K. Verleger Jr., an economist who runs his own firm in Aspen, Colo., estimates that in the past two years, $130 billion has flowed into commodities index funds. An additional $150 billion has gone directly into energy commodities, he said.

"Commodities as an alternative asset class has always been a great idea," Mr. Verleger said. "But like all investment ideas, everything is good in moderation and nothing ever happens in moderation."

Hedge fund traders have been among the biggest beneficiaries of this boom, booking billions in profits — and pay — in recent years.

But another big winner has been the IntercontinentalExchange, the leading electronic exchange for energy trading. Known as ICE, the exchange was formed in 2000 by seven investment banks and oil companies, including Goldman Sachs, Morgan Stanley, BP Amoco and the Royal Dutch/Shell Group. Based in Atlanta, it has been a public company for almost a year; not surprisingly, its stock has doubled so far this year.

Traders have flocked to ICE. In 2003, 13.7 million natural gas contracts traded there, with a notional value of $186 billion. Last year, 55.5 million such contracts traded, with a notional value of $1.3 trillion.

In regulatory terms, ICE operates its over-the-counter markets as an exempt commercial market, meaning it is subject to the Commodity Exchange Act's bans on fraud and manipulation but not subject to the C.F.T.C.'s regulatory oversight.

"The history of the commodities markets demonstrates it is unrealistic to rely on the self-interest of a few large traders as a substitute for dedicated, independent oversight to protect the public interest," the Congressional report noted dryly.

Johnathan H. Short, ICE's general counsel, said: "If anybody is doing anything inappropriate they would stand to be liable if it were proven that they manipulated a market. We have thousands of people looking at our screens; if somebody sees something unusual we have an obligation to report into the C.F.T.C. so it can take appropriate investigative action."

Many of those screen-watchers are hedge funds — the fastest-growing constituency at ICE. While hedge funds and other proprietary trading outfits accounted for 4.6 percent of total commissions in 2003, they accounted for 28 percent in the second quarter this year. The percentage of commissions generated by commercial companies and financial institutions has fallen during this time.

Government filings indicate that ICE would prefer to keep the regulatory setup precisely as it is. Noting in its annual report that members of Congress had introduced legislation in the past that would bring the exchange's business under direct regulation by the C.F.T.C., the company said: "If adopted, this legislation could require us and our participants to operate under heightened regulatory burdens and incur additional costs." Such a bill, it added, could also "deter some participants from trading on our O.T.C. platform."

WHAT does the C.F.T.C. think of the Amaranth situation? So far, "it appears that the system is working the way it is supposed to, in terms of the market discipline of creditors, brokers and clearinghouses," said James A. Overdahl, chief economist at the C.F.T.C. He is confident, he said, that the commission can spot manipulation on over-the-counter markets, even if it does not regulate them, because the prices of O.T.C. contracts are set by trades on the Nymex, which is under its jurisdiction.

But the propane manipulation case brought against traders at BP earlier this year suggests otherwise. The C.F.T.C. did not detect the manipulation, which involved over-the-counter trades — it learned of the problem from a whistleblower. One former trader pleaded guilty to participating in a conspiracy to manipulate and corner the propane market. BP has denied wrongdoing and is cooperating with the inquiry.

The energy markets are too important to the economy and the American consumer to be left to bet-the-ranch hedge fund traders. Isn't it interesting: Enron has been dead for almost five years. But as last week's implosion of Amaranth shows, its troubling legacy lives on.

Regulating Hedge Funds (NYT)

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

As debacles go, the one last week at the hedge fund Amaranth Advisors was orderly. The fund's star trader had bet big that natural gas prices would rise. They fell instead. On Monday, the fund admitted it had lost more than $3 billion, a sum later pegged at $6 billion. And yet, as of Friday, the fund, though badly battered, had managed to avoid liquidation.

It could have been much worse — and not just for the investors who were burned.

Hedge funds — largely unregulated investment pools for wealthy individuals and institutional investors — have infiltrated every corner of every market, taking big risks for big returns. Market players know that big risks can also mean big losses. But in the days after Amaranth's meltdown they were unnerved by what they did not know, such as how much of Amaranth's bet had been made with borrowed money. If questions about the fund's ability to make good on its obligations had persisted — or if a default had ensued — markets would have been vulnerable to a debilitating chain reaction in which financial entities like banks and brokerages slam the brakes on deal making, hoping to avoid the accident unfolding in front of them.

DOJ_NMG_0068444

That didn't happen this time. But Amaranth is only one of 9,000 hedge funds that collectively manage an estimated $1.2 trillion in assets — a size and scope undreamed of a decade ago. Not all hedge funds throw borrowed money at hot-handed traders to make outsized bets. But it would be naïve to think there aren't more shocks in store.

With that in mind, regulators need to act now to translate their various calls for hedge-fund oversight into enforceable rules and, in some instances, into concrete proposals for Congress to enact.

A week before the Amaranth debacle, the president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, Timothy Geithner, said in a speech that the growth in hedge funds would eventually force regulators to think about ways to better protect the financial system. Eventually is now. Two years ago, the Securities and Exchange Commission passed a rule to register hedge funds, with the goal of greater oversight of pension investments in hedge funds. The rule was flawed, and was overturned in court. But the aim was a good one. The S.E.C. should pursue a focused set of hedge-fund reforms and Congress should pass a law to prevent pension funds from investing in hedge funds that do not submit to federal regulation.

Congress should also repeal a law from 2000 that limits regulators' ability to monitor over-the-counter derivative securities — financial instruments not listed on the exchanges. That market has grown markedly in recent years and contributes greatly to hedge funds' wheeling and dealing.

Policy makers know hedge funds cannot adequately police themselves. What are they waiting for?

CRIMINAL LAW:

Timing In Case Against Jefferson Tricky (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Washington Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, September 24, 2006

Election may affect when feds tip hand

WASHINGTON -- With the selection last week of a technology expert to copy documents from computer hard drives taken from Rep. William Jefferson's office, the Justice Department might soon have the material it says it needs to wrap up its 18-month investigation of the New Orleans Democrat.

That could leave the agency with a dilemma: Should the department decide whether to seek an indictment of Jefferson before the Nov. 7 primary or wait until after the race is decided?

Jefferson, facing the first tough re-election challenge since his election to the House of Representatives in 1990, has attracted 12 opponents.

While the timing of elections is one of many factors that the Justice Department examines in deciding whether to indict an elected official, matters of law are the paramount concern, former and current federal prosecutors said.

"The policy is that you should bring an indictment when you have the evidence and when you are ready to proceed without consideration for an election," said Eric Holder, who headed the department's public integrity section during the Clinton administration.

A current Justice Department official, who asked not to be identified because he feared his "general remarks about process" might seem aimed at the Jefferson probe, said an election could be one of many factors considered. But he said it is a relatively minor one and is even less important in a case where the public is already aware that the elected official is the target of a probe.

Jefferson has all but said he expects to be indicted, proclaiming that he looks forward to vigorously proclaiming his innocence in the "appropriate time and forum."

No good choice

The investigation, in which a cooperating witness secretly recorded conversations with Jefferson, has netted two guilty pleas from former associates who say the congressman demanded and accepted bribes through businesses operated by his family in return for pushing technology projects in Africa.

In the past, the Justice Department has indicted elected officials right before and right after elections. Either way, the timing has generated criticism. Indictments just after an election have been criticized for not giving voters information they needed to evaluate the candidate up for re-election. Indictments just prior to an election have been attacked as attempts to snuff out the official's re-election chances.

"Either way you decide to do things -- whether to bring charges before an election or after an election -- can be considered political," said Binny Miller, a law professor at American University's Washington College of Law. "If you indict before an election, let's face it, some people consider being charged with the crime the same as being found guilty by a jury, ignoring the long-held belief by many that a prosecutor could get a grand jury to indict a ham sandwich."

Stanley Brand, a former counsel to the House of Representatives, said it's not as if investigations of House members can occur at convenient intervals.

"House members run every two years," Brand said, "so there really isn't any good time to indict if you don't want to influence elections."

In Jefferson's case, it's unclear how an indictment before the November election would affect his chances. Significant information about the case has already come out, including the discovery of $90,000 in $100 bills packed inside the freezer of his Washington, D.C., home. So it's possible that voters already think they know the worst and have already decided whether they believe Jefferson's declarations of innocence.

An indictment might even boost Jefferson's claim that the Justice Department, which subjected him to the first-ever raid of a congressional office, was unfairly targeting him.

Often seen as guilty verdict

On the other hand, as Miller, the American University law professor, says, some voters see an indictment as almost tantamount to being found guilty, regardless of the presumption of innocence guaranteed defendants.

Among the examples of government indictments that generated controversy was the 1988 decision to prosecute Rep. Robert Garcia, D-N.Y., on bribery-extortion charges, announced two weeks after he was elected to a sixth term. Asked why the indictment wasn't brought before the election so voters could weigh the charges, the federal prosecutor, Rudolph Giuliani, later mayor of New York, responded that the timing was based entirely on legal, not political, considerations.

In 1978, Rep. Joshua Eilberg, D-Pa., was indicted two weeks before the general election on charges of receiving illegal compensation to help a hospital get a federal grant. Eilberg, who died in 2004, lost the election.

Asked why the indictment was brought so close to the election, then-U.S. Attorney Peter Vaira said: "We have one rule: Whenever an investigation is finished, we bring an indictment. To do otherwise would be unfair."

Last week, U.S. Magistrate John Facciola ordered the computer forensics firm of Stroz Friedberg LLC to begin searching computer images seized from Jefferson's office, instructing the firm to deliver computer documents to him on a "rolling basis" of no fewer than 1,500 pages, and not more than 1,700 pages. Some involved in the case expect that process to continue for two or three weeks.

Under a process established by a three-judge appellate court, Jefferson's attorneys would have 48 hours after getting all the material seized from his office to argue what documents they think should be denied to federal prosecutors.

If Chief District Court Judge Thomas Hogan rejects Jefferson's request, his ruling would likely set up another appellate hearing, although it's not certain it would hold up distribution of the documents federal prosecutors say they need to wrap up their investigation.

. . . . . .

Bruce Alpert can be reached at bruce.alpert@newhouse.com or (202) 383-7861.

Marlinga May Learn His Fate This Week (MACOMBD)

By Jameson Cook, Macomb Daily Staff Writer

Macomb (MI) Daily, September 24, 2006

Outcome of federal corruption trial hard to predict due to circumstantial nature

Whatever anyone thinks about the strength of the federal criminal case against Carl Marlinga won't matter this week as a jury will begin deliberating the former prosecutor's fate.

Advertisement

Predicting a jury verdict is difficult, especially in a circumstantial case such as this, according to experts.

"This isn't an open and shut case," said Lawrence Dubin, University of Detroit Mercy law professor. "You never know what a jury will do in a case."

Prominent Macomb County defense lawyer Stephen Rabaut said: "You don't know because even if the evidence points your way, if it doesn't pass the 'smell test,' it could go the other way. If there is a strong personality on the jury who is not on your side, then you're in trouble."

The 14-person jury, which will be whittled down to 12 for deliberations, will begin mulling Marlinga's fate late Monday or Tuesday in U.S. District Court in downtown Detroit, after Marlinga completes testifying in his defense.

Marlinga, 59, Macomb County prosecutor for 20 years until 2005, is charged with five counts in connection with supposedly exerting influence in two criminal cases his office handled in exchange for more than $30,000 in campaign contributions, as well as exceeding the limits of contributions. He faces a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison, if convicted.

Marlinga will continue testifying in his defense Monday morning under cross examination by U.S. Attorney Robert Cares, after beginning Wednesday (No trial took place Thursday and Friday). Attorneys for the U.S. Justice Department and Marlinga's defense will make their last-ditch arguments to jurors after Marlinga completes his testimony. Closing statements by both sides will take place on the same day.

Following instructions by Judge Victoria Roberts, the case will be out of the attorneys' hands and into the hands of the jury, which now consists of 10 women and four men.

During Wednesday's testimony, Marlinga staunchly defended his actions, saying that campaign contributions from people involved with criminal defendants in two cases for his failed bid for Congress in 2002 didn't influence his legal opinions. In one case, he said he didn't even provide enough influence to matter.

"Money would not make a difference. Money could not make a difference. Money would never make a difference," Marlinga said defiantly.

He insisted his fund-raising activities were legal, and any potentially illegal maneuvers designed to skirt campaigning finance laws were committed by others and unknown by him.

Dubin and Rabaut said Marlinga taking the stand in the trial should help him with the jury, although they agreed he should not have testified to the grand jury investigating the case in 2004 and 2005.

"A lot depends on his ability to explain what he did was within his ethical duty as a prosecutor," Dubin said.

Rabaut called his decision to go in front of the grand jury "ridiculous."

"All you can do is hurt yourself and open yourself up to contradiction," he said.

In fact, U.S. attorneys Cares and Jonathan Tukel during the trial have pointed out many passages of Marlinga's two grand jury appearances, displaying some long paragraphs on a large screen in the courtroom. They have pointed to some slight differences in his testimony.

"It's hard for any human being to be 100 percent consistent," Rabaut said. "You can be honest and not be 100 percent consistent."

Part of the case involves Marlinga providing favorable comments to the state Supreme Court for Jeffrey Moldowan of Warren, who was convicted in 1991 of rape, attempted murder and kidnapping for a 1990 incident that began in Warren. The high court ordered a new trial in 2002, and, in 2003, Moldowan, now 36, was acquitted by a Macomb County Circuit Court jury.

Marlinga received $4,000 in campaign contributions from Moldowan-advocate Ralph Roberts and his wife in 2001 and 2002 about the same time he drafted a legal brief that conceded Moldowan suffered "actual prejudice" in his original trial due to evidentiary problems.

Rabaut said that while the jury may be instructed not to consider the outcome of the Moldowan trial, it may do so, and it could cut either way. The jury may believe Marlinga's legal instincts in the end were justified and morally correct by the not guilty verdict, or the jury could conclude that Moldowan should not have been found not guilty.

Judge Roberts has said from the bench "I am not trying the Moldowan case" in this federal trial, but much of the case has been rehashed in detail by attorneys on both sides.

Marlinga also received more than $20,000 in contributions from criminal defendant James Hulet of St. Clair Shores, who was charged in 2001 with rape, drug delivery and gun possession, through his defense attorneys Dennis Johnston and Robert Leithauser and their family members. The government says Marlinga influenced the outcome of Hulet's case. He pleaded guilty to a lesser sexual contact charge and lesser drug charge, and was sentenced in January 2004 to two years in prison on the original gun charge, and is serving three additional years of probation.

As part of the more than $20,000 supplied by Hulet, Johnston donated $10,000 to the Michigan Democratic Party. In addition, Johnston gave $4,000 to state Sen. James Barcia, and Barcia's federal campaign committee and political action committee in turn gave $4,000 to Marlinga's campaign.

Marlinga is accused with one count of bribery in connection with the Moldowan case. Marlinga additionally is charged with bribery, lying to investigators, mail fraud and exceeding campaign contributions in connection with the Hulet case as well as the alleged "conduit" scheme with Barcia's campaign.

The alleged campaign contribution violation is a misdemeanor while the other offenses are felonies.

Roberts and Barcia originally also were indicted for their roles, but those charges were dropped.

Marlinga, a Democrat who raised $988,000 in his bid to beat Republican U.S. Rep. Candice Miller, who raised $1.6 million, lost the race in November 2002.

After leaving the prosecutor post, Marlinga, who lives with his wife, Barbara, in Sterling Heights, opened a law practice in a building on Elizabeth Road in Clinton Township, across the street from the Macomb County Sheriff's Office and Jail in Mount Clemens.

DOJ_NMG_0068447

Pursuit Of Death Penalty In Moonda Case Surprises Attorney (PPG)

By Milan Simonich, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 24, 2006

Prosecutors in Donna Moonda case say killing of her husband was greedy, premeditated crime

Bonnie Brown Heady kidnapped and murdered a 6-year-old boy. Ethel Rosenberg leaked atomic secrets to the Soviet Union.

The U.S. government executed them both in 1953. No woman has been put to death in a federal case since.

Given that history, Donna Moonda and her attorney did not expect prosecutors to seek the death penalty against her.

"I was surprised when they did," Roger Synenberg, Mrs. Moonda's attorney, said of the government's decision this month to pursue a capital case. "I didn't think this would happen."

Mrs. Moonda, 47, of Hermitage in Mercer County, is charged with hiring her 25-year-old lover to murder her husband.

She says she is innocent. Prosecutors say she is a cold, money-hungry killer who planned the murder of Dr. Gulam Moonda for six months.

Dr. Moonda 69, a urologist, died in front of his wife and mother-in-law on the Ohio Turnpike the evening of May 13, 2005. Damian Bradford, who was having an affair with Mrs. Moonda, shot the doctor dead. He says it was premeditated murder that was supposed to look like a highway robbery.

Mr. Bradford admits he killed because of greed, saying Donna Moonda promised him a seven-figure payoff. He said she expected to collect millions in inheritance and life insurance proceeds from her husband's death and told him he would receive half of the money.

The planning that went into the crime is one reason U.S. Attorney Gregory A. White, of the Northern District of Ohio, is seeking the death penalty against Mrs. Moonda.

Another factor is that Mrs. Moonda's mother, Dorothy Smouse, then 74 years old, was in the car with Dr. Moonda when Mr. Bradford shot him.

"She made her own mother a witness to murder, and placed her in the line of fire when she planned that her husband would be shot to death," Assistant U.S. Attorney Linda Barr said in a brief filed in the summer, when Mrs. Moonda was trying for bail.

Mr. Synenberg said he did not expect a capital case because the government reached a "sweetheart" plea bargain with Mr. Bradford. He could receive as little as 171/2 years in prison in return for his testimony against Mrs. Moonda.

"One issue that is supposed to be considered in death-penalty decisions is disparity of sentences," Mr. Synenberg said. "They gave the person who pulled the trigger 17 years and they want to put my client to death."

Mr. White declined to be interviewed, but he and his trial staff consider Mrs. Moonda the instigator of the plot. They believe Mr. Bradford, a small-time drug dealer in Beaver County before the murder, had no inclination to kill the doctor until she set the plan into motion.

Mr. Synenberg, though, has begun arguing that Mr. Bradford killed on his own, without any help from Donna Moonda.

"Bradford saw a sugar daddy," Mr. Synenberg said. "By killing him, he thought, he could get his hands on a lot of money."

Mr. Bradford and Mrs. Moonda met in 2004 in a Beaver County drug-rehabilitation center. He said he was addicted to cocaine. She had stolen the painkiller fentanyl from hospitals where she worked as a nurse anesthetist. The second drug case led to her firing and a criminal prosecution.

He said she told him she was 31 years old and married to a doctor in his 50s. In December 2004, Mr. Bradford said, she decided she wanted her husband dead.

By that time, he said, Mrs. Moonda was in the habit of giving him money and gifts. She smuggled him steroids from her husband's medical office to indulge Mr. Bradford's nascent interest in bodybuilding, he said.

Though Mr. White recommended a death-penalty prosecution against Mrs. Moonda, the final decision was made by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. He must authorize every capital case in the federal system.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington, D.C., said federal prosecutors had a record of diligence in capital cases.

"Money is spent to do these cases right," said Mr. Dieter, whose organization takes no moral stand on the death penalty, but monitors the fairness of state and federal prosecutions.

Today, 45 federal prisoners are on death row. One, Angela J. Johnson, is a woman.

She was sentenced in December for the 1993 murders of five people in Mason City, Iowa. The victims included two girls, ages 6 and 10.

DOJ_NMG_0068448

Iowa is one of 12 states that have no death penalty, but Ms. Johnson and her boyfriend, Dustin Honken, were prosecuted by the U.S. government.

A methamphetamine dealer, Mr. Honken also has been sentenced to death for the murders. Ms. Johnson, 41, says she had no knowledge of her boyfriend's plan to kill anyone. She has years of appeals ahead to press that claim.

That was not the case with the first woman executed by the federal government.

She was Mary Surratt, who was hanged July 7, 1865, for conspiring in the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln. Her execution came 83 days after the president's death.

Execution was even swifter for Bonnie Brown Heady. An alcoholic and a prostitute, she was smooth enough to escort 6-year-old Bobby Greenlease from his Kansas City, Mo., elementary school in September 1953 by falsely claiming to be his aunt.

Bobby's father was one of the wealthiest auto dealers in America. Ms. Heady and her boyfriend, Carl A. Hall, had been watching the Greenleases for months, intent on extorting money from them.

They shot Bobby in an Overland Park, Kan., field less than an hour after abducting him, then demanded a $600,000 ransom from his family, who assured the boy was alive.

Because Ms. Heady and Mr. Hall had crossed state lines in the crime, they were prosecuted by the federal government. They were executed Dec. 18, 1953, 81 days after Bobby's death.

Ms. Heady, 41 when she went to the gas chamber, died six months after Ethel Rosenberg. Mrs. Rosenberg, 37, and her husband, Julius, 35, were electrocuted after being convicted of espionage.

Theirs was perhaps the most publicized federal death-penalty case until Timothy McVeigh's. He was executed for killing 168 people in the Oklahoma City bombing of 1995.

A Quiet Bombshell In The Legal World (LAT)

By Robert Weisberg, Robert Weisberg Is A Professor Of Law At Stanford University And Director Of The Stanford Criminal J

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

A single high court decision puts mandatory sentencing laws in limbo.

VIRTUALLY every American knows about Miranda, the famous U.S. Supreme Court decision requiring police officers to inform suspects of their rights. But not even many lawyers know about Blakely vs. Washington. Yet this Supreme Court ruling in 2004 took its place alongside Miranda and others — including Gideon vs. Wainwright (which required states to provide a lawyer to indigent felony defendants) and Terry vs. Ohio (which allowed police to stop and frisk subjects without probable cause) — as a precedent that would change the course of American criminal justice.

Although the decision had its roots in a dry and abstract legal question, the case itself centered on a horrific crime. Ralph Blakely Jr., a rancher from the state of Washington, had kidnapped his estranged wife at knifepoint, bound her with duct tape and stuffed her into a box in his pickup truck. At sentencing, the trial judge concluded that Blakely had acted with "deliberate cruelty" — an "aggravating factor" expressly legislated under Washington's sentencing statute — and, as a result, sentenced Blakely to 90 months in prison instead of the standard 53 months.

But the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the sentence, saying that the 6th Amendment right to a jury trial prohibited judges from increasing criminal sentences on the basis of facts that had not been decided by a jury or confessed to by the defendant. Because a jury had not determined beyond a reasonable doubt that Blakely acted with "deliberate cruelty," the judge could not rely on that fact to increase the sentence. That may not sound like an enormous decision, but it proved revolutionary. Overnight, sentencing rules across the country were thrown into turmoil. Dozens of sentences — maybe hundreds — were called into question. If the decision were applied retroactively, how many felons might challenge their sentences?

As many predicted when the Blakely ruling was handed down, the next shoe to drop involved the federal sentencing guidelines for criminal trials — a massively complex and controversial structure created in the 1980s. Last year, the Supreme Court ruled that this vast system of rules also violated the decision in Blakely. The result, for the last two years, has been a state of suspended animation for federal sentencing. Although the justices didn't wipe the federal sentencing guidelines off the books, they ruled that, henceforth, the guidelines must be considered "advisory" rather than mandatory.

As the court enters its new session next week, it continues to face the consequences (perhaps unintended) of its watershed Blakely decision.

For instance, in Cunningham vs. California, which is to be argued Oct. 11, the court is being asked to decide whether California's sentencing laws violate Blakely. The case involves John Cunningham of Contra Costa County, who was convicted on charges of sexually abusing his son. Under California's sentencing rules, the judge was allowed to sentence him to a "lower," "medium" or "maximum" sentence. Because the judge thought that the "aggravating" factors outweighed the "mitigating" factors, he sentenced Cunningham to the maximum: 16 years. But because five out of six of those factors had not been determined by a jury, Cunningham has challenged the sentence, saying the California "triad" structure too closely resembles the unconstitutional Washington scheme. At stake is the California sentencing system.

DOJ_NMG_0068449

The other big question still facing the court in the wake of the Blakely decision involves not where the ruling applies but when. In Burton vs. Waddington, the court is being asked to decide whether Lonnie Lee Burton, convicted on charges of raping a 15-year-old boy in Indiana in 1991, can have his case reopened under the Blakely ruling.

The question is about the retroactivity of judicial decisions, a very esoteric area of the law. In theory, judges never "make" law but simply interpret or discern its meaning. So if the 6th Amendment means what the high court said in Blakely, it has always meant that, even if earlier judges didn't notice.

By that theory, all decisions ought to be applied retroactively. But if judges feared that refining or expanding laws would lead to the reopening of vast numbers of old cases, they might choose never to do so. So our legal system has created a strange compromise. Roughly put, a decision can be applied retroactively if it looks like a mere extension of an established rule — but not if it is the announcement of a new rule. It also can be applied retroactively if the rule seems absolutely fundamental to a fair trial, not a more technical rule.

So in deciding whether to apply Blakely retroactively, the court will tell us just how important or new it thinks its 2004 creation is after all. But this esoteric little piece of legal doctrine has already proved pretty powerful.

Two Former Restaurant Owners Sentenced To Jail For Bank Fraud (DEKDC)

DeKalb (IL) Daily Chronicle, September 24, 2006

ROCKFORD - The former owners of two DeKalb restaurants were sentenced Friday to time in a federal prison for bank fraud.

According to a press release from the Department of Justice, George Broches, 43, of DeKalb was sentenced to eight years and one month in prison without parole, and must pay $271,997.62 in restitution. His former business partner, Dimitrios Brotsis, 47, of Creston, was sentenced to one year in prison and $97,309.78 in restitution. The men were the owners of the Spring Garden Restaurant and Arcade Dreams Bar and Grill in DeKalb.

The men were indicted in April 2005 in a federal court in Rockford on charges of bank fraud. According to the Justice Department, Broches and Brotsis deposited bad checks into the bank accounts for the two businesses in January 2000, then withdrew money from the accounts before the bank realized the checks were worthless. They reportedly defrauded the bank out of more than $97,000 during the two-week period.

Broches also was convicted of making a false statement on a commercial loan application in 1999 and on a mortgage application in 2000, and of producing counterfeit credit cards and gift cards from 2002 to 2004 and using them to make purchases.

In a related case, Betty Broches, 38, of Sycamore pled guilty to making a false statement on a loan application and was sentenced to four years of probation, four years of electronic home monitoring and $45,000 in restitution. Her relationship to George Broches is not clear.

Brotsis and Betty Broches pled guilty to the charges on May 25, 2006, and George Broches pled guilty June 2.

The case was investigated by the Rockford division of the FBI and the Chicago division of the U.S. Secret Service, with help from DeKalb Police and the Ogle County Sheriff's Office.

Polygamy. (CHIT)

By Kirsten Scharnberg And Manya A. Brachear, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, September 24, 2006

(Utah's open little secret)

EAGLE MOUNTAIN, Utah -- The neighborhood looks like any other in the upper-middle-class suburbs: sprawling homes with porch swings and manicured lawns strewn with discarded kids' bikes.

But beneath the all-American veneer, much is different in this upscale subdivision 40 miles south of Salt Lake City.

"Pretty much everyone who lives here is polygamous," said Mary--a woman who gave a recent tour of the area and is herself the second wife of a Utah man. She, like other polygamists interviewed for this story, asked to be identified only by her first name for fear of prosecution. "There may be one or two houses that aren't, but virtually everyone else here is one of ours."

In the weeks since the arrest of Warren Jeffs, the fundamentalist Mormon leader who made the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list for allegations that he facilitated the rape and marriage of underage girls, there have been constant questions about the real pervasiveness and peril of polygamy in Utah.

Mainstream Mormons in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, with 12 million members worldwide, have asserted that all polygamous denominations--including Jeffs' Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints--are aberrations in a state where the influential Mormon Church suspended the practice of polygamy more than a century ago. But Utah's attorney general, pro-polygamy activists and other experts estimate there are 40,000 people living in polygamous families or communities like this one across the Western U.S.--with a large portion of them residing in suburban Utah.

Although it is rare that allegations of abuse are as systemic or egregious as those reported in the community led by Jeffs, virtually every other polygamous sect practicing in Utah today has been linked to financial, sexual or spiritual improprieties. Federal grand juries in Arizona and state investigators in Nevada are probing polygamist practices in those states, according to media reports.

Earlier this month, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), himself a Mormon, asked U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales to create a federal task force to investigate polygamy sects in the Western U.S., particularly Jeffs' church, a group in which girls as young as 13 are being married and hundreds of boys have been excommunicated and cut off from their parents in an alleged effort to reduce the elders' competition for wives. Still, in his letter, Reid's comments made clear he was referring to Utah's polygamy subculture in general as much as to Jeffs' community along the Utah-Arizona border.

"For too long, this outrageous activity has been disguised in the mask of religious freedom," he wrote. "But child abuse and human servitude have nothing to do with religious freedom and must not be tolerated."

Defending their faith

In the wake of such comments, Utah polygamists have come forward in unprecedented force to defend their faith, values and lifestyle. They say plural marriage fulfills the mission of all Mormons to be fruitful and multiply and to ascend to the highest reaches of heaven. They say it breaks their hearts that the mainstream church in 1890 abandoned polygamy--or what one expert called "the process of polishing the soul"--to appease the federal government and ensure Utah would earn statehood. They point to such communities as Eagle Mountain and Rocky Ridge, where polygamous families appear to be happy and prosperous, often with multiple wives of one husband living in palatial homes with adjoining yards.

"We're really sickeningly boring," said Jane, another wife to the same husband as Mary. "There is no high drama. We are the people next door--it's just that there are more of us."

During the 2004 campaign for Utah attorney general, polygamy was called the state's "dirty little secret," and candidates for the top law-enforcement position debated how best to deal with it. Mark Shurtleff won and has since implemented a policy to essentially leave polygamists alone unless they are committing other crimes simultaneously. Although the act of having more than one spouse is a felony punishable by up to 5 years in prison in Utah, authorities long ago stopped actively going after polygamists.

"We don't have the resources, nor do I think that we should use our resources, to convict every polygamist in Utah, put them in jail and put 20,000 kids into foster care," Shurtleff told a Canadian reporter recently when asked the state's approach to cracking down on polygamy. "What we're focusing on are crimes against women and children and tax fraud and other crimes involving misuse of public money."

Indeed, long before Jeffs was arrested on a highway outside Las Vegas, those crimes have been evident. For example:

The True and Living Church of Jesus Christ of Saints of the Last Days was the subject of much criticism when a young woman fled the community and went to authorities alleging she had been coerced into marrying her stepfather after years of being told she would burn in hell otherwise, according to a book detailing the case. Utah's attorney general chose not to prosecute the man, a charismatic preacher who has claimed to be the reincarnated Mormon prophet Joseph Smith, because the woman was 20 years old and deemed a consenting adult.

The Apostolic United Brethren, a polygamous community in Utah with 7,500 members, a beautiful suburban complex with athletic fields, an outdoor dance pavilion and a private school, was found in court to have bilked a wealthy member out of more than $1.5 million, and a judge ruled the sect and its leaders had to return it.

In the Davis County Cooperative Society, a polygamous community north of Salt Lake City, the leading family, the Kingstons, has been said by state prosecutors to have assets worth well over $150 million. Yet court testimony in a recent child-abuse and custody case revealed that one of the community's patriarchs argued he could not pay the monthly child support ordered by a judge for the children of one of his several wives. Another of the family's leaders was convicted in 1999 of felony incest for taking his 16-year-old niece as his 15th wife.

Yet even the most vocal critics are careful not to allege that every polygamist is guilty of such abuses.

"Listen," said John Llewellyn, one of the leading polygamy critics in Utah today. "I'm a former law-enforcement officer, a former polygamist and now someone who's working against polygamy. I've seen this from every side. And the bottom line is that there are a lot of polygamists out there who are good, honest people. There are, unfortunately, that many--or more--who are out there perpetuating every kind of horrible abuse you can't even imagine."

DOJ_NMG_0068451

The Apostolic United Brethren community, whose members are scattered throughout Salt Lake City suburbs such as Eagle Mountain, is largely considered by authorities and even several polygamy critics like Llewellyn to be a group in which abuse is neither rampant nor tolerated.

`The highest heaven'

Charles, 41, a computer programmer with three wives and 14 children, lives in central Utah and says he simply wants to carry out God's plan. He and his first wife joined the Apostolic United Brethren, or AUB, and later he took second and third wives, Jeni and Alorah.

"We believe the purpose of plural marriage is to bring spirits here waiting to be born into good families that will teach them the gospel," he said. "A lot of people around here want to live plural marriage so they make it to the highest heaven. When I see what the savior has done for me, you just want to pay him back and do what he says."

But it's not for every fundamentalist Mormon. Charles' third wife, Alorah, said her mother was the third of four wives and still her decision to enter into plural marriage required intense prayer.

"There's a saying that is kind of common among the girls in this group, that if you can have 10 percent of a 100 percent man, instead of 100 percent of a 10 percent man, then what would you choose?"

Over the decades, polygamous communities have burgeoned statewide--and continue to do so because polygamists have such large families.

Mary and Jane are both married to one AUB community member, a middle-age man who is something of a real-life equivalent of Bill Henrickson, the character in HBO's series "Big Love" who lives in the Salt Lake City suburbs with his three wives, seven kids and ever-mounting bills.

Over dinner at a suburban seafood restaurant, Jane and Mary jointly make fun of their husband while he good-naturedly laughs at their quips. The women brush off questions about jealousy between them by saying he isn't worth fighting over, but they later expound on the Mormon principle of building large families on Earth that later can be replicated in heaven.

The family explains the mechanics of their lives: The two wives have houses next door to one another. (Jane jokingly complains that Mary has the better lawn.) The husband, who asked not to be identified, spends three nights each week with each wife and family; they rotate every other week on who gets the fourth night.

The family grows somber when they discuss allegations that abuses are inexorably linked to polygamy. They go to pains to say their community strongly discourages marrying before the age of 18. Mary is visibly proud when she tells that one of her sons discovered a man in the community was abusing an underage girl and went to police with the information.

"Bottom line," she says, "if you wake up a 13-year-old girl in the middle of the night and marry her off to a man 20 years older than her, that's abuse. Absolutely."

It's families like these that polygamy advocates hold up when they make their most frequent argument: decriminalization. They say that if the fear of prosecution is removed, polygamous groups could stop living in seclusion and secrecy, the very conditions that often enable many of the alleged abuses. Even more, they would then feel less fear about going to authorities to turn in abusers within their ranks.

"It would be all about going after the crimes, not the culture," said Anne Wilde, a former plural wife who now is widowed and the co-director of Principle Voices, a pro-polygamy group.

Yet anti-polygamy activists are equally adamant that the culture invariably leads to problems. At minimum, they say, women are marginalized by a religious doctrine that turns them into a modern harem for their husbands. They tell of marriages in which the husband had more children than he could ever hope to support, thus leaving wives to scrape by as best they could on welfare. But worse, they say, is that the culture has a long tradition of physical abuse, rape, incest and underage marriage that endures.

"I've lived that life," said Vicky Prunty, a co-director of Tapestry Against Polygamy, the state's most vocal anti-polygamy group. "Anyone who tells you women are not being hurt there--forced into allowing their husbands to take on other wives in the name of religion, getting married too young to men much older, being hit or worse--[is] not being truthful."

Elaine Tyler, a volunteer at The HOPE Organization, a group geared toward helping those who have left polygamous communities, has seen firsthand the effects a polygamous lifestyle has on some of its members.

Tyler has met dozens of women, many of whom were forcibly married to much older men long before their 16th birthday, the legal age for marriage in Utah. Many also said they were abused by family members in the Jeffs communities of Colorado City, Ariz., and Hildale, Utah, where incest has become so widespread that the group has what are believed to be the world's highest rates of fumarase deficiency, a rare genetic disease that causes profound mental retardation.

"The abuses are shocking," Tyler said. "Most of the women to emerge from these communities have no idea how unacceptable what has happened to them is. If all they've ever seen is their sister in bed next to them getting molested, then when it starts happening to them they don't think, `Hey, this is wrong.' They think, `Now it's my turn.'"

DOJ_NMG_0068452

Reluctant witnesses

In fact, getting witnesses to testify to abuses is always the hardest part of polygamy prosecutions. Llewellyn, a former lieutenant in the Salt Lake County Sheriff's Office who secretly took three wives himself before becoming an outspoken polygamy author and critic, said one of the key reasons he disavowed the lifestyle was seeing how polygamous communities routinely refused to testify against those within their fold who were committing crimes.

"I guess what I hope now is that I can pay back for some of the things I've done and been a part of," said Llewellyn, who wrote "Polygamy's Rape of Rachel Strong," a book that chronicled the life of a young woman who left a heavy-handed polygamous community, but only after being pressured into marrying her middle-age stepfather. Llewellyn argues in the book that Strong's stepfather, well-known Utah polygamist James Harmston, forced her into marriage and sex through a campaign of spiritual coercion as "effective as putting a gun to her head." Harmston has called Strong mentally ill and denied having forced her into the marriage.

On a recent Friday evening, as the fall chill began to creep into the mountain air, teenagers from a polygamous community on the outskirts of Salt Lake City gathered for a barn dance.

Erin Thompson, 15, typified the youth of the community who were there: bright, polite, optimistic. She spoke of her plans to attend college, perhaps become a dentist. Looking further ahead, she spoke of marriage and children, and, without hesitation, said she hoped to be a plural wife. She said she felt a religious calling to do so and believed that having to share a husband would teach her about sacrifice and prevent her from making him the center of her universe.

"Bad things happen in every community, whether they are polygamous or not," she said. "I know that. But I believe that this lifestyle can bring more blessings than you can imagine if it is lived correctly, and I understand that if it is lived wrongly it can bring that same amount of pain."

---

kscharnberg@tribune.com
mbrachear@tribune.com

CIVIL LAW:

To Build A Better Fraud Trap (STPPP)

By Julie Forster

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 24, 2006

With insurers paying out billions of dollars in bogus claims each year, UnitedHealth figured there had to be a better way to identify medical fraud. So over a year ago, fraud investigators at Ingenix, a division of UnitedHealth Group, were told to do something bold.

The result: Ingenix took a page from the credit card industry, developing an analytical tool that helps predict fraud. Ingenix is hoping the technology — now in testing — will work so well that other insurers will be interested in buying it.

Ingenix has company in pursuing the better fraud trap. Fair Isaac, the Minneapolis-based firm well-known in the banking business for its credit card scoring model, has been pushing its own fraud-detection system for more than three years. Though each company says its technology is better than the other's, both agree that fraud is one driver of skyrocketing health care costs.

Estimates of the money lost to health care fraud range widely, from 3 percent of annual health care spending — or some $60 billion — to more than $170 billion. The U.S. General Accounting Office in a 1996 report on health care fraud, noted: "The amount of fraud within the health care system is, by its nature, impossible to accurately detect."

"No one really knows how much fraud is out there," acknowledged Christopher Dorn, director of anti-fraud and recovery solutions for Eden Prairie-based Ingenix. Even so, based on the 3 percent estimate, Dorn claims that Ingenix can identify and save an insurer about half of that.

Squeezing fraud out of the system has taken on new urgency in an era when insurers are having a tougher time increasing premiums. For UnitedHealth Group, that includes its insurance business unit, which is called UnitedHealthcare.

Companies like Ingenix are using computers to sift through massive amounts of data and spot subtle aberrant patterns. Using sophisticated software, the company's real-life experience and its millions of medical histories and records, Ingenix contends that it can tabulate a health care fraud "score." "Cases with a high score are an indication for us to start an investigation," Dorn said.

While this fraud score is derived from potentially thousands of variables, common ones include the distance between a patient's home and where services were allegedly rendered or the incidence of patients being treated after-hours and on holidays.

DOJ_NMG_0068453

Most insurers have some capacity to identify billing errors, fraud and abuse. The problem is, most fraud is detected after the claim has been paid. At that point, it's difficult and costly to recover the money. If any money is recovered, it's typically dimes on the dollar. Industry officials agree: a "prevent-and-save versus a pay-and-chase approach" is more effective.

The technology is basically a computer model that acts like a human brain in learning to spot fraud. It's not easy. The billing system physicians use to get reimbursed from insurers requires thousands of codes.

Interpreting those codes is complex. While that leaves opportunity for manipulation, it also leaves a lot of room for innocent billing errors or just differences in interpretation between two groups of people with different goals — the insurers, which are often public companies, and the physicians.

"It's really pretty gray and that grayness creates tension around the relationship between providers and payers," said Roy Sailor, Ingenix's senior vice president, payer solutions.

While doctors are as quick as anybody to criticize fraud, they also have concerns about the new brand of fraud-fighting software. "We think a big distinction needs to be made between intentional acts to defraud from inadvertent billing errors or legitimate differences in medical interpretation," said Dr. Edward Hill, a Tupelo, Miss., physician and past president of the American Medical Association. "This is a very complex area where opinions even among physicians will differ a great many times. Doctors feel intimidated by health insurers that use this kind of mechanism to almost be accusing of doctors of committing a fraud."

At Ingenix headquarters in Eden Prairie, 220 doctors, nurses, mathematicians, lawyers, former law-enforcement officers and others work to detect scams and abuse. The company is working with ID Analytics, an identify-fraud company based in San Diego, to develop the technology.

It is testing the technology on four clients. The millions of claims they generate are assessed and given a score, much like a so-called FICO score that is used to judge a person's creditworthiness. (Fair Isaac developed the FICO score years ago.)

Health care fraud is widespread because the opportunities for profit are great. Brokers, health-plan employees, hospitals, doctors and health-plan members all have the ability to commit wrongdoing. In fact, two years ago UnitedHealthcare agreed to pay the government $3.5 million to settle allegations that the company defrauded the Medicare program, according to the U.S. Justice Department. The company did not admit wrongdoing.

Increasingly, these schemes are being pulled off by organized crime groups, according to the FBI, the primary investigative agency against health care fraud in both public and private health insurance programs.

The big challenge is accurately determining which claims should have a harder look, said Louis Saccoccio, executive director of the National Health Care Anti-Fraud Association in Washington D.C.

Many states have laws requiring insurers to pay providers speedily after the claim is filed. Unless there is evidence of fraud — and that exception is tightly defined — Saccoccio says, claims must be paid promptly. "You cannot hold back large numbers of claims simply because you suspect fraud."

That's important, particularly given the wide and ever-evolving number of schemes. Fraud can run the gamut from physicians filing a claim for service not provided to multimillion-dollar scams.

One scam, involving scores of patients at a Southern California outpatient surgery centers, generated more than $1 billion in claims nationally. The patients were recruited to undergo unnecessary medical services in return for cash or cosmetic surgery. Close to $500 million in claims were reportedly paid. UnitedHealth was one of the first insurers to notice a strange pattern in the claims it processed and notified the FBI.

In some of those cases, recruiters who worked in factories were paid to recruit their co-workers to earn money in exchange for a medical procedure. Patients from across the country — including Minnesota — were flown to Southern California to have needless endoscopies and colonoscopies; procedures that normally are billed at about $5,000. UnitedHealthcare was charged $50,000 and $70,000 per procedure, according to Ingenix.

The scam continually morphed into new forms of fraud. One involved groups of minorities — including hundreds of Hmong in St. Paul — who were targeted for sweaty palm surgery. Recruiters would talk low-income workers into a weekend trip to California for surgery in exchange for a kickback in the hundreds of dollars, Ingenix investigators said.

Ferreting out intentional crime from a legitimate mistake or simply a difference in opinion between a doctor and insurer is not always black and white. Robin Mathias, a health care fraud consultant based in Santa Rosa, Calif., noted that while it is cutting edge, the technology is not as clear-cut when used to find health care fraud as it is in finding fraud in the credit card industry.

For one thing, it may be very limited in the type of fraud it can detect. "Predictive modeling is a great advance but it is still limited in the context of health care fraud detection," Mathias said.

Fair Isaac started using a tool similar to what Ingenix is developing with ID Analytics more than three years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0068454

Fair Isaac, the king of the FICO score, is definitely the "gold standard" said Bryan Boda, director of health care solutions for Fair Isaac. He said whether Ingenix's product will be viable competition is hard to say. "Based on what I've heard, it sounds like they are trying to tap into a market that Fair Isaac has made," he said. "If they are successful at developing a product, than they would be trying to compete for that business."

Fair Isaac is busy signing up insurance companies to use its product. Boda declined to specify how many clients it has using the new technology or the amount of revenue generated by the product.

The challenge in developing the tool is to create something that is accurately detecting fraud against huge volume. At least until Ingenix actually rolls out its product, Boda says Fair Isaac is alone in its niche.

"No one else," Boda said, "has proven ability to solve that problem."

Julie Forster can be reached at jforster@pioneerpress.com or 651-228-5189.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

KC Grapples With Peril Of Slavery (KCS)

By Tony Rizzo

The Kansas City Star, September 24, 2006

Slavery.

It's a cruel reality for hundreds of thousands of men, women and children around the world.

And, as Kansas City learned last week, it's even here.

Eight young men from Russia were duped into driving ice cream trucks for up to 14 hours a day, seven days a week, for meager pay, federal prosecutors said. The case came three months after a Kansas City man was charged with forcing three teenage girls — two of them 13 — to work as prostitutes.

Those local cases involve the two most pervasive forms of modern slavery: Forced labor and sexual trafficking.

"I think most people see it as a problem in the Third World," said Bradley Schlozman, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri. "It's right here in our backyard."

Federal prosecutors earlier this summer established a local human trafficking task force similar to those operating in about two dozen other American cities, and it didn't take long for the streets of Kansas City to provide the first case.

"How could it not be in Kansas City? I've seen it everywhere else," Schlozman said. "This is one of the most evil crimes imaginable, exploiting the most vulnerable members of society."

Since Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000, it has been used to prosecute dozens of cases. About two-thirds have involved the sex industry.

A photograph from one of those cases haunted Schlozman. It showed the place in Florida where traffickers from Mexico kept a girl in virtual bondage.

She was 14 and far away from home, childhood a long-ago memory. She lived and worked in a space the size of a bathroom stall. Her job was to sexually service as many as 30 men a day. When her work was done she slept on the same bed.

On a small table next to the bed was a roll of paper towels and the girl's only possession — a teddy bear.

"It absolutely breaks your heart," Schlozman said.

Government officials estimate that 800,000 men, women and children are trafficked across international borders each year and forced to work in sweat shops, farm fields and brothels. As many as 17,500 people are trafficked into the United States annually, according to the Department of Justice.

"They might not have shackles, but slavery is the only way to describe their treatment," said Mark Taylor of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

Last year, the U.S. government declared 230 people from more than 30 countries as human trafficking victims eligible to receive benefits comparable to political refugees. About half of the victims have received special visas that allow them to remain in the United States.

Forced labor

That process is now ongoing for the eight Russians in the ice cream case. Prosecutors are working with private social-service agencies to care for the college-age men, and citizens have contacted Schlozman's office to offer help.

Five people were indicted by a federal grand jury last week for allegedly using threats and coercion to force the Russian students to work in Kansas City this summer.

Despite the unique aspects of the case involving ice cream trucks and Russians brought to the Midwest, Taylor from the State Department said the allegations shared common denominators with typical trafficking cases.

DOJ_NMG_0068455

According to the indictment, the students were recruited in their home country and were lied to about the work they would be doing and the amount of money they would earn. They each paid $2,500 for the program, which allowed them to enter the United States on legal work visas.

Once here, their passports and other documents were confiscated. They were isolated and prevented from contacting their families and warned that if they contacted authorities they would be arrested, deported and forbidden from ever returning to the United States.

Schlozman said he could not discuss the specifics of the case but said traffickers typically preyed on unsophisticated individuals who were unfamiliar with American laws and customs.

Often they come from countries where law enforcement corruption is pervasive and they distrust the police.

"The victims suffer extraordinary psychological abuse, emotional trauma and they often feel like they don't have anywhere to turn," Schlozman said.

The trauma is exacerbated in many of the sex trafficking cases because the victims are often minors.

"That is where we need to have the spotlight," said Kristy Childs, founder of Veronica's Voice, a Kansas City group that helps the victims of prostitution. "We have American girls that are being trafficked."

Most of the woman Childs tries to help are adults, but most said they were minors when they were introduced into prostitution. Under the federal law, prostituting minors is considered to be trafficking even if no coercion is involved.

Harsh life

A prostitute's lifestyle can be brutal, especially for a teenager.

Drugs, robberies, sexually transmitted diseases, car thefts and assaults are common baggage of the prostitution business, said Sgt. Brad Dumit of the Kansas City Police Department's vice section.

"These girls are abused emotionally, physically and spiritually," Dumit said. "It's a scary, scary lifestyle."

Take the case of J.G. She was 15 when she was recruited into the "stable" of a Kansas City man now jailed on multiple charges of promoting prostitution. He was charged in Jackson County Circuit Court before the federal trafficking task force was established.

According to court documents, he kept all the money she earned. In exchange she got a place to sleep, clothes, food and all the crack cocaine she could smoke. Once she tried to secretly keep some of her money. When he found out he punched her in the face and tore out her eyebrow ring.

Kansas City's first human trafficking case involved three area sisters who ran away from home. The twins were 13 and their older sibling was 15.

Federal prosecutors said Don L. Elbert II, who pleaded not guilty and faces trial later this year, took it from there when he spotted them outside a liquor store.

According to prosecutors:

Elbert fed them, dressed them and gave them a place to stay. He also employed them.

Seven nights a week for about a month he dropped them off on a busy corner where they had unprotected sex with strangers for money, all of which they turned over to Elbert.

The scheme unraveled when one of the girls was arrested June 21 after making a deal with an undercover police officer to provide oral sex for $20.

Schlozman likens human traffickers to an "evil employment agency."

"They are unscrupulous individuals who treat their workers like chattel," he said. "It's all about making a profit, and whoever suffers is no concern whatsoever."

Despite the increased attention to the problem, Taylor said the true scope was not known.

"By its very nature it's hidden," he said. "Traffickers are extremely innovative at luring people into a trap for their economic gain."

The Kansas City cases show that the problem can crop up anywhere and take any form.

"The true outer limits have yet to be defined," he said.

Finding help

The Justice Department operates a toll-free hot line to report suspicions of human trafficking or for victims seeking help: 1-(888) 428-7581

Shooting By Police Called 'Murder' (STPPP)

By Aron Kahn

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, September 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068456

Black community leaders and relatives of Dominic Aries Felder on Friday accused Minneapolis police of murdering the allegedly emotionally disturbed man and intending to "whitewash" the probe of two officers involved in the incident.

"The police department messed up," the Rev. Devin Miller, pastor of Emmanuel Tabernacle Church in Minneapolis, said of Wednesday night's fatal skirmish. "There was no reason for the shooting, and we firmly believe they intended to shoot him to death."

The leaders said they could not trust the department to objectively investigate the case and will ask U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Monday to take control of the matter.

"Let this not be just another shooting," said Miller, a St. Paul resident and member of the God Squad, a group of ministers and laymen who try to bridge the gap between the police and citizens in St. Paul. "This is the fork in the road."

Minneapolis police on Friday continued to withhold all details of the incident, in which an officer's gun was fired seven times. The incident began with a report of a domestic dispute at Bloomington Avenue South near East 40th Street, in which the 27-year-old Felder was threatening to kill people, police said.

Two officers involved in the shooting were placed on administrative leave pending a review of the incident — standard procedure in such cases. The officers are Lawrence Loonsfoot and Jason King, both of whom joined the department in 1993.

No other gun was found at the shooting scene, leading relatives and community leaders to believe police acted with unnecessary force in killing Felder.

"We recognize that this is a very painful time for Dominic Felder's family," interim Police Chief Tim Dolan said in a statement Friday. "We recognize that it may be difficult for the family to wait for the completion of the investigation before they have all of the answers, but it is important that we are confident that any information we release is completely accurate."

But surrounded by two dozen of Felder's relatives and friends, Miller and community leaders Ron Edwards and Spike Moss said at a news conference that police totally mishandled the matter, which began with a 911 call.

Edwards, a member of the city's Police Community Relations Council, said police should have sent members of a critical incident team because the 911 caller had told them Felder had severe emotional problems.

Miller, who is the grandfather of one of Felder's children, said in an interview that Felder was suffering from undiagnosed, untreated depression and that he felt pressured by financial and family circumstances.

Felder lived in Minneapolis with Tiana Williams and their 5-year-old daughter, but that night he had difficulty reaching his other child, an 8-year-old girl who lived with her mother in St. Paul, Miller said.

"So he snapped," he said.

According to the police account Thursday, officers were told Felder was in an animated dispute with a resident, had threatened to kill neighbors and had smashed their front window with a 60-pound piece of concrete.

When the two officers arrived, Felder allegedly fled on foot, with the officers chasing him. A struggle ensued and one of the officer's guns fired seven rounds, police said.

Miller said there was no need to kill Felder, a small man who could be overpowered easily, and that the officers should be charged with "first-degree murder."

Relatives repeated that Felder had never been arrested, but the Pioneer Press reported Friday that he was convicted of fifth-degree misdemeanor assault last year in Apple Valley after being arrested on suspicion of "body-slamming" and then kicking a 21-year-old woman with whom he was living.

Edwards said the latest fatal shooting by police, the 15th in six years, should cause the City Council to delay approval of Dolan as chief, at least until the Felder matter is reconciled.

Mayor R.T. Rybak has recommended Dolan to replace Chief William McManus, who took the top police job in San Antonio in March. Dolan was assistant chief before then.

Aron Kahn can be reached at akahn@pioneerpress.com or 612-338-6516.

Faithful Take Turn In Political Pulpit (MJS)

By Bill Glauber

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, September 24, 2006

State marriage amendment divides religious

The battle over Wisconsin's marriage amendment isn't a simple political fight.

It's a struggle over values, too, an issue that bubbled for years in the statehouse and houses of worship, on the airwaves and in church pews. It likely will come to a boil in the closing weeks before the Nov. 7 election.

From sermons to lectures, DVDs and church bulletins, religious organizations and clergy are taking stands, a not-so-subtle intersection of religion and politics at the ballot box that in many ways is unprecedented in modern Wisconsin history.

DOJ_NMG_0068457

Catholic bishops and evangelical Christian pastors are allied with some mainline Protestants who support passage of an amendment to the state constitution to recognize marriage as "between one man and one woman."

On the other side are at least eight mainline Protestant denominational bodies, scores of clergy and many Jewish leaders who oppose the amendment in part because the referendum also would prohibit "a legal status identical or substantially similar to that of marriage for unmarried individuals."

The stakes couldn't be greater as the state debates same-sex marriage and civil unions.

In Wisconsin, both sides organized for months and, in some cases several years, to garner support in churches and synagogues. Although religious leaders might be divided over the amendment, they appear more united in opposition to another Nov. 7 ballot initiative, the advisory referendum to restore the death penalty.

"This is a culture war, that's what it is," said Julaine Appling, executive director of the Family Research Institute of Wisconsin, a pro-amendment group.

"How many churches have gone down the path of jettisoning the authority of Scripture?" she said. "The churches that still accept the authority of God's word accept marriage is only between a man and a woman."

The main group that opposes the marriage amendment, Fair Wisconsin, also is making a push in the religious community.

"It's important for us to mobilize clergy on our side, who say, 'We are Christian, we love our neighbors,' " said Joshua Freker, the Fair Wisconsin spokesman.

"Christian and Jews compelled to oppose the amendment because of their faith" presents a powerful message, Freker said.

In the "faith campaign," religious leaders and organizations representing 5,000 churches and 2 million congregants support the amendment, Appling said. Organizations representing 500,000 congregants have passed resolutions against the amendment, according to Fair Wisconsin.

Religion and politics have long mixed in America.

But throwing a religious organization's full weight behind a candidate, at least in modern times, is unusual because of one simple item - the tax code. Tax-exempt organizations, such as religious groups, can't endorse candidates. But they can engage in lobbying activities, which include referendums and constitutional amendments.

Of course, tax laws don't keep clergy from endorsing candidates. But they have to be clear they're speaking on their own behalf. Religious groups have taken stands on the issues of the day, from the abolition of slavery to civil rights, abortion to matters of war and peace. Multifaceted issue

Defining marriage, and weighing whether to extend rights to same-sex relationships involving gays and lesbians, is an issue that crosses political, religious and social lines.

It's also part of a decades-long conversation conducted in places of worship, sometimes uniting congregations, sometimes dividing them. At the outset, clergy and parishioners struggled with the issue of how welcoming congregations should be with gays and lesbians. The conversation then extended to the debate over the ordination of gay and lesbian ministers and rabbis.

Religious organizations and clergy entered the political fray that erupted after a 2003 Massachusetts court ruling to legalize same-sex marriage. Twenty states have adopted marriage amendments.

It shouldn't be a surprise to see a marriage amendment campaign target churches.

According to a recent national survey by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, 78% of white evangelical Protestants, 74% of black Protestants, 58% of white Catholics and 47% of white mainline Protestants oppose gay marriage. Among those who were identified as seculars, 63% supported gay marriage.

Civil unions were opposed by majorities of white evangelicals, black Protestants and those who attend church but favored among majorities of white mainline Protestants, Catholics and seculars, the poll found.

The bottom line: "People know where they stand on the issue," said Kimberly Conger, an Iowa State University political science professor who has published extensively on Christian conservatives. "It's a matter of getting supporters to the polls." Taking fight to the pews

Appling's group has distributed more than 5,000 copies of a DVD called "The Battle for Marriage in Wisconsin" to churches.

Amendment opponents also have gone through churches to gain support, often gathering at sanctuaries before door-knocking campaigns or informational meetings.

Religious leaders have not shied from the debate. In fact, many have welcomed the opportunity to speak out.

The state's Catholic bishops weighed this summer when they issued a letter of support for the amendment while also stating "support for this amendment does not imply or justify animosity toward any individual or group."

"We're teachers," Milwaukee Archbishop Timothy Dolan said in an interview. "We're best when we encourage, educate and exhort."

Parishioners don't want bishops "to tell them how to vote, and woe to us if we did," Dolan said.

DOJ_NMG_0068458

Dolan and the state's four other bishops began a letter during the winter on the marriage amendment, as well as the referendum on the death penalty, which they oppose, he said.

The bishops support the marriage amendment because "we feel as pastors we need to do anything we can to support and strengthen the pivotal institution of marriage," Dolan said.

He admitted that "we bishops find ourselves attacked by both sides."

"I don't mind that at all. We have people who are anti-gay, who say, 'You bishops are too soft on homosexuals, you keep telling us they need to be treated with dignity and respect and let's just say this is an abomination.' We say, 'Absolutely not.' A person's dignity is not dependent on their sexual orientation."

Dolan admitted the bishops also face criticism from those who oppose the amendment.

"I guess what we're saying, marriage is not a human right. It's a responsibility and a gift," he said.

Bishop Paul Stumme-Diers, leader of the Greater Milwaukee Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, also views the marriage amendment as a defining issue.

Only, he's opposed.

In 2005, the synod passed a resolution in opposition to the legislation. At this year's synod assembly, the group decided to have a conversation about the amendment, a symbolic and substantive move to discuss an important issue of the day that Stumme-Diers hopes is continued at individual churches.

"I hear great concern about the marriage amendment both in terms of the tenor that it takes and the climate it creates in our state," he said. "People are saying the church needs to speak to this so we will have a more healthy and tolerant spirit. I hear from people that they are disturbed that civil rights are potentially going to be curtailed through such a referendum."

Stumme-Diers said the teachings of Jesus show the need to be "attentive to those who are often left on the outside."

"We need to be especially mindful of those who are vulnerable and ostracized by society. Jesus is all about honoring relationships and trying to find honest and safe relationships. For some people, their orientation leads them in ways that makes us heterosexuals uncomfortable.

"My opposition to the marriage amendment is also about strengthening traditional marriage. I'm a strong advocate of monogamy and of people being committed to another person."

Officials Wary Of Electronic Voting Machines (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 23 — A growing number of state and local officials are getting cold feet about electronic voting technology, and many are making last-minute efforts to limit or reverse the rollout of new machines in the November elections.

Less than two months before voters head to the polls, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. of Maryland this week became the most recent official to raise concerns publicly. Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican, said he lacked confidence in the state's new $106 million electronic voting system and suggested a return to paper ballots.

Dozens of states have adopted electronic voting technology to comply with federal legislation in 2002 intended to phase out old-fashioned lever and punch-card machines after the "hanging chads" confusion of the 2000 presidential election.

But some election officials and voting experts say they fear that the new technology may have only swapped old problems for newer, more complicated ones. Their concerns became more urgent after widespread problems with the new technology were reported this year in primaries in Ohio, Arkansas, Illinois, Maryland and elsewhere.

This year, about one-third of all precincts nationwide are using the electronic voting technology for the first time, raising the chance of problems at the polls as workers struggle to adjust to the new system.

"I think there is good reason for concern headed into the midterm elections," said Richard F. Celeste, a Democrat and former Ohio governor who was co-chairman of a study of new machines for the National Research Council with Richard L. Thornburgh, a Republican and former governor of Pennsylvania.

"You have to train the poll workers," Mr. Celeste said, "especially since many of them are of a generation for whom this technology is a particular challenge. You need to have plans in place to relocate voters to another precinct if machines don't work, and I just don't know whether these steps have been taken."

Paperless touch-screen machines have been the biggest source of consternation, and with about 40 percent of registered voters nationally expected to cast their ballots on these machines in the midterm elections, many local officials fear that the lack of a paper trail will leave no way to verify votes in case of fraud or computer failure.

As a result, states are scrambling to make last-minute fixes before the technology has its biggest test in November, when voter turnout will be higher than in the primaries, many races will be close and the threat of litigation will be ever-present.

DOJ_NMG_0068459

"We have the real chance of recounts in the coming elections, and if you have differences between the paper trail and the electronic record, which number prevails?" said Richard L. Hasen, a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles and the author of the Election Law blog, www.electionlawblog.org.

Professor Hasen found that election challenges filed in court grew to 361 in 2004, up from 197 in 2000. "What you have coming up is the intersection of new technology and an unclear legal regime," he said.

Like Mr. Ehrlich, other state officials have decided on a late-hour change of course. In January, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico decided to reverse plans to use the touch-screen machines, opting instead to return to paper ballots with optical scanners. Last month, the Connecticut secretary of state, Susan Bysiewicz, decided to do the same.

"I didn't want my state to continue being an embarrassment like Ohio and Florida every four years," said Mr. Richardson, a Democrat, adding, "I also thought we needed to restore voter confidence, and that wasn't going to happen with the touch-screen machines."

In Pennsylvania, a state senator introduced a bill last week that would require every precinct to provide voters with the option to use paper ballots, which would involve printing extra absentee ballots and having them on site. A similar measure is being considered on the federal level.

In the last year or so, at least 27 states have adopted measures requiring a paper trail, which has often involved replacing paperless touch-screen machines with ones that have a printer attached.

But even the systems backed up by paper have problems. In a study released this month, the nonpartisan Election Science Institute found that about 10 percent of the paper ballots sampled from the May primary in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, were uncountable because printers had jammed and poll workers had loaded the paper in backward.

Lawsuits have been filed in Colorado, Arizona, California, Pennsylvania and Georgia seeking to prohibit the use of touch-screen machines.

Deborah L. Markowitz, the Vermont secretary of state and the president of the National Association of Secretaries of State, said that while there might be some problems in November, she expected them to be limited and isolated.

"The real story of the recent primary races was how few problems there were, considering how new this technology is," said Ms. Markowitz, a Democrat. "The failures we did see, like in Maryland, Ohio and Missouri, were small and most often from poll workers not being prepared."

Many states have installed the machines in the past year because of a federal deadline. If states wanted to take advantage of federal incentives offered by the Help America Vote Act, they had to upgrade their voting machines by 2006.

In the primary last week in Maryland, several counties reported machine-related problems, including computers that misidentified the party affiliations of voters, electronic voter registration lists that froze and voting-machine memory cards whose contents could not be electronically transmitted. In Montgomery County, election workers did not receive access cards to voting machines for the county's 238 precincts on time, forcing as many as 12,000 voters to use provisional paper ballots until they ran out.

"We had a bad experience in the primary that led to very long lines, which means people get discouraged and leave the polls without voting," said Governor Ehrlich, who is in a tight re-election race and has been accused by his critics of trying to use the voting issue to motivate his base. "We have hot races coming up in November and turnout will be high, so we can expect lines to be two or three times longer. If even a couple of these machines break down, we could be in serious trouble."

Problems during primaries elsewhere have been equally severe.

In the Illinois primary in March, Cook County officials delayed the results of the county board elections for a week because of human and mechanical problems at hundreds of sites with new voting machines made by Sequoia Voting Systems.

In the April primary in Tarrant County, Tex., machines made by Hart InterCivic counted some ballots as many as six times, recording 100,000 more votes than were cast. The problem was attributed to programming errors, not hacking.

In the past year, the Government Accountability Office, the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University and the Congressional Research Service have released reports raising concerns about the security of electronic machines.

Advocates of the new technology dispute the conclusions.

"Many of these are exaggerated accusations by a handful of vocal activists," said Mark Radke, director of marketing for Diebold Election Systems, one of the largest sellers of touch-screen machines. "But if you want to talk about fraud and tabulation error, the newer technology is far more accurate."

Mr. Radke cited a study from the California Institute of Technology that found that between the 2000 election, when touch-screen machines were not used, and the 2004 election, when they were, there was a 40 percent reduction in voter error in Maryland, making the vote there the most accurate in the country.

"There is always the potential for human error," Mr. Radke said, "but that is easily correctible."

But critics say bugs and hackers could corrupt the machines.

DOJ_NMG_0068460

A Princeton University study released this month on one of Diebold's machines — a model that Diebold says it no longer uses — found that hackers could easily tamper with electronic voting machines by installing a virus to disable the machines and change the vote totals.

Mr. Radke dismissed the concerns about hackers and bugs as most often based on unrealistic scenarios.

"We don't leave these machines sitting on a street corner," he said. "But in one of these cases, they gave the hackers complete and unfettered access to the machines."

Warren Stewart, legislative director for VoteTrustUSA, an advocacy group that has criticized electronic voting, said that after poll workers are trained to use the machines in the days before an election, many counties send the machines home with the workers. "That seems like pretty unfettered access to me," Mr. Stewart said.

The Big Gamble On Electronic Voting (NYT)

By Randall Stross

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

HANGING chads made it difficult to read voter intentions in 2000. Hotel minibar keys may do the same for the elections in November.

The mechanics of voting have undergone a major change since the imbroglio that engulfed presidential balloting in 2000. Embarrassed by an election that had to be settled by the Supreme Court, Congress passed the Help America Vote Act of 2002, which provided funds to improve voting equipment.

From 2003 to 2005, some $3 billion flew out of the federal purse for equipment purchases. Nothing said "state of the art" like a paperless voting machine that electronically records and tallies votes with the tap of a touch screen. Election Data Services, a political consulting firm that specializes in redistricting, estimates that about 40 percent of registered voters will use an electronic machine in the coming elections.

One brand of machine leads in market share by a sizable margin: the AccuVote, made by Diebold Election Systems. Two weeks ago, however, Diebold suffered one of the worst kinds of public embarrassment for a company that began in 1859 by making safes and vaults.

Edward W. Felten, a professor of computer science at Princeton, and his student collaborators conducted a demonstration with an AccuVote TS and noticed that the key to the machine's memory card slot appeared to be similar to one that a staff member had at home.

When he brought the key into the office and tried it, the door protecting the AccuVote's memory card slot swung open obligingly. Upon examination, the key turned out to be a standard industrial part used in simple locks for office furniture, computer cases, jukeboxes — and hotel minibars.

Once the memory card slot was accessible, how difficult would it be to introduce malicious software that could manipulate vote tallies? That is one of the questions that Professor Felten and two of his students, Ariel J. Feldman and J. Alex Haldeman, have been investigating. In the face of Diebold's refusal to let scientists test the AccuVote, the Princeton team got its hands on a machine only with the help of a third party.

Even before the researchers had made the serendipitous discovery about the minibar key, they had released a devastating critique of the AccuVote's security. For computer scientists, they supplied a technical paper; for the general public, they prepared an accompanying video. Their short answer to the question of the practicality of vote theft with the AccuVote: easily accomplished.

The researchers demonstrated the machine's vulnerability to an attack by means of code that can be introduced with a memory card. The program they devised does not tamper with the voting process. The machine records each vote as it should, and makes a backup copy, too.

Every 15 seconds or so, however, the rogue program checks the internal vote tallies, then adds and subtracts votes, as needed, to reach programmed targets; it also makes identical changes in the backup file. The alterations cannot be detected later because the total number of votes perfectly matches the total number of voters. At the end of the election day, the rogue program erases itself, leaving no trace.

On Sept. 13, when Princeton's Center for Information Technology Policy posted its findings, Diebold issued a press release that shrugged off the demonstration and analysis. It said Princeton's AccuVote machine was "two generations old" and "not used anywhere in the country."

I spoke last week with Professor Felten, who said he could not imagine how a newer version of the AccuVote's software could protect itself against this kind of attack. But he also said he would welcome the opportunity to test it. I called Diebold to see if it would lend Princeton a machine.

DOJ_NMG_0068461

Mark G. Radke, director for marketing at Diebold, said that the AccuVote machines were certified by state election officials and that no academic researcher would be permitted to test an AccuVote supplied by the company. "This is analogous to launching a nuclear missile," he said enigmatically, adding that Diebold had to restrict "access to the buttons."

I persisted. Suppose, I asked, that a test machine were placed in the custodial care of the United States Election Assistance Commission, a government agency. Mr. Radke demurred again, saying the company's critics were so focused on software that they "have no appreciation of physical security" that protects the machines from intrusion.

This same point was featured prominently in the company's press release that criticized the Princeton study, saying it "all but ignores physical security and election procedures." It is a criticism that collides with the facts on Page 5 of the Princeton study, where the authors provide step-by-step details of how to install the malicious software in the AccuVote.

Even before the minibar lineage of the AccuVote key had been discovered, the researchers had learned that the lock was easily circumvented: one of them could consistently pick it in less than 10 seconds.

If skeptics cannot believe what they read about the ease of manipulating an election, they can watch the 10-minute online video: the AccuVote lock is picked, a memory card is inserted and the malicious software is loaded; the machine is rebooted, and within 60 seconds the machine is ready to throw the election in favor of any specified candidate.

Computer scientists with expertise in security issues have been sounding alarms for years. David L. Dill at Stanford and Douglas W. Jones at the University of Iowa were among the first to alert the public to potential problems. But the possibility of vote theft by electronic means remained nothing more than a hypothesis — until the summer of 2003, when the code for the AccuVote's operating system was discovered on a Diebold server that was publicly accessible.

The code quickly made its way into researchers' hands. Suspected vulnerabilities were confirmed, and never-contemplated sloppiness was added to the list of concerns. At a computer security conference, the AccuVote's anatomy was analyzed closely by a team: Aviel D. Rubin, a computer science professor at Johns Hopkins; two junior associates, Tadayoshi Kohno and Adam Stubblefield; and Dan S. Wallach, an associate professor in computer science at Rice. They described how the AccuVote software design rendered the machine vulnerable to manipulation by smart cards. They found that the standard protections to prevent alteration of the internal code were missing; they characterized the system as "far below even the most minimal security standards."

Professor Rubin has just published a nontechnical memoir, "Brave New Ballot: The Battle to Safeguard Democracy in the Age of Electronic Voting" (Morgan Road Books), that describes how his quiet life was upended after he and his colleagues published their paper. He recalls in his book that Diebold's lawyers sent each of the paper's authors a letter threatening the possibility of legal action, warning them to "exercise caution" in interviews with the press lest they make a statement that would "appear designed to improperly impair and impede Diebold's existing and future business." Johns Hopkins rallied to his side, however, and the university's president, William R. Brody, commended him for being on the case.

Recently, there have been signs that states are having second thoughts about trusting their AccuVote equipment. Officials in California, Florida and Pennsylvania have been outspoken about their concerns. In Maryland earlier this year, the state House of Delegates voted 137 to 0 in favor of a bill to prohibit the use of its AccuVote machines because they were not equipped to generate a paper audit trail. (The state Senate did not take up the measure and it died.)

Professor Rubin favors the use of touch screens only for "ballot marking" — capturing a voter's intended choice — then printing out a paper ballot with only the voter's chosen candidates that the voter can visually check. Election officials can then use the slip to tally votes with an optical scanner made by a different manufacturer.

Manual audits of the tallies in at least 1 percent of all precincts, as is now required in California, would provide a transparent method of checking for integrity. Should a full recount be necessary, the paper ballots, containing only the selected names, provide unambiguous records of original intent.

"Let computers do what they do best," Professor Rubin said, "and let paper do what it does best."

Ohio's Forgotten Men (NYT)

By Dan Chaon

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Cleveland

OHIO is not a third-world country, but we're working on it. Last month the Census Bureau declared that Cleveland had finally achieved the status of poorest big city in America. Add in all the voting problems we've been having recently — who knows what we'll end up with in November? "I mean really," says my friend Tom from California. "If the U.N. can supervise elections in Kosovo, why can't they go to Cleveland?" He's joking, I think.

DOJ_NMG_0068462

Nevertheless, the big news all summer long was the botched May 2 primary in Cuyahoga County, with lurid tales of incompetent poll workers, disappearing memory cards and incompatible optical scan equipment. On the TV news, my wife and I watched as an elderly poll worker fed ballot paper into a machine, which then began, ruminatively, to grind it to bits.

By August, the county commissioners were gently suggesting that voters might want to use absentee ballots in November. Meanwhile, questions about the efficacy of Diebold touch-screen voting machines have slid from the realm of conspiracy theorists and into the mainstream press.

Still, the democratic process marches on, or at least hobbles forward. A lot of attention here in Ohio has focused on the governor's race, where the Democrat, the mild-mannered former minister Ted Strickland, is facing off against a love-him-or-loathe-him Republican, Ken Blackwell, our secretary of state.

Well-liked among religious conservatives, Mr. Blackwell has drawn criticism from Democrats for his dual role in the 2004 election as both the state's chief elections officer and the co-chairman of the Committee to Re-Elect George Bush in Ohio. More recently, he was challenged about his role in purchasing those Diebold touch-screen voting machines, particularly since it was discovered that he owned stock in Diebold at the time his office negotiated the deal. You have to admit, the man gives us a lot to talk about.

And so, it seems, there has been very little oxygen left in the room for the Senate race between Representative Sherrod Brown and the Republican incumbent, Mike DeWine. Though the race is tight, the campaign continues to move below the radar.

It was striking to me that everyone I talked to, from our kind-hearted Republican neighbors, Clyde and Dolly, to liberal college professors, to people waiting to catch a bus, had similar reactions. "I just don't hear people talking about it," said Jim Lentine, the proprietor of A Cut Above, a barbershop in University Heights. "People talk a lot about politics here, but that's not one of the subjects."

Mr. DeWine has been a senator for 12 years now, and Mr. Brown has been in Congress since 1993, but even with fewer than 60 days to go before the election, their names don't elicit a strong response. "To tell you the honest truth," says one well-dressed woman at Chuck's Diner in Cleveland Heights, "I don't know that much about them." However, a stern elderly man at the Sheetz gas station in North Ridgeville disagrees, telling me that the men are simply too familiar to Ohioans: "I can't imagine that anybody could be on the fence about either one of them."

The candidates haven't done much to raise their profiles. They apparently had a debate in early August, but the event wasn't open to the public — reporters only — and tapes of the encounter have not yet been released. So, down the stretch, Messrs. Brown and DeWine continue to politic in their modest fashions, touring around the state. Representative Brown speaks to workers at Denman Tire in Youngstown; Senator DeWine holds an ice cream social at his house in Cedarville. Mr. Brown addresses veterans at the Cincinnati Public Library; Mr. DeWine visits the Slovak Festival in Parma.

The candidates and their families go from town to town, smiling with babies, waving at crowds, sending out mass mailings and distributing bumper stickers. Still waiting, it seems, to make a distinct impression.

Pr. George's Voting Glitches Highlight Training Problems (WP)

By Eric Rich And Rosalind S. Helderman, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Errors in Primary Reflect Challenges of Technology

The widely publicized failure in Prince George's County to electronically transmit results from many polls after the Sept. 12 primary was compounded by a host of other errors, including failure to swiftly collect the data cards on which some votes are recorded and to properly secure voting machines.

The last of the cards were not retrieved and counted until nine days after the balloting -- several from inside electronic voting machines from a Landover precinct where Robert J. McGinley, the county elections board's attorney, said security procedures were "just blatantly not followed."

In some instances, machines containing cards were found in storage cases that lacked a required security seal. In others, tamper tape was missing from a locked door on the machine. In still others, data cards were found in machines on which doors were not locked.

Despite the roiling debate over whether electronic voting machines might be hacked into and an election stolen, the experience of Prince George's suggests a more mundane and probably widespread challenge in voting's digital age: Armies of minimally trained, modestly paid election workers are increasingly confronted with an unfamiliar, complex business.

Although the voting process was less dramatically flawed in Prince George's than in neighboring Montgomery County, the nearly two weeks since have seethed with suspicion and recrimination.

DOJ_NMG_0068463

The elections board disqualified none of the cards, but the lapses undercut assurances that officials offered after the primary. Robert J. Antonetti Sr., interim Prince George's election administrator, had said 47 uncounted cards would remain safe because of the multiple security measures.

Antonetti's predecessor, Robin Downs Colbert, who resigned in June because of frustration over the rapid changes in technology, said she and her colleagues in several other counties "knew this was where it was headed."

"We warned everyone," she said Friday. "We warned the county we didn't have enough resources. We warned the legislature that it was too much too fast. . . . People have to be trained to use technology, and we need enough time to do that."

Antonetti said that working the polls was once "a second job for tobacco farmers" but that today "we need more skilled people."

But skilled people can be hard to find when the pay for the day for even chief election judges is $200.

Other counties also tallied provisional and absentee ballots in the past week, but Prince George's was alone in having to find and upload so many data cards. Montgomery, for example, had collected the last of its data cards less than six hours after the polls closed, said Marjorie Roher, spokeswoman for that county's elections board.

"If we don't have a memory card from a precinct, then we utilize the Montgomery County police, and we go out and find that card," she said. "We don't close shop for the night until every memory card is in hand."

In Prince George's, questions swirled about the security of the missing cards. Hundreds of ballots -- perhaps more -- were not immediately counted because nearly two of every three precincts failed to transmit their results electronically the night of the primary.

Antonetti said the transmission problems may have stemmed from dialing errors or from using digital phone lines instead of the compatible analog lines -- mistakes he intends to address in training sessions before November.

Gertrude Neff, 72, the chief judge at the C. Elizabeth Rieg Special Center in Bowie, said workers realized soon after the polls closed that their transmission cable was too short to reach a phone jack that she said was at least eight feet up a gymnasium wall. Oliver Smith, a chief election judge in a Cheverly precinct, said that after a frustrating day with the electronic equipment, he ordered the cards delivered to the office without trying to transmit data electronically.

If two attempts to transmit were unsuccessful, election workers were under orders to carry the data cards to Upper Marlboro, where they could be uploaded directly.

Yet some memory cards were not delivered until the next day; others were left in voting machines, where they remained until the machines were returned days later.

Donna Edwards, who trailed Rep. Albert R. Wynn in the 4th District Democratic primary, highlighted the data cards as a problem when she announced that she was contemplating legal action. Defeated county executive challenger Rushern L. Baker III (D) has requested an investigation.

The slow count magnified other problems -- some shared by other counties -- that hampered voting Sept. 12 and have fueled suspicion since.

At the troubled Landover precinct, in Matthew Henson Elementary School, voting machines that had been improperly connected to power sources went dark for nearly an hour once their batteries were drained. There and elsewhere, newly acquired electronic poll books, which were used to check in voters, crashed repeatedly. At least 15 precincts opened late because technicians failed to show up.

Some of those technicians had been assigned to ferry the electronic registries to voting locations, but judges at those precincts arrived on election morning to find them missing. That is what happened at Buck Lodge Middle School in Adelphi, where chief judge Bashir Khan said the electronic registries had not arrived when voting was to begin at 7 a.m.

"Obviously, we were panicked," said Khan, 67. "People were lining up."

The equipment was not delivered until nearly 11 a.m., he said.

To plug the gaps in the technical staff, several workers on a county government technology help desk were dispatched to polling locations, said Dale Young, 44, one such worker. They had received no training on the voting machines and had not been instructed in the elaborate security procedures, he said.

Between 2 and 3 a.m. after the vote, with data cards from one-third of the precincts uploaded, election officials stopped compiling results, saying they were too tired to continue. Roher said Montgomery officials stayed until nearly 5 a.m., working until all were uploaded.

In the days that followed, a beleaguered Antonetti provided conflicting accounts on key points such as the location of the data cards and the number that had not been counted. Although Antonetti and board members said they were doing their best to inform the public, the varying accounts deepened concerns.

Still, elections board President S. John di Stefano defended Antonetti in an interview Thursday, saying that his long experience in the field -- including 30 years in Prince George's -- made him indispensable.

Antonetti, 70, retired from Prince George's in 2000 and took a similar job in Howard County. He retired from that position before the Prince George's board brought him back to replace Colbert when she left.

Di Stefano said the board was in a bind when Colbert quit but said he was pleased Antonetti returned. The board, he said, retains confidence in Antonetti. Di Stefano, 79, said he was not troubled by the fact that Antonetti was once fined $7,500 for giving his wife and four children, including two ages 9 and 11, temporary jobs, because it was not relevant to Antonetti's professional expertise.

"I would not, under any condition, want to go into an election without Mr. Antonetti," di Stefano said.

Di Stefano and Antonetti said their office has been chronically understaffed and underfunded even as the state has increased requirements and allowed less time to complete them.

Antonetti said three employees have quit in the past two months, leaving Prince George's eight full-time staffers to handle the crunch in the state's second-largest jurisdiction. Montgomery, by contrast, employs 25.

Both counties pledged to hire and retrain technicians and judges before the general election Nov. 7 -- and to fire those who performed poorly Sept. 12.

"Human error is going to be a factor in every election," said McGinley, the attorney for the Prince George's board. "Was this one we're proud of? No."

Staff writer Cheryl W. Thompson and staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

100 Years Later, A Painful Episode Is Observed At Last (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

ATLANTA, Sept. 23 — Two years ago, Saudia Muwwakkil, the director of communications for the Martin Luther King Jr. National Historic Site, invited community leaders to discuss how to mark the 100th anniversary of a 1906 race riot in which mobs of whites descended on the city's black residents.

The racial strife shut down Atlanta for four days and ended with the bodies of black men hanging from trees and streetlights. But of those Ms. Muwwakkil called, almost none had heard of it.

The riot, so contrary to Atlanta's conception of itself as the progressive, racially harmonious capital of the New South, had been erased from the city's consciousness, left out of timelines and textbooks.

Ms. Muwwakkil said she was not surprised by the response. "I'm an Atlanta native," she said, "and I had never learned anything about the riot. It wasn't taught."

But in the months leading up to the 100th anniversary this weekend, there has been a concerted effort to correct the city's amnesia, with walking tours, public art, memorial services, numerous articles and three new books. Genealogists have found a few descendants of those involved and located the marked tombstone of one victim. Next year, the riot will become part of the state's social studies curriculum.

The rioting began on Saturday, Sept. 22, 1906, with a surge of white hysteria fomented by segregationist politicians and, more immediately, wildly exaggerated newspaper articles of attacks on white women by black men. By the time the violence ended, at least two dozen blacks had been killed and scores more injured, some taken from their homes or pulled off streetcars.

Later accounts attributed the deaths of two whites to the rioting, one of them a pregnant woman who died of a heart attack when she saw two black men torn apart by bullets.

The violence made international headlines. But in Atlanta, newspapers played down the events, reassuring readers that the "Negroes" had been "disarmed and dispersed."

In recent years, the country has grappled with the racial episodes of its past in myriad ways, including front-page apologies by newspapers, truth commissions and criminal trials. If Atlanta is late in coming to the table, it is at least partly because of the way the city sees itself: as a place that has always offered an economic salve for racial tensions.

But the auditorium was full on Friday when Carole Merritt, a historian, stood and said, "The story of the riot has been too shameful to tell."

Ms. Merritt was participating in a symposium at Georgia State University, just blocks from the Five Points intersection downtown where the mob had first gathered. She has written a book about the Herndon family, whose patriarch, Alonzo Herndon, became Atlanta's first black millionaire. His Peachtree Street barber shop, elegantly appointed in mahogany and marble, was one of the rioters' first targets.

The city's self-image was under construction well before the riot. The black educator Booker T. Washington had offered his "Atlanta compromise," promising that blacks and whites could work together without social integration. The white newspaperman Henry W. Grady persuaded Northerners to invest in a tolerant, industrial New South.

DOJ_NMG_0068465

But in 1906, the city teemed with uneasy change, full of new residents who fit into unfamiliar categories: successful black business owners, college-educated blacks, the first generation of young black men not born into slavery. During the riot, three black corpses were tossed at the base of a statue of Mr. Grady.

Though the episode is commonly called the Atlanta Race Riot, some say the name is itself a whitewash, because the word riot implies unrest by a minority group.

"It's not a riot," said June Dobbs Butts, 78. "No, it was a massacre." Ms. Butts's father, John Wesley Dobbs, a civil rights leader, referred to the episode as "the Horror."

That first night, whites shot, beat or stabbed to death any black man they could catch. One victim was a lame bootblack, another a Western Union messenger. On Sunday, with most blacks huddled inside their homes, groups of whites went into black neighborhoods in search of more victims. Some blacks defended themselves with guns, driving away their attackers. On Monday, a white party entered Brownsville, a middle-class black neighborhood, and a shootout ensued, resulting in the death of a white county police officer named James Heard.

If the violence contradicted the city's self-image, the response was pure Atlanta. By Tuesday, white city officials had met with a hand-picked group of black leaders in an effort to restore order, beginning a tradition of interracial dialogue that became known as "the Atlanta way."

The process of forgetting began almost immediately. "Atlanta is herself again, business is restored, and the riot is forgotten," one newspaper headline declared two days later.

But the riot shaped the city in powerful ways. Scores of middle-class blacks left the city, and segregation grew more entrenched.

"Interracial cooperation was not equal," said Clarissa Myrick-Harris, a historian and member of the Coalition to Remember the 1906 Atlanta Race Riot, which planned this weekend's events. "It was another way of maintaining and asserting power over blacks."

"The white elite chose who they were going to meet with in the black community," Dr. Myrick-Harris said, and a class divide emerged. Whites blamed the lower classes, both black and white, for the violence, and some black leaders characterized blacks who fought back as threats.

The riot also weighed heavily against assimilationists like Booker T. Washington in favor of more radical black thinkers like W. E. B. DuBois, who thought federal intervention was needed to protect blacks.

"It disproved Washington's belief that if blacks worked hard, saved money and became respectable, then whites would recognize their interest in protecting them," said David Fort Godshalk, the author of a recent book about the riot.

The riot helped spur the formation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and was cited as a life-changing experience for people as diverse as Walter White, who became the head of that organization, and Margaret Mitchell, the author of "Gone With the Wind."

And its remembrance has brought a measure of pride to people like Pat Walker Bearden, who knew that her grandfather, Alexander Walker, had been in prison but only recently learned that it was because he had fired as Officer Heard approached his house. Mr. Walker had two small children and a pregnant wife. He was convicted in the officer's death.

Ms. Bearden said that while she was working on her family genealogy, she began to learn more about Mr. Walker from her father: "Dad would always start out saying, 'Papa didn't take no mess.' "

School Colors (NYT)

By Jeffrey Rosen

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

When it comes to America's always-sensitive politics of race and ethnicity, something of a tectonic shift has taken place. In just a few years, immigration has replaced affirmative action as the hot-button issue. With this fall's midterm election approaching, it's hard to imagine that race-baiting politicians will play to the fears of angry white males as Jesse Helms did in 1990, when he ran an ad showing the hands of a white man crumpling up a rejection letter after learning that a job was given to a "minority because of a racial quota." Instead, in a sign of the times, Vernon Robinson, a North Carolina Republican who is running for Congress and calls himself a "black Jesse Helms," recently ran an ad showing the hands of a black woman crumpling up a rejection letter after a job was given to an "illegal alien so they could pay him under the table."

If affirmative action is no longer the divisive matter it once was, some of the credit must go to the Supreme Court. In an important decision written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, the court held in 2003 that affirmative action in public-university admissions was constitutional because of the educational and social benefits of diverse classrooms. Meanwhile, the politics of affirmative action has changed. On the left, some influential African-Americans have been losing faith in the integrationist ideal and are becoming more interested in educational results — and school vouchers — than in racial head-counting. Meanwhile, on the right, some conservatives are recognizing that not all departures from colorblindness cause tangible harms.

DOJ_NMG_0068466

And yet the recent cease-fire and calm may be short-lived. In its new term, which begins on Oct. 2, the court has agreed to hear two major cases regarding the constitutionality of racial preferences in public elementary and high schools. Now that O'Connor has been replaced by Justice Samuel Alito, some liberals worry (and conservatives hope) that the end of affirmative action may once again be imminent.

The two Supreme Court cases arise out of Seattle and Jefferson County, Ky., where public elementary- and high-school students can choose, to different degrees, which school to attend. But to ensure that the schools reflect the racial balance of the school districts as a whole, administrators have used race to determine admission to the most popular schools. In both cases, parents sued when their children made an oversubscribed school their first choice and were turned down because of their race.

In its brief, the Bush administration urged the justices to draw an inflexible line: "race-conscious measures" designed to address "racial imbalance in communities or student bodies" are just as unconstitutional as the segregation struck down in Brown v. Board of Education. This extreme colorblind position, if the court adopted it, could affect as many as 1,000 districts in the country that have concluded that some racial balancing in admissions is the only way to maintain meaningful racial integration.

Although the Bush administration stops short of calling for the Supreme Court to overturn the 2003 decision allowing affirmative action in public universities, several other prominent conservatives — most notably the president's brother, Jeb Bush — have filed briefs begging the court to deliver the coup de grâce. In his brief, Governor Bush complains that the court's decision to recognize educational diversity as a constitutionally compelling goal has emboldened lower courts to uphold a host of racial-balancing programs. And especially at the K-12 level, Governor Bush and other conservatives argue, there is no clear evidence of a connection between racial diversity and educational achievement.

Not all Republicans see the harm of racial balancing in public schools in the same stark terms. Two highly respected Republican appellate judges, Alex Kozinski and Michael Boudin, voted to uphold racial-balancing plans in Seattle and Massachusetts. In separate opinions, Boudin and Kozinski claimed that unlike affirmative action in selective public universities, racial balancing in public schools doesn't seek to give one racial group an edge over another and doesn't stigmatize some students as less qualified than others. Moreover, as Kozinski suggested, there's something unseemly (and not very conservative) about unelected judges second-guessing locally elected officials on matters of educational policy.

Chief Justice John Roberts may be personally sympathetic to the Bush administration's colorblind argument: in a voting rights case last June, he tartly observed, "It's a sordid business, this divvying us up by race." Nevertheless, Roberts declared last spring that he would encourage his colleagues to decide cases on the narrowest possible grounds, in order to promote greater consensus on the court. If Roberts is serious about avoiding sweeping holdings, he might persuade his colleagues to converge around Kozinski's narrow position, which leaves open the possibility that racial balancing might be inappropriate in other contexts.

Of course, liberal and conservative activists who believe the court should resolve the most contested issues of American life would be disappointed by such a modest result. But the most politically effective Supreme Court decisions aim to calm partisan disagreements rather than inflame them. If Roberts succeeds in preventing the court from fracturing this term into antagonistic blocs, he will have achieved something truly impressive. And if he fails, the country as a whole may become even more polarized.

A Fight To Define Equality (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

DETROIT -- A feisty 29-year-old white woman and a pugnacious 67-year-old black man are performing two services this autumn for Michigan and the nation. Their Michigan Civil Rights Initiative (MCRI) is promoting colorblind government. And they are provoking remnants of the civil rights movement, which now is just a defender of a racial spoils system, to demonstrate its decadence, even thuggishness.

In November Michiganders will vote on this ballot initiative: "A proposal to amend the state constitution to ban affirmative action programs that give preferential treatment to groups or individuals based on their race, gender, color, ethnicity or national origin for public employment, education or contracting purposes." Almost identical measures were passed by referendums in California in 1996 and Washington state in 1998, in similar conditions to those here: They were opposed by both parties, all so-called civil rights organizations, most newspapers and many business leaders. What is different in Michigan is the involvement of a particularly nasty organization and an egregiously political judge.

At age 19, Jennifer Gratz, denied admission to the University of Michigan, fought the university all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court. It endorsed her argument that it was an unconstitutional denial of equal protection of the law for the university to add 20 points to the scores of black, Hispanic and Native American applicants. (The maximum score was 150; a perfect 1600 SAT earned just 12 points.)

DOJ_NMG_0068467

Ward Connerly is a California businessman and former member of the University of California Board of Regents. He propelled to victory the measures mandating colorblind government in California and Washington state.

With Gratz as its executive director and Connerly lending hard-earned expertise, MCRI collected 508,000 signatures, more than ever have been gathered for a Michigan initiative. In response, some opponents of MCRI have adopted four tactics, none of which involves arguing the merits of racial preferences and all of which attempt -- in the name of "civil rights," of course -- to prevent Michiganders from being allowed to vote on MCRI. The tactics have included:

Â· Pressuring signers of MCRI petitions to say they did not understand what they were signing. Some talk radio stations have broadcast the names of signers, and opponents of MCRI have gone to signers saying, "Did you know you signed a petition against equal opportunity?" Two who recanted their signatures, saying they had signed without reading the measure, are federal judges.

Â· Violently intimidating the state Board of Canvassers, which certifies that initiatives have qualified for the ballot. The Coalition to Defend Affirmative Action by Any Means Necessary (BAMN) disrupted the board's deliberations, shouting and overturning a table. Video of this can be seen at http://www.michigancivilrights.org .

Â· Asking a court to rule that MCRI committed "fraud" because many who signed the petition supposedly were confused -- the signers were presumably not competent to read and understand the initiative, the full text of which was printed at the top of each petition. A federal judge -- Arthur Tarnow, a Bill Clinton appointee -- sadly said he could not rule that way because, although he thinks MCRI is a fraud, whites as well as blacks were confused about it, and even if all signatures gathered in majority-black cities were invalidated, there still were enough signatures to qualify it for the ballot. So Tarnow contented himself with an extrajudicial smear of Gratz, charging that her "deception" had confused all Michigan voters, regardless of race.

Â· Michigan ballots are printed by counties, so BAMN says it is asking local officials to assert an extralegal "moral authority" to leave MCRI off the ballot.

Because the plain language of MCRI is appealing, some opponents argue that MCRI would have terrible "unintended consequences." It might, they say, eliminate single-sex public schools (Michigan has none; eight of 3,748 schools have a few voluntary single-sex classes) and breast-cancer screening or might stop a Department of Natural Resources program aimed at helping Michigan women become hunters (the initiative concerns only hiring, contracting and public schools).

Given the caliber of opposition arguments, it is no wonder a Detroit News poll published Sept. 15 shows MCRI with an 11-point lead. Gratz says that if her group is outspent "only" five to one -- Connerly was outspent that heavily while winning in Washington state -- MCRI will become Michigan law.

Anti-MCRI demonstrators chant, "They say Jim Crow, we say hell, no." So, the rancid residue of what once was the civil rights movement equates Jim Crow -- the system of enforced legal inferiority for blacks -- with opposition to treating blacks as wards of government, in need of infantilizing preferences, forever. To such Orwellian thinking, Gratz and Connerly -- and soon, perhaps, Michigan -- say: Hell, no.

georgewill@washpost.com

ANTITRUST:

So Small A Town, So Many Patent Suits (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

MARSHALL, TEX.

ON a crisp Monday morning earlier this month, about 20 lawyers from some of the country's top law firms shuffled their way into a brightly lit, wood-paneled federal courtroom in this small city in eastern Texas.

Wearing white shirts and dark suits, the lawyers congregated in small groups, leaning into one another with their arms crossed and speaking in hushed tones.

At precisely 8:30 a.m., a series of knocks on the right side of the courtroom signaled the entrance of Judge T. John Ward, a blur of black robe and white hair, who quickly took his seat and, with little preamble, began the proceedings.

Over the next few minutes, a 10-person jury listened raptly as lawyers for both sides laid out the case. Hyperion Solutions, a software company based in Santa Clara, Calif., accused the OutlookSoft Corporation of Stamford, Conn., of infringing two of its patents, causing $50 million in damages. A lawyer for OutlookSoft said the company did not steal any patented technology, adding that Hyperion's patents were not even valid.

DOJ_NMG_0068468

What was remarkable about the trial was not the issue being tried or the arguments proffered by each side, but that these big companies — like dozens more from the East and West Coasts — wound up in the Federal District Court here in Marshall, the self-proclaimed Pottery Capital of the World and home to the annual Fire Ant Festival (sponsored by Terminix, the pest-control company).

More patent lawsuits will be filed here this year than in federal district courts in San Francisco, Chicago, New York and Washington. Only the Central District of California, in Los Angeles, will handle more patent infringement cases.

On the surface, there is little to recommend Marshall as a locus for global corporations looking to duke it out over who owns the rights to important technology patents. Some 150 miles east of Dallas, and just minutes from the Louisiana border, Marshall and its 25,000 residents are fairly typical of most small cities in Texas. Marshall is a place where friendships last a lifetime and rivalries even longer, where residents still talk about the Civil War, debate on street corners about decades-old high school football games, and conduct midday business meetings over plates of meatloaf, mashed potatoes and banana pudding.

What sets Marshall apart from its neighbors is a red-hot patent docket. Four years ago, 32 patent lawsuits were filed in the Federal Eastern District of Texas, which includes Tyler, Texarkana and Marshall. This year, an estimated 234 cases will be filed in the district, a majority of them in Marshall.

What's behind the rush to file patent lawsuits here? A combination of quick trials and plaintiff-friendly juries, many lawyers say. Patent cases are heard faster in Marshall than in many other courts. And while only a small number of cases make it to trial — roughly 5 percent — patent holders win 78 percent of the time, compared with an average of 59 percent nationwide, according to LegalMetric, a company that tracks patent litigation.

Those odds are daunting enough to encourage many corporate defendants to settle before setting foot in Marshall. Add to that the fact that jurors here have a history of handing out Texas-sized verdicts to winners. In April, for instance, a Marshall jury returned a $73 million verdict against Communications">EchoStar Communications for infringing the patents of TiVo.

MARSHALL was once one of the most prominent and wealthy cities in Texas, but much of the city's industry and many of its downtown shops disappeared in recent decades. Now, thanks to an influx of out-of-town lawyers and the increased investment in real estate by a handful of local leaders, Marshall is in the early stages of a revival.

The sounds of hammers and electric saws echo across the brick-paved streets that line its picturesque downtown square as buildings that stood empty for years are being transformed into office space for rent.

Restaurants that depended on tourists drawn to town by the Fire Ant Festival, the Stagecoach Days Festival and the winter Wonderland of Lights display now do a brisk business catering lunches and dinners for visiting lawyers. Some hotel chains along Interstate 20, south of downtown, are running at 95 percent occupancy rates during the week.

"During the TiVo-EchoStar trial, 90 percent of my revenue for one month came from one of the law firms in the case," said Phillip W. Gurganus, manager of the local 68-room Hampton Inn, where rates run $77 a night.

His mother, a former Texas tort reform lobbyist, helps to serve breakfast at the hotel. "I loved getting that check and taking it to the bank," he added.

How far the dollars from visiting lawyers trickle through Marshall's economy remains unclear and is the subject of discussion among local leaders.

For much of its history, Marshall has been a community divided by wealth and race. People whose grandparents or great-grandparents made fortunes from oil, natural gas or railroads live in gated mansions and rarely mix with those who frequent the local Wal-Mart or many downtown finance shops that make $300 loans. The median family income in Marshall is $30,000.

"The majority of Marshallites don't even know the patent docket exists," said Johnny B. Taylor, a native of Marshall who returned and started an office rental business after spending 31 years as a police officer in Arlington, Tex. "There's one way the docket affects them: they can't find parking."

Cranking up the air-conditioner of her father-in-law's 1990 red Cadillac DeVille with a matching red leather interior, Geraldine Mauthe, the city's bubbly and silver-haired convention-and-visitors director, begins the tour of town.

Turning away from the pale yellow century-old Harrison County Courthouse, which is being renovated and updated to handle Marshall's rapidly expanding patent docket, Ms. Mauthe often stops the Cadillac in the middle of the street — eliciting sharp honks from cars behind her — to point out local sights.

This much can be said about Marshall: It is not lacking in churches (50 Baptist, 35 of other Protestant denominations and 1 Roman Catholic), historic homes (many built in the 1850's) and, oddly, funeral homes. "We have seven. Four for blacks and three for whites," Ms. Mauthe said, matter-of-factly.

When she drove past a hair salon that offered haircuts, tanning and the services of a notary public, Ms. Mauthe rubbed her fingers together and said: "You got to make money somehow."

DOJ_NMG_0068469

Oh yes, Ms. Mauthe added, Marshall and its robust legal community go back a long way. In the late 1800's, she said, Marshall was a bustling city, a transportation gateway to the North, linking local cotton farmers and the Texas and Pacific Railway.

As the railroad was built, personal-injury lawyers came to town to represent injured workers. In more recent decades, Scott Baldwin, Franklin Jones and other Marshall-based plaintiffs' lawyers generated tens of millions of dollars in fees — and grabbed the national spotlight — by pursuing class-action lawsuits against companies that used asbestos and silica, and against the pharmaceutical and tobacco industries.

By the late 1990's, though, it looked as if the good times were ending for Marshall's lawyers. Broad tort reform in the state had limited punitive damages and later capped damages on medical malpractice lawsuits, effectively limiting the fees that lawyers could make.

In Marshall, an oft-told joke is that the passage of tort reform was when many local lawyers made the trip from P.I. to I.P. — that is, they moved out of personal injury and into intellectual property.

That was the road traveled by Samuel F. Baxter, a former state district court judge who had become a personal-injury lawyer, after he received a call from a lawyer in Dallas in 1996, asking him to help out in a patent lawsuit in Marshall. "I told him, 'No, I don't know anything about patents,' " Mr. Baxter recalled as he reclined far back in his chair in his Marshall office, which included an autographed Cy Young baseball and aging maps of the United States depicting an outsized Republic of Texas.

Mr. Baxter was eventually persuaded to take the case and was the lead trial lawyer defending Samsung in a patent lawsuit filed by Texas Instruments, which eventually settled. Since then, Mr. Baxter, who is a principal at McKool Smith, a Dallas-based law firm with a full-time office in Marshall, has been involved in a number of patent cases; in one, he helped represent TiVo in its patent fight with EchoStar.

Charmingly loquacious about his two adopted sons and local Civil War history, Mr. Baxter turns economical with his words when asked why the federal court in Marshall handles more patent lawsuits than federal courts in much larger cities.

"One, speed kills," he said. "If you're the plaintiff, you can go fast and get a resolution faster here than you can a lot of other places.

"Second, there's a dearth of good lawsuits these days for lawyers to handle," he added. "You know lawyers: they go where the money is."

THE testing of Marshall as a patent battleground began nearly two decades ago, when Texas Instruments, which has its headquarters in Dallas, embarked on an aggressive strategy to make rivals license its patents. If a company would not capitulate or at least negotiate, a Texas Instruments team of lawyers would drag it to court — increasingly, down the road to the uncluttered courtrooms of Marshall.

In September 1999, Mr. Ward, a malpractice and product-liability lawyer with a practice nearby, in Longview, was sworn in to the East Texas federal bench.

A no-nonsense judge who charms people with his folksy demeanor but who also has a reputation for a fiery temper in the courtroom, Judge Ward began hearing patent cases. As a private lawyer, he had argued a few such cases; as a judge, however, he quickly grew frustrated at the slow pace, paperwork, and delays and motions that were part of a patent docket.

That's when he adopted what he calls "the Rules." As any lawyer who has shown up in Judge Ward's courtroom will testify, the Rules put patent lawsuits on a strict timetable, laying out when key documents must be handed over and setting firm trial dates.

No 100-page motions or lawyer soliloquies are tolerated in Judge Ward's courtroom. He puts page limits on documents and uses a chess clock to time opening and closing arguments, brusquely interrupting lawyers when it is time for them to wind it up.

The changes turned Marshall's federal court into a "rocket docket" — a place where the time between filing and trying a lawsuit became significantly shorter than in other districts.

"I really shot myself in the foot when I adopted the Rules," Judge Ward said with a laugh, sitting in a leather chair in his quiet, wood-paneled chambers during a lunch recess in the Hyperion-OutlookSoft trial. The reason, he added, was that the district was soon deluged by patent suits filed by companies seeking a quick resolution to their conflicts. While judges in nearby cities also began to hear patent cases, most of them remain before Judge Ward.

The expedited process pleases clients, though it is sometimes hard on the lawyers who break the Rules.

"When he's mad, first his face gets red," said Michael C. Smith, a lawyer with the Roth Law Firm in Marshall. "Then his neck gets red and he starts tucking his chin down into his chest. If he tears off his glasses, I don't care what side you're on, you had better drop to the floor and get under that table fast."

Judge Ward said that he did not often lose his temper. "If I tell a lawyer to stop leading the witness and he continues, well, we're going to have a problem," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068470

SPEED is not the only feature bringing patent holders to Marshall. So, too, is the fact that they usually win. Three-fourths of the cases that come to trial in Marshall are decided in favor of the plaintiffs, compared with less than half in New York.

The success rate for patent holders in Marshall is a great incentive for defendants to settle matters quickly and privately. Since 1991, the Federal District Court in Marshall has held less than half the number of full patent trials as courts in Los Angeles, New York, Chicago and San Francisco.

"I would say that this is, historically anyway, a plaintiffs-oriented district," Judge Ward said, noting that he lost a large patent suit there himself when he was practicing. He was part of the team representing Hyundai Electronics in 1999 when it lost a $25.2 million verdict in a lawsuit filed by Texas Instruments.

Others point to a different reason why plaintiffs may win more often than defendants: plaintiffs, they say, typically hire local Marshall lawyers. Hiring local in Marshall means that you will get a lawyer who not only knows the jurors, but who also probably knows their friends and even personal details like how often they go to church, local lawyers say.

"We had a Fourth of July party and we circulated the jury lists to people there on the boat dock," said Joy Berry, a local lawyer who advises out-of-town law firms in jury selections. "By the time the party was over, we knew quite a bit about nearly everyone" on a list of potential jurors for coming trials, she said.

Mr. Smith of the Roth Law Firm said it could be difficult for outside lawyers to blend in and noted that some even tried to curry favor with jurors by taking on a drawl or wearing cowboy boots. "I call them T.B.L.'s, or 'tall building lawyers,' " he said. "They don't take their coats off no matter how hot it is down here."

Indeed, local lawyers love to swap stories about visiting colleagues and their clients from bigger cities or from abroad.

One of Mr. Baxter's favorites is about an out-of-town lawyer, a vegan, who wanted a late-night meal. "She walked over to Wendy's and tried to order a salad through the drive-in window," he recalled. "She was told she needed to be in a car to order through the drive-in window so she walked back over to the hotel, woke up one of the firm's partners and had him take her through the drive-in window." He laughed uproariously at the memory.

M. Craig Tyler, a lawyer in the Austin, Tex., office of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, the big Silicon Valley law firm, is fond of recounting how visitors react to Texas hospitality. "We've had many meals with clients from the Pacific Rim who take out their cellphones and send pictures back home when they see the portions of the meals in Marshall," he said. "They thought it was family style, that one plate would feed many people."

And then there are the tight-knit relationships that visiting lawyers encounter when they work in Marshall. In one patent case that eventually was settled, the plaintiffs hired an accountant whose clients included Judge Ward.

Patent litigation is a growing business across the country; Marshall is just the most visible example. Among the weightier issues behind the mushrooming of its patent docket is whether the elements that have made it expand — hungry plaintiffs' lawyers, speedy judges and plaintiff-friendly juries — are encouraging an excess of expensive litigation that is actually stifling innovation.

Some say yes. "A lot of the cases being filed in Marshall are by patent holding companies, or patent trolls, as they're called, whose primary and only assets are patents," Mr. Tyler said.

Companies spent 32 percent more on outside counsel for intellectual property litigation in 2003 than in the previous year, Chuck Fish, the chief patent counsel for Time Warner, told the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Courts, the Internet and Intellectual Property earlier this year. Spending for all other litigation rose a mere 1 percent during that time, Mr. Fish said.

Defending Marshall's role, many residents note that not only is it cheaper to hold a trial in Marshall, but that it is neutral territory for virtually all corporations that find themselves in court here.

"It's not as if you have a situation here where Microsoft is hated or Cisco is spit upon," Mr. Baxter said. "Whether it happens in Marshall, Tex., or Des Moines, Iowa, these lawsuits are going to happen. They might as well happen here."

And many in Marshall are looking for ways to profit from the patent gusher.

THE paint is peeling and the wallpaper in the bathroom is nothing short of hideous, but all Johnny Taylor sees as he walks through the former doctor's office he just bought in town is space for as many as 16 lawyers.

"Furnished office space is renting for $1 to $1.50 a square foot per week. So, a 2,000-square-foot office can get $2,000 per week," said Mr. Taylor, who has already wired the building for high-speed Internet access and created marshallofficespace.com to highlight offices for rent and offer advertising to local businesses.

One of the first challenges for visiting lawyers arriving in Marshall is cramped quarters. They often roll into town with semitrailer trucks that have traveled from San Francisco or New York containing everything that could be needed to try a case, including volumes of documents, copying machines, desks, video and audio equipment and even cappuccino machines.

Some people in Marshall are trying to save them the trouble by providing fully equipped office space on short-term leases.

DOJ_NMG_0068471

"We're going to have a 6,000-square-foot space for a war room that we can rent out for $7,500 to $10,000 a week," said Leslie D. Ware, a patent lawyer in Dallas, who bought a former furniture building next door to the federal courthouse. "A firm could basically walk in, plug in their laptops, work and unplug and go home," he said.

Others are trying to lure patent dollars through different tacks. Fairfield Inn, which bought a subscription to Pacer, the electronic docket, routinely calls law firms to offer rooms for their lawyers with cases scheduled for trial.

"I'm thinking of coming up with a T-shirt for the lawyers," said Jennie A. Kelehan, a former financial adviser who moved here from Houston three years ago and is now the co-owner of a wine and specialty store called Under the Texas Sun. She estimated that lawyers in town for the patent docket were responsible for about a sixth of her sales.

"The patent lawyers were not in our plans at all," she said, "but they are definitely a huge asset for us and we will start using that as we start planning for the future."

Others, though, seem more skeptical about the long-term effect of the patent docket on Marshall's economy. They said they would like to bring in new industries and increase tourism.

"For the most part, the rocket docket and the lawyers are 'today dollars,' " said Alan Grantham, a member of the Marshall Economic Development Corporation and a senior vice president at Bancorp South. "They spend the night at a hotel, rent cars and eat at restaurants." But, he added that the patent docket was not the only factor driving the local economy.

Others, like Jerry Cargill, who runs a wholesale beverage distributing company in Dallas and has a family farm outside Marshall, said they hoped that increased tourism would play a bigger role in Marshall's comeback.

In the last three years, Mr. Cargill has bought nine buildings downtown, as well as a $500,000 stake in the historic Hotel Marshall. The City of Marshall put in $1 million and others raised $527,000 to restore the building to its original Italian Renaissance design.

"I didn't even hear about the rocket docket until a year ago," Mr. Cargill said. "By then, we were well into the various projects."

This fall, a tourism marketing firm is coming to town to create a branding plan and to offer ideas to alter Marshall's infrastructure for tourism. "It's a unique community," Mr. Cargill said. "It just needs some marketing."

Marshall's patent docket may not be able to sustain its current pace of growth. Its reputation for speed is starting to attract so many cases that a certain sluggishness may be setting in. Four years ago, lawsuits took less than two years to go to trial. Now the average time between when a suit is filed and when it goes to court is more than 27 months.

There is legislative movement afoot as well. This spring, two senators, Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, and Orrin G. Hatch, Republican of Utah, introduced a patent reform bill. Among its many provisions is one to limit damages in patent lawsuits and another to require a more substantial connection between a business and the court where it brings a patent lawsuit.

WE think the bill will restore more balance in the patent system and remove incentives for plaintiffs to run to one jurisdiction and try to hit the jackpot," said Mark W. Isakowitz, a lobbyist with the Coalition for Patent Fairness, which advocates patent reform on behalf of corporations. Any reform would likely happen next year at the earliest, lawyers say.

But the biggest change in Marshall's status could come if plaintiffs start losing more cases.

A jury in Judge Ward's courtroom in July stunned observers when it returned a verdict that said WG Security Products had not infringed any of the patents of Sensormatic.

The jury in the Hyperion-OutlookSoft case went even further a little over a week ago. After a five-day trial, it deliberated for less than three hours before deciding that OutlookSoft had not infringed the Hyperion patents and that those patents were invalid.

After the verdict was read, OutlookSoft's legal team returned to the local law office it had been working out of and opened some Champagne, said the company's chief executive, W. Phillip Wilmington, who attended every day of the trial in Marshall.

"As we were going through our victory discussion, a big truck pulls up and there goes the copier and fax machines out the door," Mr. Wilmington said. "It disappeared just as quickly as it was set up. I'm sure the week following, there was someone coming in to do it all over again."

ENVIRONMENT:

As Children Suffer, Parents Agonize Over Spinach (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068472

MILWAUKEE, Sept. 22 — The hardest moment came when Elaine and Dennis Krause's 9-year-son, who had stoically undergone kidney dialysis, blood transfusions and drug treatments that made him hallucinate that spiders were all around him, quietly asked his parents whether he was going to die.

"What do you say when your child asks you, am I going to die?" asked Elaine Krause, who has spent nearly all of this month beside her son's bed at a hospital here, watching his skinny, lanky body do battle with E. coli. "I told him, 'These people are trying to help you, and you are getting good care.' But the truth is, I couldn't answer him directly. We didn't know."

By this weekend, a national outbreak of E. coli linked to fresh spinach grown in California had sickened 170 people in 25 states and killed at least one here in Wisconsin, where more people have grown ill than in any other state. The authorities in Idaho and Maryland were investigating the deaths of two others, including a toddler whose parents said they gave him a fruit smoothie with spinach days earlier, trying to determine whether their deaths, too, were linked to the outbreak.

But beyond the raw statistics were individual stories of a sudden, mysterious, life-threatening illness, one that struck most often in the homes of those who viewed themselves as more health conscious than many other Americans.

In many cases, it crept up with frightening force after what had seemed a harmless, even healthful meal — a spinach salad with walnuts, a sandwich layered with spinach or, as for the Krause family, a baked, boneless, skinless piece of chicken on a small bed of spinach. Then what had seemed a simple bout of diarrhea in the morning often led to a harrowing, bloody race to the emergency room by midnight.

And around the country, some families still wait by bedsides, wondering which foods they could ever again feel safe giving their children, what the government or the spinach industry could have done to protect them, and, most of all, whether their loved ones will ever fully recover.

"Here you think you're feeding your child a great, healthy meal," Dennis Krause said sadly. "But here I was, poisoning him."

Not all E. coli is harmful to humans, but certain strains produce toxins that kill cells in the gut and in the blood vessels, leading to abdominal cramps and watery to bloody diarrhea, said Dr. John Flaherty, associate chief of the division of infectious disease at the Feinberg School of Medicine at Northwestern University.

One area where the toxins can wreak particular havoc is in the kidneys; when it happens, Dr. Flaherty said, the inflamed cells lining the blood vessels get "roughed up," causing red blood cells to break open as they pass by and jam blood flow to the kidneys.

"In the course of one week, he went from this healthy, lively little boy to a boy in a hospital bed fighting for his life," said Anne Grintjes, of Brookfield, Wis., whose 7-year-old son developed a dangerous form of kidney failure linked to E. coli, called hemolytic uremic syndrome. "He turned yellow and gray, literally. It was shocking and terrifying and unbelievable to watch."

Of the 171 cases that have been confirmed as part of the spinach outbreak, more than half required hospitalization, and about 16 percent developed the dangerous hemolytic uremic syndrome.

Doctors say they cannot be certain what long-term effects the syndrome may have; it varies from person to person. Many patients recover entirely, they say, while others may suffer from chronic kidney problems and other health risks.

Although the youngest children and the oldest adults are considered most vulnerable to getting sick from the bacteria and to struggling to recover from its effects, more than 70 percent of those who grew ill in this outbreak were somewhere in between: older than 4 and younger than 65.

At 27, Gwyn Wellborn of Salem, Ore., described a sudden onslaught of slicing, stabbing abdominal pain and bloody diarrhea in late August, days after eating baby spinach at work, thinking she was being especially virtuous. At first, doctors sent her home, Ms. Wellborn said, with a painkiller and a diagnosis of food poisoning. Hours later, though, the pain became so excruciating and the bleeding so constant, she said, that her husband rushed her back to a hospital.

From there, she quickly deteriorated. Her kidneys began failing. "At one point, the doctors told my family there was nothing they could do, that that was it," she recalled. But after three transfusions and several weeks in a hospital, Ms. Wellborn went home.

Hers is one of at least four lawsuits filed in courts around the country by William D. Marler, a Seattle lawyer, in connection with the outbreak. Ms. Wellborn said she would not consider eating spinach anytime soon. "Not in a million years," she said.

Marion Graff, 77, a former bank clerk and widow from Manitowoc, Wis., is the nation's only confirmed fatality in the outbreak, but deaths in Maryland and Idaho are also considered "suspect" cases, federal authorities said on Friday.

Kyle Allgood, 2, of Chubbuck, Idaho, died at a Utah hospital from cardiac arrest after contracting hemolytic uremic syndrome, his family said, a case Idaho authorities said was "probably connected" to the tainted spinach, although laboratory tests have been inconclusive. Kyle's mother, Robyn Allgood, said she had mixed vegetables into blended fruit and juice smoothies, as a way to get Kyle and her two daughters to eat vegetables, and had given him such a drink on Sept. 12.

Three days later, she said, Kyle had flu-like symptoms, including severe diarrhea.

DOJ_NMG_0068473

On Wednesday, despite specialized treatment at a hospital in Salt Lake City, Kyle died, hours after his father, Jeff, said he had urged the boy "to fight for me."

Relatives tearfully recalled Kyle as generous and good-natured though mischievous — a boy known as the "stuntman" for his antics, which inspired fear and awe in adults.

He liked to twirl his hair into knots, dance wildly to the music of Jack Johnson and give lingering kisses to his aunts, the family said. He was also impish; at Primary Children's Medical Center in Salt Lake City, Kyle was pinching his nurses and ripping at his IV's until near his final moments, they said.

In Maryland, an elderly woman died of E. coli on Sept. 13 after eating fresh spinach, state health officials confirmed, but because of a lack of DNA specimens from the victim, officials have yet to determine whether it was the same strain of E. coli that infected others who ate spinach. Family members identified the woman as June E. Dunning, 86, of Hagerstown.

Warren Swartz, Ms. Dunning's son-in-law, said she had eaten steamed spinach from a package on Aug. 30 and Sept. 1 and baby spinach from a bag on Aug. 30. She had signs of E. coli, including rectal bleeding and bloody diarrhea, on Sept. 1 and went to the hospital the next day.

For the Krause family, of McFarland, Wis., the illness began a few days after a family dinner on Aug. 24. First, their 15-year-old daughter grew ill. Then their 9-year-old, who was healthy enough that he had a perfect attendance record last year in third grade, grew even more ill, and has suffered debilitating effects, including acute renal failure, fluid buildup near the heart, raised blood pressure, soaring blood sugar.

In a hospital cafeteria here, miles from their home, the Krauses at first could only bring themselves to eat peanut butter and jelly sandwiches. Everything else — lunch meats , salads, everything — scared them.

"For me, there's anger and paranoia and fear for others — for the safety of food we get that's supposed to be monitored," Ms. Krause, 47, said. "I don't know what to trust. Should we grow it all ourselves?"

On Friday, their strawberry-blond boy lay weakly in his hospital bed, surrounded by balloons and cards from the school where he says he fears falling behind his class. He had physical therapy, then occupational therapy to begin rebuilding his body. He told his father he only wanted to be well, to somehow rewind to the day before the spinach.

A few days ago, his body seemed to turn a corner and doctors removed him from the dialysis machine, a crucial step toward recovery. His parents have not asked when he might be well enough to go home; they said it was too early to look ahead.

"I keep thinking we will at some point go home and it'll all be like it was," said Mr. Krause, 52. "But we don't know yet what the long-term effects are. He will be monitored probably for the rest of his life. It'll never be the same."

E. Coli Alert's Timing Questioned (WP)

By Dan Morse, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Md. Family Suggests State Acted Only After Death Was Publicized

HAGERSTOWN, Md., Sept. 23 -- The family of an elderly Hagerstown woman who died nearly two weeks ago after eating bagged spinach questioned Saturday whether government health officials had done enough to alert Maryland residents to the threat of E. coli contamination that has been linked to at least three people in the state.

"The story broke in the local newspaper Friday morning. Suddenly the [state] health department had a press conference on Friday afternoon," said Warren Swartz, son-in-law of June E. Dunning, 86, who died of E. coli illness Sept. 13 at Washington County Hospital in Hagerstown.

Dunning might be the second person killed in a nationwide E. coli outbreak, but state officials have been unable to conclusively link her case to the national outbreak because of problems completing a genetic test on the bacterium that infected her.

Swartz and his wife, Corinne, spoke Saturday to more than a dozen journalists crammed into their living room. The Swartzes appeared uncomfortable with the attention as they spoke of Dunning, a native of Britain and bingo enthusiast who could work up to 21 cards at once.

Although Warren Swartz raised questions about when information had been disseminated, he stopped short of criticizing government officials directly.

Also at issue are other cases in Maryland, including those of three children whose sickness was attributed to tainted spinach. The children are recovering, officials have said.

Dunning, who lived with the Swartzes and was an avid spinach eater, ate bagged spinach Aug. 28 and 30 and Sept. 1 -- steamed or as part of a salad -- becoming intensely sick shortly thereafter and being hospitalized. Her death occurred about the time news of the outbreak was spreading across the country. Swartz said he was able to retrieve some of the spinach from the family's refrigerator and give it to health investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0068474

On Thursday, Swartz said, he contacted the Hagerstown Herald-Mail because he wanted residents to know about the possible threat. The newspaper's article was published Friday.

John Hammond, a spokesman for the Maryland Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, said the agency was not withholding any information. He said Friday's news conference addressed a wider number of E. coli cases that officials are investigating.

Hammond would not say when state investigators found links to the other cases. He said he was told about them Friday morning.

He also said state officials called the news conference Friday primarily to announce the link to spinach of three E. coli cases in Maryland. At the same time, he said, the news conference allowed officials to address a deluge of phone calls they were receiving from reporters after the news report in Hagerstown.

Hammond declined to answer specific questions about Dunning. "It is inappropriate for us to comment on a specific case," he said. "We can't, and we won't."

In a Friday news release, Michelle A. Gourdine, the health department's deputy secretary for public health services, said: "The discovery of these cases shows our surveillance protocols are working exactly as they should. The minute we learned about the issue, we began researching any possible links to cases in Maryland."

The outbreak of E. coli O157:H7, which has sickened at least 166 people in 25 states, has been traced to three counties in and around the Salinas Valley in California. On Saturday, Pacific Coast Fruit Co. of Portland, Ore., announced a recall of its salad products.

Maryland officials have talked about 10 cases. In three, children with E. coli illnesses had eaten spinach. Three other cases were not linked to the outbreak. At least four other cases in Maryland, including Dunning's, are under investigation.

In Hagerstown, the Washington County Health Department referred questions Friday to state officials. Washington County officials were unavailable to comment Saturday.

Dunning's daughter and son-in-law recalled her as a spunky 86-year-old who had not been in the hospital since she gave birth.

Dunning lived with the couple in her own section of their house and enjoyed spending time in a sunroom tending to plants.

In the hospital, Dunning fell into a coma. She woke briefly, smiled and blew a kiss to her daughter.

On Sept. 13, while at their house, Dunning's daughter and son-in-law noticed an azalea blooming, the only one on a bush outside their door.

In the hospital, Warren Swartz tried to tell his mother-in-law about the flower. "I saw the little note you sent us," he told her.

5 More E. Coli Cases Blamed On Spinach (AP-Y)

By Andrew Bridges, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

The outbreak of E. coli linked to fresh spinach was blamed for another five cases of illness Saturday, raising the number of people sickened to 171, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported.

The number of states affected held steady at 25. So far, 92 people have been hospitalized, including a Wisconsin woman who died. Two other deaths have been reported in suspected cases — a child in Idaho and an elderly woman in Maryland — but those cases are still being investigated.

For more than a week, the Food and Drug Administration has recommended people not eat fresh, raw spinach. State and federal investigators since have traced the contaminated spinach back to three counties in California's Salinas Valley, and already farm inspections there are turning up possible problems.

On Friday, officials said spinach grown anywhere outside that area is safe to eat — but industry needs to figure out how to let consumers know the origin of what they're buying before the green can return to sale, said Dr. David Acheson of the FDA's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition.

Last week, Natural Selection Foods LLC of San Juan Bautista, Calif., recalled all its spinach and spinach-containing products. Many people reported eating the company's spinach, sold under multiple brands, before falling sick. And a package of Dole baby spinach, one of those brands, taken from a victim's refrigerator tested positive for E. coli.

Other companies that have recalled products because they may contain contaminated spinach include Pacific Coast Fruit Co. of Portland, Ore., S.T. Produce of Seattle, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., and RLB Food Distributors of West Caldwell, N.J.

Pacific Coast said its products were distributed in Alaska, Oregon, Washington and Idaho. S.T. Produce said its salads were distributed to stores and delis in Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana.

DOJ_NMG_0068475

The states that have reported infections are Arizona, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, New York, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Utah, Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

Something's Rotten In Food Oversight (WP)

By Al Meyerhoff And William B. Schultz

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Federal agents are scurrying across the Salinas Valley -- the nation's "salad bowl" -- in search of the source of the E. coli contaminating the spinach supply. They won't find it without a mirror, because the real culprit in this case is the U.S. government. A half-dozen federal agencies administer a patchwork quilt of outdated standards, inadequate inspections and porous statutes that allow pollution in the fields, filth in the packing houses and contaminated food on the supermarket shelves. Millions of Americans are sickened by food each year; some 9,000 die.

Today American food is more manufactured than grown. Following a scorched-earth approach, workers wearing "spacesuits" inject nerve agents into the soil before planting, leaving nothing alive. Hogs grow enclosed in facilities several stories high. Tomatoes are picked green, gassed and then canned. Writing almost 70 years ago, journalist Carey McWilliams was prescient in his classic work: We now truly do have "factories in the fields." And factories, whether manufacturing steel or frozen peas, generate waste -- in agriculture some 1.4 billion tons per year, 10,000 pounds for each American.

Some of these wastes have a nasty habit of returning in our food. The E. coli in spinach most likely came from the Salinas River or its tributaries, a system of virtual sewers from agricultural runoff and flooding. Since 1995 there have been 20 other E. coli poisonings of spinach and lettuce, eight of them in the Salinas Valley, where nearly every waterway violates national clean-water requirements.

Pathogens, animal waste, agrichemicals and fertilizers routinely enter our food supply, either from environmental pollution, as with E. coli, or intentionally, as in the case of pesticides. Infected animals confined in feed lots are dosed with antibiotics; the lots themselves produce "lagoons" of runoff, contaminating the land, water and the food itself.

Three agencies within the Agriculture Department and two within the Department of Health and Human Services, plus the Environmental Protection Agency, have overlapping jurisdiction over the food supply. None has overarching authority or responsibility for the quality of food. The Government Accountability Office said recently that "it is at times difficult to determine which agency is even responsible for a particular food product," and "arbitrary jurisdictional lines can make the current system difficult to assess and, more importantly, unresponsive to the needs of the public."

Contaminants are not even subject to a single standard. Instead, from the field to the table, different rules apply, reflecting differing regulatory philosophies. Most are many decades old and showing their age. "Tolerances" for pesticides, some from the 1950s, were originally set to address immediate, "acute" health effects. Only now, following a 1996 amendment to the law, are the standards being slowly reassessed to address cancer and other long-term, chronic health effects.

Rules for other food contaminants are even less exacting. There are the "unavoidable environmental contaminants" that get into food indirectly from the soil, surface or irrigation water. These include everything from insect fragments and fly eggs to mercury and lead. They are typically subject only to "action levels": informal, discretionary limits that lack the clout of regulations and are set without sufficient scientific data.

In the late 1990s, in adopting a modest $43 million Food Safety Initiative, the Clinton administration accurately described the problem and made a plea for help. "Our understanding of many pathogens and how they contaminate food is limited," a White House statement said. "For some . . . we do not know how much must be present in food for there to be a risk of illness; for others, we do not have the ability to detect their presence in foods . . . . Resource constraints increasingly limit the ability of state and federal agencies to inspect food processing facilities."

With the federal food safety system so inadequate, it's particularly troubling that earlier this year the House of Representatives passed legislation to override state laws establishing food quality requirements that are more stringent than the federal standards.

Unlike prescription drugs, food does not go through an approval process. The integrity of the system depends heavily on the agency's inspection force in the food production system. Yet the Food and Drug Administration, with responsibility for all processed food products except meat and poultry, has 1,962 inspectors for more than 100,000 facilities -- a decrease of more than 250 inspectors since 2003. Today food processing plants are inspected on average once every 10 years. Imported food is almost never inspected. The USDA has about 6,000 employees who inspect meat and poultry plants, but use of the inspectors is "not based on the food safety risk of particular products," the GAO says.

As a public policy matter, all food safety functions (setting standards, inspection, risk assessment, research) should be consolidated under a single, independent agency (either the Food and Drug Administration or a new federal agency). This approach is supported by scientists and consumer advocates and has been included in legislation introduced by Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) and Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.). In the past, however, similar recommendations have been consistently blocked by agency turf wars and agribusiness clout. But don't despair. September is National Food Safety Education Month.

DOJ_NMG_0068476

Al Meyerhoff, an environmental attorney, is a past director of the Natural Resources Defense Council public health program. William B. Schultz was an FDA deputy commissioner from 1994 to 1998.

E. Coli Effects Can Last A Lifetime (LAT)

By Mary Engel, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

For some who survive infections such as the one recently linked to spinach, lingering ailments include kidney damage and diabetes.

When she was 10 years old, Brianne Kiner became the public face of one of the country's worst outbreaks of food poisoning.

Television cameras zoomed in as she left Seattle's Children's Hospital in June 1993, six months after eating an undercooked Jack-in-the-Box hamburger contaminated by E. coli. It was the same virulent strain that recently has been linked to California-grown spinach.

Doctors called her survival a miracle. What most people outside her family didn't know then — and may not realize now — was that her recovery was just beginning.

"She had to learn to walk again. Think again. Learn her colors," said her mother, Suzanne Kiner. "She had such total body atrophy that she could not chew."

Brianne suffered from hemolytic uremic syndrome, or HUS, the most dreaded consequence of E. coli O157:H7 infection and the most common cause of kidney failure in children under 18. Of the 171 cases identified so far in the current spinach-related outbreak, 27 have been diagnosed with HUS. One person has died. Two other deaths are under investigation.

Not everyone who ingests this strain of E. coli falls ill, and not everyone who becomes ill develops the bloody diarrhea described by doctors and patients as worse than kidney stones, more painful than childbirth. But about 10% of those who do — the proportion is slightly higher for children and the elderly — come down with HUS.

As the Kiners' experience shows, the consequences can be devastating, lingering far longer than most people's memories of the original outbreak.

The death rate from HUS is 3% to 5%, doctors say. Ten percent of patients survive but have long-term kidney damage and may eventually require dialysis or a transplant. The vast majority recover complete kidney function, but experts say even they should be tested regularly for abnormalities that may not be obvious but could cause high blood pressure or diabetes.

Brianne's case was so severe that just about everyone expected her to die. She was the last to leave the hospital among those stricken in the Jack-in-the Box outbreak that sickened hundreds and killed four.

During the months she was laid up, the toxin produced by the bacteria attacked her brain, kidneys and liver, putting her in a coma for 40 days. She suffered strokes and seizures. Her infected pancreas lost the ability to produce insulin, and she developed diabetes. Doctors removed part of her inflamed intestine.

Brianne doesn't remember being rushed to the hospital. She does recall awakening in the intensive care unit and spending months in bed. She remembers all too well the rounds of doctor appointments after her release and the years of physical, occupational and speech therapy that extended into high school. She was left with damaged lungs and learning disabilities.

"I had to relearn how to read," she said. "And this is embarrassing, but I had to be potty trained all over again."

The $15.6-million settlement the Kiners won in 1995 from Jack-in-the-Box provides for Brianne's support. She now lives on her own and takes community college classes part time — routine milestones for a 23-year-old, but they represent hard-won autonomy for someone stricken as severely as she was. Every three months, she visits her endocrinologist to check her diabetes, but she pronounces her health — and life — "Good."

"I have a house and I'm loving it," she said.

Her mother takes pride in Brianne's progress, calling her "blessed."

But letting go leaves Suzanne Kiner with time she hasn't had in years. Time to watch the spinach outbreak unfold and to think, "Oh, no. Not again."

E. coli is commonly found in cow manure and passed to people though contaminated food. Most strains are ubiquitous and relatively harmless.

But somewhere along the way, E. coli O157:H7 evolved the ability to produce lethal toxins that can cross the intestinal wall and enter the bloodstream.

DOJ_NMG_0068477

The toxins flock to receptors in the kidneys, where they kill small blood vessels and clog waste filters. They can also harm the pancreas, liver and heart. Death is often a result of toxins infecting the brain and causing strokes or swelling.

"I lost one child to heart disease," said Dr. Richard Siegler, professor emeritus of pediatrics and kidney disease at the University of Utah School of Medicine and a widely published expert in the E. coli-caused syndrome. "The autopsy found clots in the small blood vessels of the heart. One little girl came into the ER and couldn't breathe. She had damage in her lungs from the toxin. I had a child who developed blindness. The toxin attacked small blood vessels in the retina of the eyes."

Sometimes, the damage reveals itself years later.

Each kidney has about a million filters. On average, most people lose about 20% of these filters by the time they're 80, just through wear and tear.

"Any child that's had this disease has lost some of those filters," said Dr. Sharon P. Andreoli, a pediatric nephrologist at Indiana University. "If they have lost 20% of their filters, they have the kidneys of an 80-year-old when they're 5 years old. So their kidneys have to work harder. And when they have to work harder, they wear out faster."

What saves the vast majority of children who fall ill from HUS is the resilience of the human body. Virtually nothing can be done to fight the infection once it is underway. Treatment consists of supporting the patient — from something as simple as hydration, all the way to dialysis — while the body fights off the toxins.

"Kidneys have an amazing capacity to keep you going with very little left," said Dr. David Acheson, chief medical officer for the FDA's food safety division and an expert on the kidney syndrome. "Many folks can manage all their lives with just one."

Dr. Phillip Tarr, another expert on HUS and a professor of pediatric gastroenterology at Washington University in St. Louis, agreed.

"It is an absolute horrible experience to go through during the acute stage," he said. "But many people, if not most, get through it and do fine in the future."

Michael Beverly may be one of the lucky ones.

He was just 2 1/2 years old when he fell ill in 1996 after drinking unpasteurized juice made by Odwalla Inc. In that well-publicized outbreak, one child was killed and 60 were sickened.

Michael's kidneys stopped functioning, and he went on dialysis for eight days.

Today, Michael, like most 12-year-olds, thinks he's immortal. He doesn't fret.

His mother does.

Kelley Beverly remembers that Michael was in so much pain that he couldn't bear to have the lights on in his room at Seattle's Children's Hospital.

Now he visits a clinic every other year to have his kidneys and other organs tested. So far, the results have been normal. But his mother knows that complications often accompany the growth spurt of the teenage years.

"Maybe when he's through adolescence, I can stop worrying," she said.

Amber Brister of Minneapolis is also 12. She is not quite a year from the first anniversary of the illness brought on by the 2005 Dole lettuce outbreak, one of nine E. coli outbreaks traced to lettuce or spinach grown in the greater Salinas Valley since 1995.

Amber entered the hospital Sept. 28 and was discharged on Halloween. Her kidneys failed, and she spent 18 of those 34 days hooked up to a dialysis machine. Her pancreas became infected. She couldn't eat for three weeks.

"No one knows what it's like until it happens to you, until you're the one sitting in the hospital, watching your child fight for her life," said her mother, Lori Olson. "What people don't understand about this is they think that you just get sick, and you get better, and that's it."

The single mom lost her job as a bartender to stay with her daughter in the hospital. Olson agonized over leaving a second daughter, then 15, home alone every night for a month. She too had been sickened in the outbreak but not as severely.

Now, almost a year later, there are the questions, the ones Olson has to ask and the ones she has to fret about.

"Every day you have to ask questions that, as a preteen, she's not very comfortable with, and she'd like to forget the whole thing," Olson said about Amber. "Every little thing you have to monitor. When she has a cold, you just worry and worry and worry."

Immediately after her discharge, Amber went to a clinic twice a week to check renal and blood levels. She missed day after day of school.

"We all remember our first year in junior high," Olson said. "If you can just imagine coming back three months after everybody else and being that kid who was in hospital."

Amber herself doesn't want to talk about her illness. She doesn't want the attention, her mother said. She just wants to live a normal life.

DOJ_NMG_0068478

Brianne Kiner understands — and sympathizes with anyone who's suffering through the latest outbreak linked to California spinach.

"It's going to get better," she said. "It's tough right now, but it's going to get better."

mary.engel@latimes.com

Union Hits Board For Upholding Firing (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

The leader of the nation's largest independent union of federal workers says a decision by the Merit Systems Protection Board upholding the firing of U.S. Park Police Chief Teresa Chambers is "dangerous to the public safety" because it cut protections afforded to federal whistleblowers.

President Colleen M. Kelley of the National Treasury Employees Union said the board's 2-1 decision last week "serves the public poorly and undermines the congressional intent evident in the Whistleblower Protection Act, particularly with respect to matters impacting public health and safety."

The union filed a brief in support of Mrs. Chambers, who had asked the board to overturn her firing. Mrs. Chambers, who had served for six years as chief, was fired in July 2004 by the Interior Department after The Washington Post published an article in which she criticized inadequate funding and staffing levels for Park Police.

Republican board members Neil A.G. McPhie and Mary M. Rose ruled that an employee's disclosure that an agency policy raises risks to the public health and safety is protected by the whistleblower act "only if the legitimacy of a particular policy choice is not debatable among reasonable people."

However, Democrat Barbara Sapin said, "policy decisions underlie virtually all matters at issue in disclosures related to public safety dangers, and even the most extensive and thorough consideration cannot preclude any possibility of substantial and specific dangers to the public health and safety."

In her lengthy dissent, Mrs. Sapin echoed many of the arguments the union made in its amicus brief, adding that the additional requirement imposed by the majority would "discourage employees from making the disclosures Congress sought to encourage them to make."

The board's ruling allows Mrs. Chambers to take her legal challenge to federal court.

Richard Condit, general counsel for Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility (PEER), said the organization will "immediately and vigorously pursue" an appeal of what he called an "extremely questionable ruling."

Ms. Kelley argued that employees should not be required to prove that a policy will endanger the public safety before protecting their rights to speak out on those dangers.

The union represents about 150,000 employees in 30 agencies and departments.

Mrs. Chambers first raised warnings in December 2003 about inadequate funding and staffing. She was suspended and later fired for telling reporters the agency had neither enough officers nor resources to provide adequate security in a post-September 11 world.

PEER noted in a recent report that the National Park Service told Congress in April 2000 that Park Police needed 806 officers. At the time, the agency had 638 officers. Today it has 621.

A Boat Racing On Biodiesel, But Running Low On Money (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 23 — In early July, Pete Bethune, an amateur sailor from New Zealand and a recent convert to environmentalism, stepped aboard his new $2.4 million speedboat, filled up the tank with a fuel made from animal fat and headed east from Auckland.

His goal was simple: to complete the fastest circumnavigation of the globe in a motorboat while using nothing but biodiesel, renewable fuel that can be made with salvaged French fry grease, refined soybean oil and other organic and recycled oils. The record attempt is due to start in March, from Barbados, after a North American tour this fall meant to test and publicize the boat — called the Earthrace — and raise money.

“I thought I’d have a sponsor give me $4 million and bankroll the whole thing,” said Mr. Bethune, 41. “And I still believe that.”

But somewhere between Hawaii (where the boat refueled on biodiesel made from the drippings of cruise liners’ deep fryers) and Vancouver (where it loaded up with fuel made from tallow, drawn from the hard fat of sheep and cattle), the Earthrace almost ran out of gas — at least financially.

DOJ_NMG_0068479

For the last month, Mr. Bethune, a former oil exploration engineer, has been bobbing up and down the California coast, asking for contributions, from $5 donations to tour the boat to $50,000 to plaster a corporate logo on the side.

"My wife sent an e-mail saying they're going to turn the lights out" at home, said Mr. Bethune, who has two children. "When you're stressing your partner out like this, it's hard."

The project has only about $10,000 in the bank and is hundreds of thousands of dollars in debt. Mr. Bethune says he has put $650,000 of his own money into the boat and spent another $650,000 borrowed from banks, friends and family. He sold a business he founded, sold his part in a forest plantation and mortgaged his home — three times.

"I thought it would just fall into place," he said. "But we're just keeping our heads above water."

John Allen, the project's one-man ground crew, has also been trying to find money. "There's lots of irons in the fire but no one with a checkbook and pen poised," said Mr. Allen, who, like Mr. Bethune, is an affable New Zealander. "But with a negligible budget, it's been difficult to go full bore with this."

Hotel rooms and fuel have been donated along the way, but things like rental cars have become a luxury. "I've been wearing the same shorts for three months," Mr. Allen said. "It might be nice to get a new set."

While the lack of money has done little to dampen Mr. Bethune's ambitions, he says he understands why nautical sponsors can be hard to find. "The sight of a boat sinking with someone's name on the side can be disconcerting," he said.

Mr. Bethune said he first became interested in biodiesel several years ago while writing a paper on renewable fuels during studies for a master's degree in Australia. He had had a passing knowledge of biodiesel while working on oil rigs in the North Sea and Libya, but as he learned more, he said, he "became a real convert."

Around the same time, Mr. Bethune also happened across a little-known fact: the world record for circumnavigation of the globe by a powerboat is 75 days, set in 1998 by a British boat called the Cable & Wireless Adventurer. Mr. Bethune figured he could do it faster and, at the same time, raise awareness for his newfound cause.

His passion won over some early sponsors, including Cummins MerCruiser Diesel, which donated the engines; ZF Marine, which donated the boat's gearboxes, propellers and engine controls; and Biodiesel Oils NZ, which gave Earthrace 15,000 gallons of fuel (about five tanks' worth) and $30,000. Panasonic donated $150,000 worth of video equipment, and Caliber Boats built the boat at cost, fusing it together using Kevlar and carbon.

The Earthrace project has also relied heavily on the kindness of strangers, including a rotating, all-volunteer crew. Because Mr. Bethune had never taken a boat out of the sight of land, the Earthrace has two experienced sailors helping with the open-ocean sailing, where waves the size of houses can challenge the most able mariner.

With three hulls and a pair of state-of-the-art engines, the Earthrace, which looks a bit like a large metallic swan, is designed to cut through waves up to 50 feet high without slowing and can reach speeds of 40 knots, which boating experts say could help in its record attempt.

"The fact that it's a wave cutter and a tri-hull, you're talking about high speeds here," said Stuart Reininger, a writer for Motor Boating magazine and an expert on power boats. "I'm sure they could do it."

But running on biodiesel, which is harder to find, would complicate things, Mr. Reininger said. "You're talking about a fuel that doesn't have supply stations everywhere," he said.

The Earthrace is 78 feet long, but the living space is cramped, just a closet-size room with four bunks. The galley is similarly basic, with only a kettle, a microwave and a toaster. There is no shower, a fact that Mr. Bethune said added a certain musk to the journey.

"You kind of lose your sense of smell," he said. "But then when you get off, people are like, 'Oy, mate, this boat stinks.' "

Then there are the curious smells that follow biodiesel vehicles in general, often reflecting the fuel's origins. "You may smell doughnuts, you may smell French fries," said Josh Tickell, of the advocacy group Biodiesel America. "People say they smell fried catfish, but that might be a stretch."

Biodiesel gives off fewer emissions than regular oil-based diesel. It is also nontoxic and biodegradable, making it an ideal fuel for boats, Mr. Tickell said. "It biodegrades in water as fast as sugar," he said.

In Santa Cruz, where the Earthrace arrived during a Friday afternoon happy hour, the reaction was typical: a mix of awe and confusion. Children scrambled for a look, while adults scratched their heads.

"That is the weirdest thing I've ever seen," said Bruce McClymont, 48, of San Jose. But when told the Earthrace's mission, Mr. McClymont chuckled.

"It's a boat going around the world? So what?" he said. "People have been doing that for 500 years."

Mr. Bethune remains optimistic and says he sees positive signs everywhere. The project's Web site, www.earthrace.net, has been getting about 20,000 hits a day, he said, compared with about 2,000 a day before the boat left New Zealand. And on a good day, the Earthrace has reaped up to $4,000 from curious onlookers.

Mr. Bethune estimates he needs $500,000 to achieve his circumnavigation, a goal he says he intends to meet.

DOJ_NMG_0068480

"We're getting there, mate," he said. "It's been a long, hard journey, and it continues to be a long, hard journey. But we're making it happen the best we can."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Charged In Internet Drug Case (SPP)

By Matthew Moriarty, STAFF WRITER

South Pines (NC) Pilot, September 24, 2006

Two Pinehurst men are among 11 people recently indicted and charged with selling prescription drugs over the Internet.

The U.S. Department of Justice also named an Atlanta-based company in the indictment. The company allegedly sold generic versions of prescription steroids, drugs such as Valium and Xanax and sexual performance drugs such as Viagra and Cialis.

The local men indicted are David Dalton Johnson, 37, and David Alan Brady, 40.

Story continues belowadvertisement

They are accused of selling unregulated drugs manufactured in Belize and marketed through "spam" e-mails as low-price Canadian drugs. The e-mails would direct customers to one of several Web sites where they could order the drugs and they would be shipped from Belize.

Moore County sheriff's deputies went with federal investigators to the homes of the two Pinehurst men on Sept. 14.

"The indictment's allegations are disturbing," U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias said in a press release, "because customers thought they were getting legitimate and safe prescription drugs over the Internet from Canada at cheaper prices, when in reality they received adulterated fakes that were crudely made in an unsanitary house in Belize."

All the defendants stand to lose numerous properties and automobiles and will have to forfeit the money in several bank accounts. The Justice Department is seeking a judgment of no less than $19.8 million.

The government is calling for Brady to forfeit his home on Laurel Road in Pinehurst. It's also seeking three lots off Doubs Chapel Road.

The lead defendant is Jared Robert Wheat, 34, of Alpharetta, Ga., the owner of Hi-Tech Pharmaceuticals, the company that was indicted. The indictment claims that on March 21, 2002, Wheat sent an e-mail "stating that he was making fake Viagra in Belize."

Others charged are Stephen Douglas Smith, 38, of Duluth, Ga.; Thomas Holda, 43, of Duluth, Ga.; Sergio Ronaldo Oliveira, 46, of Hoschton, Ga.; Brad Neal Watkins, 38, of Birmingham, Ala.; David Watkins, 40, of Norcross, Ga.; Steven Blinder, 42, of Aberdeen, S.D.; Michelle Young, 38, of Belize; and Guillermo Pech, 28, of Belize.

All the defendants face charg-es of conspiring to import controlled substances into the United States and conspiring to violate the wire and mail fraud statute and to introduce into interstate commerce adulterated and misbranded prescription drugs.

Johnson and Brady also face other charges including mail fraud, distribution of controlled substances and introducing adulterated and misbranded new drugs.

According to the indictment, they were employed by Hi-Tech. Their tasks included marketing, sales and distribution of drugs and controlled substances, the indictment claims.

The indictment claims that Johnson sent several e-mails in October 2003 to other defendants, teaching them how to encrypt documents prior to exchanging them.

The indictment says that in November 2003, Brady told customer service employees to send an e-mail to customers using a fictitious.

Wheat faces the additional charge of engaging in a continuing criminal enterprise.

The Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) and the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) conducted the investigation along with help from several other agencies.

According to the Justice Department release, the defendants helped Wheat open a drug manufacturing facility in Belize in 2002. The release said the defendants are accused of using funds from Hi-Tech and Wheat's personal money to cover the costs and would fly to Belize to manufacture the drugs.

They are accused of making 24 different generic versions of drugs including steroids Oxymethelone and Stanazolol, versions of behavior-regulating drugs Ambien, Valium and Xanax, versions of sexual performance-enhancing drugs Viagra and Cialis, a version of the cholesterol pill Lipitor and the arthritis treatment Vioxx.

The Justice Department believes that the defendants ordered enough ingredients to produce millions of pills.

Internet prescription drug fraud has been an area of concentration for the DEA.

"One of the fastest-growing drug abuse concerns is prescription drugs," DEA Special Agent Sherri Strange said. "The selling and purchasing of drugs have been facilitated by the wide use of the Internet, the anonymity it provides and the ease and relative secrecy of the mail and private delivery companies.

"As our children sit down at the family computer to do their schoolwork, research projects and converse with friends, criminal organizations like the one alleged today, slither into their lives. Every one of us has received spam e-mails directing us to visit Web sites to order supposed generic prescription drugs and controlled substances. Buyers beware."

FDA Special Agent David Bourne of the criminal investigations department said that these types of drugs pose a health risk to the public. "We are committed to investigating and preventing those who use trickery and deceit to illegally and unscrupulously sell medications over the Internet at the expense of the public health," he said.

Matthew Moriarty can be reached at 693-2479 or by e-mail at moriarty@thepilot.com.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Work Force Fights Corruption (AP-Y)

By Pauline Arrillaga, Ap National Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Under the glare of the port lights, federal agents watched as the GMC Yukon approached the immigration booth. Two years of legwork — interviewing sources, listening to wiretaps and watching just as they were watching now — had led to this. Aurora Torres, the suspected smuggler, was behind the wheel.

Weeks earlier, agents had heard her on the telephone with her contact.

"Are you going to invite me to the movies tonight?" she asked. "It's going to be four tickets."

"Right at 12," a man responded. "If I can't make it, I'll send you a 9-1-1."

He hadn't made it on that particular day, but tonight everything was going as planned.

Just after 4 a.m., the Yukon eased to a stop at inspection Lane 8 at the Otay Mesa Port of Entry, a byway for travelers heading from Mexico into California. An immigration officer approached. After a brief exchange, the Yukon was admitted into the United States.

Nothing unusual — but for the 11 illegal immigrants sitting inside in plain view.

Torres was arrested. Then agents moved in to take their final suspect into custody.

"Tickets," investigators had concluded, was code for vehicles loaded with undocumented migrants. "Right at 12" was a reference to a work schedule, the midnight to 8 a.m. shift. The clues, they believed, pointed to the secret of Torres' success.

The inspector from Lane 8 was on break when a half-dozen agents approached. "Are you Mike Gilliland?"

He was an ex-Marine with 16 years under his belt at U.S. Customs, but Torres allegedly knew him as something else. Her contact. The one she referred to as "una cosa segura." Translation: A sure thing.

___

A dilemma confronts the nation's immigration work force, one that goes far beyond sealing borders to would-be terrorists, drug smugglers and undocumented migrants, one that is particularly unsettling in a post-Sept. 11 world.

How do you secure the homeland if some of those guarding the gates are dishonest?

Consider: On the California border, at least nine immigration officers have been arrested or sentenced on corruption-related charges in the past 12 months. One of those convicted of smuggling in illegal immigrants turned out to be an illegal immigrant himself, who had used a fake birth certificate to get hired by the Border Patrol.

On the Texas border, at least 10 officers have been charged or sentenced in corruption schemes over the past year, including four Border Patrol agents — all assigned to the same highway checkpoint — who admitted taking money to let both drugs and migrants pass.

The numbers are a snapshot, but the picture is clear. There's no shortage of "sure things" among U.S. immigration workers.

More than 600 criminal probes have been launched this fiscal year of immigration employees nationwide, according to internal affairs investigators at the Department of Homeland Security and Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Complaints range from smuggling, bribery, extortion and fraud to sexual misconduct, assault and theft of government property. The accused, past and present, manned border crossings, highway checkpoints, airports. Others sat behind desks in places like Orange County, Calif., and Fairfax, Va., charged with taking bribes to provide naturalization papers or work permits to ineligible applicants.

DOJ_NMG_0068482

Though the cases involve only a fraction of the overall immigration work force, some question whether the government is doing enough to root out corruption in the ranks.

"After the next attack, when they find out that an employee was bribed by a terrorist or bribed by a spy, it's going to be too late," said Michael Maxwell, an ex-police chief who headed internal affairs at U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS), the agency that adjudicates visa, naturalization and asylum applications. "In fact, I think it is too late."

In February, Maxwell resigned as director of the USCIS Office of Security and Investigations and sought whistleblower protection after he began complaining to Congress about what he describes as rampant corruption that's going unprobed.

After Maxwell's office was established in 2004, he asked the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general and the Office of Professional Responsibility at Immigration and Customs Enforcement to forward pending inquiries involving USCIS workers.

He wound up with a backlog of 2,771 complaints. One-fifth were criminal allegations, he said, including more than 100 accusations of bribery.

"It's outrageous, absolutely outrageous, how little attention is being focused on this issue when you look at the ramifications on national security," said Maxwell, who informed Congress that complaints included some allegations of employees providing material support to known terrorists or being influenced by foreign intelligence services. While declining to publicly provide details, he cites as one example the case of an Iraqi-born U.S. citizen whose background indicated he'd been trained by "multiple foreign intelligence agencies" but nevertheless was hired by USCIS to review asylum applications. The employee has since resigned.

"Remember, one officer can grant citizenship at the time of his choosing at the place of his choosing to the person of his choosing — with impunity. So if he wants to give Osama bin Laden U.S. citizenship, he can," Maxwell said. "I can't tell you how many times I heard senior management say ... `Every allegation will be investigated.' Well, guess what, it's not being investigated."

Although the agency disputes that claim, some cases suggest laxness.

Take the case of Robert Schofield, a USCIS district office supervisor in Fairfax, Va., and a federal immigration officer for 30 years. Schofield was arrested in June, accused of illegally granting residency and issuing naturalization certificates to more than 100 unqualified immigrants. A Chinese citizen also was charged for allegedly brokering deals between Schofield and Asian immigrants.

However, over the last 10 years, "numerous" allegations of bribery involving Schofield and immigration applicants have been reported, an agent with the inspector general's office said in a court affidavit. The agent didn't provide specifics, but said Schofield was once demoted for "conduct unbecoming a government employee" and also accused of making $36,000 in unauthorized purchases on his government-issued credit card.

Schofield has been placed on indefinite suspension without pay, said USCIS spokesman Chris Bentley, who declined further comment on Schofield's employment history because of the pending criminal case. Schofield's lawyer did not return Associated Press messages seeking comment.

Then there's Lizandro Martinez, a Customs officer who admitted that for 2 1/2 years he took bribes to allow vehicles crammed with marijuana through his inspection lane at the Progreso International Bridge in Texas. Martinez, who owned a half-million-dollar home outfitted with a movie theater, was paid $10,000 per vehicle. He faces up to life in prison at his scheduled October sentencing.

Martinez had a host of disciplinary problems during his 14-year career, including threatening to retaliate against a police officer who stopped him for speeding, an official with the Office of Professional Responsibility testified during the case. In 1998, inspectors found 1,300 pounds of cocaine in a truck that crossed through Martinez's lane; the driver stated he had been told to use that particular lane.

Investigations brought disciplinary actions: counseling, an oral reprimand, a 14-day suspension. At one point, according to testimony, Martinez was fired but then reinstated after the union stepped in on his behalf. Still another proposed removal was mitigated to a 30-day suspension.

Jim Tomsheck, newly appointed as assistant commissioner for internal affairs at Customs and Border Protection, declined to discuss the Martinez case, although he said legal battles can hinder the dismissal of problem employees who, for whatever reason, were not charged criminally.

He added that managers are examining ways to ensure that those officers are dealt with administratively, and "are removed from the front line ... and can't continue to contaminate the work force."

Part of the problem is a lack of resources.

DOJ_NMG_0068483

The Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General and the Office of Professional Responsibility at Immigration and Customs Enforcement share responsibility for investigating criminal misconduct among a total of 72,000 immigration employees — with 309 investigators.

"Their plates are constantly full," DHS Inspector General Richard Skinner said of his agents, adding that an average of 15,000 allegations against government employees and contractors pour into the office each year. "No, it is not enough people. ... We have cases that we opened three years ago that we're still pursuing."

Others question whether the investigative structure makes sense. It's not clear, for example, whether Customs and Border Protection has the authority to conduct criminal probes of its own employees, who include Border Patrol agents and front-line Customs officers. The majority of criminal investigations of immigration employees involve CBP workers.

Tomsheck said his agency was in the process of building a small corps of investigators "so that we can stay actively involved in policing our own work force." However, Traci Lembke, acting director of the Office of Professional Responsibility, said those investigators are authorized only to handle administrative — not criminal — issues.

In response, CBP issued the following statement: "We are working with ICE on all of these issues. We all agree how critical this is to the mission of DHS."

___

It's noon. A muggy day at the Otay Mesa port of entry just outside of San Diego. Eleven lanes are clogged as far as the eye can see with cars, motorcycles, SUVs and vans ferrying folks from Tijuana to schools, jobs and stores in California.

Weaving in and out of the smog jam is a Customs officer, holding a shepherd mix by the leash to sniff out contraband. As cars creep toward the inspection booths, automated scanners register license plates in a computer. Then other Customs officers ask for identification, pop trunks, inspect spare-tire compartments, peer down air vents. If anything seems out of place, vehicles are sent to secondary inspection for a more thorough examination.

This is what port director James Hynes calls "layered screening," every step intended to catch smugglers but also make it more difficult for a corrupt officer to operate under the radar. Other measures include bans on personal cell phones and pagers, which have been used to alert smugglers what inspection lane an officer is working, and unscheduled lane rotations.

"We want lots of eyes and ears out here to layer our capability and be random, flexible and unpredictable. That's our success in the war on drugs. That's our success in alien apprehensions. And that's also our success in maintaining integrity," Hynes said, standing not far from Lane 8, the one Mike Gilliland was working the morning he was arrested.

Hynes and other immigration brass insist corruption is a priority — but combating it is a challenge, because smugglers are aggressive about targeting and luring in officers. They'll post lookouts just across the border and, using binoculars, zero in on inspectors with perceived vulnerabilities.

Are they tired? Lazy? Flirtatious with women?

Greed is an obvious motivator. Migrants paid upward of $4,000 each to pass through Gilliland's lane at Otay Mesa, investigators said, adding that smugglers use the guarantee of a "sure thing" to demand higher rates. Gilliland's cut was alleged to be $1,500 a head.

"That adds up. Really, really quickly," said FBI agent Andrew Black, who heads the San Diego Border Corruption Task Force.

In Gilliland's case, with as many as four vehicles coming through a night, each one sometimes packed with 10 people or more, it could have added up to a $60,000 profit in a single shift — about the equivalent of an entire year's salary as an inspector with Customs and Border Protection.

There are other, more complex, reasons seemingly good agents go bad. In some past cases, corrupt agents conspired with friends or family members. Others cite growing discontent with the job, and the relative ease with which a dirty employee can operate.

"We don't do anything, just clear the way, and we get 300 (dollars) per head," ex-Border Patrol agent Eric Balderas said in a wiretapped phone call last year. He's awaiting sentencing in a California corruption case.

Balderas admitted conspiring with fellow agent Oscar Ortiz to allow illegal immigrants into the country. Ortiz was sentenced in July to five years in prison for smuggling at least 100 immigrants, at times transporting them in his Border Patrol truck.

A Mexican citizen, Ortiz used a fake U.S. birth certificate to get hired by the Border Patrol, prompting the agency to re-examine its employees' backgrounds. His attorney, Stephen White, said Ortiz was disenchanted with a job akin to "putting a Band-Aid on an open wound."

"A lot of times there's nothing that they can do," White said. "People just come and they can't stop it."

At sentencing, Ortiz told the judge: "I was blind."

DOJ_NMG_0068484

Port director Hynes finds such explanations difficult to swallow. What separates a good agent from a bad one is "what integrity you carry when you get up in the morning," he said. "A guy like Gilliland or others? They sold their integrity, and over time we'll get them."

Most border agents "are honest, hardworking and do a fine job," added FBI agent Black. "However, the ones that are corrupt are really in a position to do this country a lot of harm. They don't know who's going through, and they don't know what's going through. That's the danger."

A convicted felon was among those smuggled through Gilliland's lane the day he was arrested, court documents said.

With the case pending, FBI agents and prosecutors declined to go on record with theories of why Gilliland supposedly turned. Court records allege he worked with Torres and one other female smuggler.

Gilliland, meanwhile, maintains his innocence.

"I've got nothing to hide," he told The Associated Press from his home in Chula Vista as his wife, also a Customs and Border Protection employee, stood by his side.

For now, Gilliland is under house arrest, an electronic monitor clasped to his ankle. The government uniform and badge are gone, and what ultimately becomes of his career and reputation will be decided in a courtroom.

Judges Fumble Asylum Cases (CHIT)

By Noreen S. Ahmed-ullah And Jon Yates, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, September 24, 2006

Refugee was sent back to Sudan to face jail, beatings

Denied asylum and ordered out of the U.S., Nourain Niam spent three years running for his life in Africa. He was arrested and beaten, he said, uncertain whether he would ever find sanctuary.

But in an extraordinary turn of events, Niam returned to Chicago this month, living evidence of a widespread breakdown in America's immigration court system.

Niam, a member of a persecuted Sudanese opposition party, is the first in a wave of political refugees who are getting a second chance at asylum, after federal appeals courts found grievous errors in the way their cases were handled.

In one year alone, the Chicago-based 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals remanded 40 percent of the 136 immigration cases it heard--rejecting rulings of the administrative judges in stern and often scathing language.

U.S. Appeals Judge Richard Posner, who led the charge, called the immigration judge's analysis in Niam's case "so inadequate as to raise questions of adjudicative competence."

Still, it was only with repeated interventions by the the appeals court--and a little luck--that Niam ended up on a plane headed to O'Hare International Airport, his eyes filled with tears as he caught sight of Chicago's skyline.

"I thought of the last three years in Africa," the father of two quietly recalled, his deep and steady voice giving little indication of his emotions. "I felt my life was in danger. I could be killed or arrested at any time."

In fact, he said, men he believes to be Sudanese agents operating in Chad did seize him in 2005. He said he was pistol-whipped and kicked, then left unconscious for three days in a worm-infested jail. He was eventually released through the efforts of a friend.

That, he said, puts his struggle here in perspective.

"The United States, whatever it is, you will not see a better place in terms of freedom, in terms of human rights," he said.

His troubles are not over, though. His wife, son and a gravely ill U.S.-born daughter were not allowed to return with him. They remain in Africa while Niam fights for asylum and a reunion.

"My dream is to see my daughter, my wife and my son beside me," he said.

In the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the U.S. government created new immigration guidelines that officials said would help secure the country's borders.

Among them was a measure by former Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft designed to clear a stockpile of cases clogging immigration courts, an arm of the Justice Department. Ashcroft's idea was to overhaul the system's primary review panel, the Board of Immigration Appeals.

In doing so, he greatly expanded the types and number of immigration appeals that could be reviewed by a single judge, instead of a three-judge panel, and could be decided with a one-sentence opinion. He called the directives "streamlining." Critics called it rubber-stamping.

The effect was almost immediate. Immigrants, feeling their claims were not properly reviewed, flooded the federal appeals courts with their cases.

Federal judges reacted too.

DOJ_NMG_0068485

Posner wrote some of the harshest opinions, questioning whether asylum seekers were being denied fundamental rights. In one ruling, Posner asked whether immigration judges were properly trained. In another, he called an immigration judge's opinion "hopelessly incomplete" and part of a "systemic failure."

"The 7th Circuit [of federal appeals court] took the lead," said Crystal Williams, deputy director of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. "But other circuits like the 3rd and the 1st began to weigh in."

The Washington D.C.-based organization estimated there have been more than 100 remands across the country since Posner and the federal courts began to identify a pattern of errors.

Denise Slavin, president of the National Association of Immigration Judges, said immigration judges are short-staffed, overworked and under pressure to resolve cases quickly. She said the system needs changes that will relieve immigration judges and give them more time and help to review cases.

The government, to an extent, agreed. Last month, after a Department of Justice review, Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales announced periodic evaluations of immigration court judges and plans to beef up staffing.

Immigration experts applauded the changes. Many, however, such as Eleanor Acer, refugee program director for New York City-based Human Rights First, were disappointed in the government's decision to keep the "streamlining" single-judge reviews.

Niam's odyssey through U.S. immigration courts began in 1998, but his story began decades before, in the provincial capital of El Fasher in the Darfur region of Sudan.

According to his 2001 testimony, Niam was a student when he joined the Umma Party. After a coalition government was elected in 1986, he became a mid-level government official in El Fasher.

But after a 1989 coup by Omar al-Bashir, Sudan's current ruler, Umma fell from favor and Niam lost his job. At one point, Niam testified, he was taken into custody and jailed for 3 1/2 weeks. During that time, he said, he was threatened and beaten.

Niam believes he was targeted not just for his political views, but because he is a member of the Zaghawa tribe, an ethnic group persecuted by government-backed militias in the Darfur region, where hundreds of thousands of people have been killed. President Bush and other U.S. officials have called those attacks genocide.

Niam said he eventually escaped to Chad and then to Nigeria. He believes Sudanese authorities were never far behind.

Came to U.S. in 1996

In 1996, he came to the U.S. on a student visa and settled in Ft. Wayne, Ind. He lived in a community with 10 other Sudanese and Chadian families.

Though he has no documents to prove it, he claims he filed for asylum twice in his first year here. It wasn't until an attorney filed a third application, however, that immigration officials responded, he said.

In a 2001 hearing, Immigration Judge James Fujimoto ruled Niam had missed the one-year deadline to apply for asylum. Fujimoto said there was no record of his first two applications.

The judge also ruled him ineligible for "withholding of removal"--essentially a stay of deportation--saying there was no evidence Niam would be tortured if returned to Sudan.

"Despite Sudan's apparently poor human rights record, a lack of respect for human rights does not signify that members of the disrespected group face a probability of torture," Fujimoto said in his decision.

In another passage, Fujimoto misidentified the government in power when Niam was last arrested, and he concluded from that there was no clear evidence Niam remained in danger.

Niam's attorneys appealed to the Board of Immigration Appeals. In a two-paragraph decision, the board acknowledged the immigration judge had "incorrectly identified the regime in power during [Niam's] 1990 arrest" but declared the error "harmless."

The immigration board then affirmed Fujimoto's decision denying both asylum and withholding.

Ordered back to Sudan

In March 2003, almost two years after Fujimoto denied asylum, Niam opened his mail to find a letter from the U.S. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services. The letter said Niam had exhausted all possibilities for administrative relief.

"Arrangements have been made for your departure to Sudan on Tuesday, April 8, 2003," the letter read.

In an interview this month, Niam said going back to Sudan as the immigration court had ordered would have been a death sentence. Sudanese authorities knew his younger brother was a high-ranking member of a key opposition group, he said.

"I thought for sure they would kill me," Niam said. "Or I would disappear."

To avoid deportation, Niam fled. He and his family boarded a flight for Chad on April 7, 2003.

Unlike many asylum seekers, Niam was lucky in that he had legal representation, Acer, of Human Rights First, said. Refugees without an attorney often don't know they can appeal to the federal courts. Some can't afford that, but Niam's attorneys worked for free.

DOJ_NMG_0068486

His lawyers already had appealed his case to the federal appeals court, but it was not until after Niam left the country--unbeknownst to his lawyers--that U.S. Appeals Judges Posner, Kenneth Ripple and Ann Claire Williams ruled in Niam's favor, in January 2004.

Among other criticisms, Posner focused on the error that the Board of Immigration Appeals had found harmless: the mistake about who was in power when Niam was arrested.

Niam's attorneys mailed the opinion to Niam's old address in Ft. Wayne. It came back, unopened.

"A case like Niam's is disheartening," said Godfrey Muwonge, one of Niam's attorneys. "You've won but lost."

His other attorney, Larry Hagen, eventually connected with Niam by e-mail, while he was in Chad.

Niam was surprised at the news but remained despondent. In an e-mail to Hagen, Niam wrote: "Since my arrival, up to date, I never had a home to live, moving from house to house, from [one] village to another.

"I have been arrested several times and scared to death, but paid money to escape and cross the border into Cameroon or Nigeria."

'04 bid for visa denied

In July 2004, Niam tried to get a visa from the U.S. Embassy in Chad to return to Chicago for his immigration hearing. Records show he was denied. He said embassy officials told him he didn't need to be present at the hearing because his attorneys could represent him.

A hemisphere away, the immigration judge disagreed. Because Niam did not show up, the judge rejected his case again.

While his attorneys kept fighting, Niam's situation in Chad grew more dangerous.

Men he believed to be Sudanese secret agents arrested him last year while they were looking for his brother, Niam said. They took him to a high-walled building, then beat him with the butt of a pistol, cutting his chin and opening a gash on his forehead, he said.

Others hit and kicked him until he fell unconscious and was thrown in a dank, bug-ridden cell, he said.

"I never imagined I could be alive again," Niam said. "In Africa, it's easy to get killed, and nobody will ask why you have been killed or who killed you, particularly if the government is a part of it."

Niam said he was in the jail for three days until a friend in the Chadian government secured his release. He left his wife and daughter and fled Chad.

He traveled west across the continent, crossing through Cameroon, Nigeria, Benin and Burkina Faso before stopping in Mali. He figured Mali was far enough from Sudan to be safe.

He wrote to Hagen that he was depressed and "psychologically damaged" about leaving his family.

Encouraging words

Still, encouraging words from his attorney brought him hope.

"I have no word to express my feeling towards your efforts and always when I reach to the point that my soul [is] about to separate [from] my body, you bring me hope of life again," Niam wrote.

Hagen and Muwonge filed another motion to reopen Niam's case. The motion made it back to the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. In January, the court ruled Niam had the right to appear in person at his immigration hearings.

Even as the political situation deteriorated in Sudan and Chad, the U.S. government resisted Niam's return. Muwonge told officials if they did not act soon, he would go back to the appeals court again. The government relented, giving Niam special permission to return.

He arrived at O'Hare on Sept. 12, looking gaunt and tired. Muwonge greeted him in a low-key reunion, and Niam thanked him repeatedly. Later, he sobbed as he embraced Muwonge again.

His next immigration hearing is in April. In the meantime, his attorneys hope to seek humanitarian parole to bring his wife and children to the U.S.

Niam's son is 8 months old, but it is his 3-year-old daughter, ill with an undiagnosed disease, who worries him most. He dreams of a reunion with her in America, where he can raise her in freedom and without fear.

"She is my life itself," he said. "She is my heart."

---

nahmed@tribune.com
jyates@tribune.com

When A Foreigner Turns American (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

When an immigration judge granted asylum last week to an orphaned Pakistani youth who grew up in Queens, one argument she considered was that he was so Americanized, "he would stick out like a sore thumb" in his native land.

Can you be too Americanized to be deported?

In the end, the judge used other grounds to halt the deportation of the young man, Mohammad Sarfaraz Hussain, 21, and to recognize him as a refugee from persecution. But the question is part of a growing debate over how to treat the Americanized children of foreign parents.

It makes sense that the concept has now turned up in an asylum hearing, said Stephen Knight, deputy director of the Center for Gender and Refugee Studies at Hastings College of Law in San Francisco. At a time of simmering conflict between the United States and Muslims in other countries, Americanized young people may very well become targets of persecution overseas.

At the same time, he added, no one is suggesting asylum as an answer for more than a handful. Among Pakistanis of all ages, for example, fewer than 2,000 cases of asylum were granted nationwide in a decade, and in New York, only 77 Pakistanis received asylum in 2004.

"It's a very difficult, strenuous avenue to pursue, to try to gain asylum in the United States," Mr. Knight said. "Judges are skeptical, the standard of proof is high, Congress is making it harder to apply and easier to deny."

A broader answer is a measure known as the Dream Act, included in immigration bills now stalled in the Senate. It offers a path to citizenship to young people of good character who have lived in the United States for five years, been accepted to college, or earned a high school diploma.

Opponents say the measure will encourage illegal immigration and subsidize immigrants' education at the expense of American children and their taxpaying parents. Supporters contend it is unfair to punish young people for parental decisions, and unwise to leave a generation of strivers in a dead end — let alone to deport them to lands where anger at America is boiling over.

"Like many first generation immigrants, they're very loyal to the country that took them in," said Cris Toffolo, director of the Justice and Peace Studies program at St. Thomas University in St. Paul, who testified as an expert in Mr. Hussain's asylum hearing. "But then if we deport them or deny them citizenship, they're like a jilted lover. Why should they be loyal?"

TAX:

Major Error Is Reported In Tax Paid By Mrs. Astor On Sale Of Painting (NYT)

By Serge F. Kovaleski

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Legal papers filed by J. P. Morgan Chase, the temporary guardian of Brooke Astor's assets, state that her son recently told the bank that he now realizes he made an error in his mother's 2002 tax return by overstating the original price of a Childe Hassam painting she had sold, resulting in a large underpayment of taxes three years ago.

As it turns out, the discrepancy was a matter not just of thousands of dollars, but of millions.

The so-called cost basis for the work of art, "Flags, Fifth Avenue," was listed in Mrs. Astor's federal income tax filing as $7.425 million, a copy of the document shows. But she paid $172,010 for the painting when she bought it in March 1970, according to the bill of sale.

Because of the inflated figure, Mrs. Astor apparently ended up paying far less in taxes than required on the capital gains she realized from the February 2002 sale of the painting by Hassam, a renowned American Impressionist. Mrs. Astor's son, Anthony D. Marshall, 82, who managed her finances at the time, sold the painting to an art gallery for $10 million and collected a $2 million fee from his mother for handling the transaction.

The tax issue concerning the painting, also known as "Up the Avenue From Thirty-Fourth Street, May 1917," has arisen as a compelling side issue from the review of mounds of financial documents in the legal battle over the care and fortune of Mrs. Astor, the 104-year-old philanthropist and socialite.

In July, Mr. Marshall's son, Philip Marshall, filed a court petition claiming that his father had been grossly neglecting Mrs. Astor's well-being while enriching himself with her wealth.

Philip Marshall has asked the court to appoint permanent guardians for his grandmother; the bank is temporarily in control of her assets.

The case against Anthony Marshall has hinged on a string of changes to Mrs. Astor's will that took place in late 2003 and early 2004, after she had experienced a marked decline in her health. The changes redirect millions of dollars to her son upon her death.

DOJ_NMG_0068488

Mr. Marshall has vigorously denied accusations that he neglected his mother, insisting that he has been an honest and loving steward of her personal affairs for more than 25 years. His lawyers have cast him as an astute and attentive financial manager for Mrs. Astor, and they contend that her investments have flourished as a result of his keen involvement.

One of Anthony Marshall's lawyers has asked J. P. Morgan Chase to file amended tax returns on behalf of Mrs. Astor that reflect the true capital gains stemming from the sale of the painting.

J. P. Morgan Chase says it is reviewing the documents as part of its fiduciary responsibilities. But in a court filing, the bank describes the request as "ironic," noting that Mr. Marshall has also objected to its efforts to learn more about the deal.

"The 'error' evidently relates to a substantial overstatement of the cost basis of the Hassam painting (and a resultant significant underpayment of the tax)," Les Fagen, a lawyer for J. P. Morgan Chase, wrote. He added, "This is the same painting transaction which he contends in his opposition papers is not now worthy of further inquiry, as the bank has requested."

Sanford J. Schlesinger, a tax lawyer and founding partner at Schlesinger Gannon & Lazetera in New York, who is not involved in the case, said that the $2 million commission would be deducted from the total gain on the sale of the painting, bringing the figure to just over $7.8 million, which was subject to a 28 percent federal tax rate in 2002, as well as additional state and city taxes. Mrs. Astor could also face sizable penalties and interest for underpaying the tax, he said.

As her return stands now, she would have been taxed only on capital gains of $2.575 million relating to the work of art.

"It looks like it is $5 million in unreported income. That's a considerable difference in gain that was not taxed," Mr. Schlesinger said. He noted that it was difficult to determine precisely what Mrs. Astor would owe because of variables like the alternative minimum tax and offsetting capital losses that could affect such calculations.

Mr. Marshall's lawyers provided few details about how the capital gains from the sale of the Hassam painting came to be substantially under-reported in Mrs. Astor's 2002 tax return. One of his lawyers, Kenneth E. Warner, would only briefly address the matter via e-mail.

Mr. Warner said that Mr. Marshall "does not know how the mistake got made." Mr. Warner said that as part of the court case concerning Mrs. Astor, Mr. Marshall saw the document for the first time since it had been submitted to the Internal Revenue Service in 2003.

As soon as Mr. Marshall noticed it, "he immediately gave us instructions to notify Chase so that it could be corrected without delay."

Mr. Warner would not say whether Mr. Marshall, who was granted power of attorney by his mother in November 1978 and held that authority in 2003, had signed the tax return.

Mr. Fagen, the lawyer for J. P. Morgan Chase, would say only that the bank was reviewing Mrs. Astor's financial records and that "one goal is to assure that she is in compliance with her legal obligations."

Alan M. Pollack, a lawyer for the Long Island accounting firm that prepared the return, Samuel Cohen & Company, which he noted had done work for Mrs. Astor for about 25 years, said the firm had not committed any errors when it filled out the schedule concerning the sale of the painting.

"Samuel Cohen & Company fulfilled its professional obligations to its client, did not make unilateral decisions about Mrs. Astor's taxes and was provided the information about the painting by one of Mrs. Astor's representatives," Mr. Pollack said.

He added that he did not feel it was appropriate to identify that person because of the continuing court proceedings in the Astor case.

Robert Marvin, a spokesman for the I.R.S., said federal law prevented him from answering any specific questions about Mrs. Astor's tax return. But asked about how the agency decides to pursue a case for prosecution, he said that as a general rule, a referral is made to the Department of Justice when the I.R.S. has evidence that an omission from a tax return was "willful."

"A financial analysis or investigation often determines whether the omission is unintended or a willful attempt to evade payment of taxes," Mr. Marvin said.

In court papers filed last week by Mr. Marshall's lawyers, new details were provided about the sale of Mrs. Astor's Hassam piece to the Gerald Peters Gallery. Mr. Marshall said that in the fall of 2001, he and his mother had the painting shown at the Adelson Galleries Inc. on the Upper East Side. During that time, Mr. Marshall and his mother talked about selling the painting if it generated any interest, according to the filing.

"Not long after the Adelson exhibition ended, a potential buyer approached me about purchasing the painting," Mr. Marshall said in the filing. "When I told my mother how much was being offered, she decided to sell it, and to share some of the profit with me by paying me a 'commission' for arranging the purchase."

Those who know Mrs. Astor have questioned whether she would have wanted to sell the Hassam painting.

Although her 1993 will stipulated that the work of art was to be sold after her death, two of her wills after that, in 1997 and 2001, stated that the painting was to be bequeathed to the Metropolitan Museum of Art, provided the museum displayed the piece as part of its permanent collection. Otherwise, the painting was to go to a New York City institution that would agree to permanently display it.

DOJ_NMG_0068489

Mrs. Astor's most recent will, dated Jan. 30, 2002, shortly before Mr. Marshall sold the painting, does not mention it by name.

But one of Mr. Marshall's lawyers said the 2002 will says that any works of art that are not specifically bequeathed are to be sold.

The IRS Works In Mysterious Ways (LAT)

Steve Lopez Points West

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

Pastor William Turner Jr. is a robust man with an unshakable set of beliefs, and he's never been shy about sharing them with the congregation of his New Revelation Missionary Baptist Church in Pasadena.

He has preached against same-sex marriage, stem cell research and abortion. And he has proudly boasted to President Bush about converting 80% of his congregation from Democrat to Republican.

"I salute and support you President Bush and will work untiringly for your reelection," Turner wrote to the president in February 2004, telling him he had done the same for former California Gov. Pete Wilson. Turner also wrote to fellow African American clergymen in support of Bush in 2004, saying that "any gay, homosexual, lesbian and/or immoral act is an abomination against God."

Roughly two miles away from Turner's church is All Saints Episcopal Church, which has a radically different political bent. The same year Turner took up Bush's cause, the Rev. George Regas delivered a guest sermon at All Saints involving a mock debate between Bush, John Kerry and Jesus. In the debate, Jesus said that Bush's preemptive strike on Iraq "has led to disaster."

So which of these two churches is under investigation by the Internal Revenue Service for taking sides in political contests?

The latter. Your precious tax dollars are paying for an inquisition of All Saints by the Internal Revenue Service, which has demanded church records and ordered rector Ed Bacon to testify at a hearing next month.

Look, All Saints' politics are pretty clear, and it's not hard to guess which presidential candidate Regas might have been more sympathetic to. But it's hard to believe that the IRS wouldn't have better things to do and bigger fish to fry. The tale of these two churches proves just how arbitrary, fickle and goofy the federal agency's actions can be.

"This is completely ridiculous, what the IRS is doing" to All Saints, says USC Law School Dean Ed McCaffery, a specialist in tax law. He said the IRS has every right to make sure nonprofits abide by the rules, but he doesn't believe the sermon in question comes anywhere near the legal definition of picking sides.

So is this investigation politically motivated?

The IRS makes it impossible to find out. Conservative and liberal churches have both been targeted, but the tax agency won't say which churches it's investigating or why.

The only reason we know All Saints is being investigated is that the church went public.

After a portion of the 2004 sermon was quoted in The Times, the IRS sent All Saints a letter describing Regas' words as a "searing indictment of the Bush administration's policies in Iraq." The letter also raised an issue with the reverend's calling tax cuts for the wealthy "inimical to the values of Jesus."

It's possible that All Saints' politics got the attention of someone up the ladder in the IRS, said McCaffery. He said he wouldn't be surprised if senior officials in the U.S. Treasury Department or the White House had given the green light to continue pressing the case against All Saints.

All Saints, which could not possibly have bought better publicity, pondered its next move last week while supporters rallied to its cause. On Thursday, Bacon announced to cheers that the church would defy the IRS.

He cited an obligation to Episcopal faith, which "calls us to speak to the issues of war and poverty, bigotry, torture and all forms of terrorism … always stopping short of supporting or opposing political parties or candidates for political office." It was imperative, he said, to "defend the freedom of pulpits in faith communities throughout the land."

Given the church's liberal politics, Bacon has an unlikely ally.

"I don't know why the IRS is singling them out," said Pastor Turner, who told me he was praying for his brothers at All Saints.

He said he thought the use of Jesus in a mock debate bordered on mockery, but he said he doesn't have a problem beyond that.

If the IRS is going after All Saints, I told Turner, shouldn't they be knocking down his door?

DOJ_NMG_0068490

Turner said he's never promoted a candidate directly from the pulpit, and he thought the distinction put him in the clear. It's a notion that McCaffery later discounted outright, saying the law recognizes no such distinction between what is said from the pulpit versus the desk of the pastor.

I told Turner that I believe he ought to have a right to tell his flock whatever he wants to, and I feel the same way about Regas and Bacon. I'm just not sure I want to pay for them to have that privilege, but that's essentially what we're all doing given their tax-exempt status.

That's a fair question for debate, McCaffery said, but it presents a problem: If religious institutions didn't enjoy tax-exempt status, people would get no deduction for their charitable contributions. It could mean that some religious institutions would go under, and we'd lose all the social services they provide.

As an agnostic, I'm happy to have the debate. Especially since religious fervor cuts both ways and has done a world of harm as well as a world of good.

I'd also like to have someone explain why a church can support a ballot initiative but not a candidate, and why the federal government thinks it's OK for one minister to call homosexuality an abomination but unacceptable for another to ask if Jesus would be pro-war.

Turner argued that on social issues, he speaks not for any political cause, but for Jesus and the Bible.

Wasn't Regas doing the same?

McCaffery guessed that if the IRS dropped in on 10 churches, it would find nine that are politicking one way or another. What Congress ought to do, he said, is revisit the subject and clarify exactly what tax-exempt institutions can and can't say or do.

Until then, the IRS' finest should forget about the Prince of Peace sermon, roll up their sleeves and go after tax dodgers, deadbeats and cheats.

Reach the columnist at steve.lopez@latimes.com and read previous columns at latimes.com/lopez

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Legal Aid Program Tried To Oust Auditor (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Directors of the government's legal aid program for the poor secretly debated how to fire the auditor who exposed their expensive meals, use of limousine services and headquarters move to a ritzy neighborhood.

Meeting transcripts obtained by The Associated Press show that Legal Services Corp. board members in 2005 and 2006 disparaged Inspector General Kirt West, whose job is to find fraud, waste and abuse.

In private, the board derided West as abusive, a character assassin, a shoddy investigator with a delusional staff and someone with a "fetish" for independence — even though independence is an inspector general's hallmark.

Board members warned themselves to be careful in their actions toward the internal watchdog, fearful that retaliation would anger Congress and jeopardize their federal dollars.

While board members complained among themselves about how much time they spent discussing their watchdog, the corporation said in a public report that the program for free legal help turned away half the applicants for lack of resources.

Some board members expressed their fears of angering Congress, the source of their funding, by leaving the perception they were retaliating against the inspector general who investigated their actions.

Those fears proved accurate when the board was ready to discuss West's status at a meeting in St. Louis last April. Two senators and a House member, who learned the directors had secretly debated firing West in secret meetings, were convinced that the board would take action in the April session.

Just as the directors were ready to convene after lunch, a congressional aide hand-delivered a letter to the board chairman, Atlanta lawyer Frank Strickland.

Sens. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, and Michael Enzi, R-Wyo., and Rep. Christopher Cannon, R-Utah, warned Strickland that any attempt to fire West "would be an egregious action in light of the fact that Mr. West is investigating you, the LSC board, as well as your president."

West still has his job.

He conducted an expansive review of spending by board members, who are part-time, and top full-time program executives. According to an Associated Press account in August, some of the questionable spending that West brought to light included:

_$14 "death-by-chocolate" desserts.

DOJ_NMG_0068491

_$400 for a car and driver to take Strickland and other officials to attend meetings and functions within cab distance of the Legal Services headquarters.

_$200 taxi rides in Ireland by the Legal Services president, Helaine Barnett, who was attending a conference.

West also reported the corporation was overpaying by as much as $1.8 million on its 10-year lease in its new headquarters in the upscale Georgetown section of Washington. He also found that the corporation could be overpaying by $7 million for unneeded space.

The board's vice chairman, University of Virginia law professor Lillian BeVier, headed the committee that was evaluating the inspector general. According to a transcript of the board's January 2006 meeting, BeVier summed up comments by a board colleague, Baltimore attorney Herbert Garten:

"I mean I understood Herb to say we should basically say 'You're fired,'" said BeVier.

"Yes, that's my opinion," replied Garten, a Baltimore lawyer. But Garten said he agreed with the board chairman on the need for a formal review to establish a record of the watchdog's performance.

BeVier also addressed board member Thomas Meites, a Chicago lawyer.

"You're just willing to ... take the steps to get him removed, as opposed to a probationary period or you've got six months or something," she said. Meites said he, too, agreed with the chairman that "basic fairness" required a formal review that would give the watchdog a chance to defend himself.

BeVier said, "He should know that he's got ... to shape up or we will ship him out." Then Meites said, "I can't tell you how little I want to spend any time with this guy."

West declined comment on the board discussions, as did Strickland, the board chairman. Both are scheduled to testify Tuesday before a House Judiciary subcommittee led by Rep. Cannon.

Garten declined comment. Messages left with Meites were not returned.

BeVier said in an interview the board had not decided whether to fire West and would not have done so at the April meeting.

"What we were trying to do was find a way to make a decision and find out whether impressions some members had were correct" about West's performance, she said.

Cannon has introduced a bill that would require votes of nine of the 11 Legal Services board members to fire the inspector general; a majority is required now.

The Utah Republican said in an interview that any attempt to fire the inspector general was "unseemly," and "the effect will be much harsher scrutiny by Congress on their activities."

"Instead of scapegoating this guy they should be looking at themselves and solving problems," Cannon said.

Added Sen. Grassley: "It looks like the Legal Services Corporation is busy looking for ways to shoot the messenger."

The nonprofit corporation is financed with a $330.8 million congressional appropriation. Most of the money is distributed to 138 nonprofit legal aid organizations across the country that provide free lawyers in certain types of civil cases — including housing, domestic abuse, worker exploitation, divorce, and Social Security benefits.

___

On the Net:

Legal Services Corp.: http://www.lsc.gov/

Is The Chief Justice Really A Judicial Activist? (LAT)

By David G. Savage, David G. Savage Covers The Supreme Court For The Times.

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

John Roberts, who likened his role to a passive 'umpire,' may want to do more than just enforce the rules.

ONE YEAR AGO, John G. Roberts Jr., at the time President Bush's nominee to be the chief justice of the United States, told senators that he aspired to be like an umpire, enforcing the rules of the game, not making them.

"My job is to call the balls and strikes, and not to pitch or bat," he said. "It is a limited role…. Nobody ever went to a ballgame to see the umpire."

Roberts suggested that modesty, humility and stability in the law were the goals of his umpire credo. Not to make law, like the activist judges he disdained, but merely to interpret existing laws fairly, mindful of legislative intent and the requirements of the Constitution. And during much of his first year, he did just that.

But in several cases, he behaved differently, joining Justice Antonin Scalia in dissents that would have rolled back a major environmental law and undercut states' traditional authority over the practice of medicine. Neither would have qualified as a modest act.

DOJ_NMG_0068492

On the eve of the court's new term in October, the question that was hanging in the air during his confirmation hearing remains: Will the new chief justice seek the right result, or the right's result?

In a surprising number of cases, Roberts brought together his liberal and conservative colleagues for unanimous decisions last term. In two important cases, he won the entire court's agreement for rulings that upheld laws passed by state lawmakers or by Congress, an act consistent with his judge-as-umpire philosophy.

In Ayotte vs. Planned Parenthood, the New Hampshire Legislature had passed a law requiring doctors to notify parents of girls under 18 who were seeking an abortion. Doctors were to wait 48 hours before proceeding. The only exception was to save the life of the mother.

The American Civil Liberties Union and Planned Parenthood sued on behalf of several doctors, contending that the law was unconstitutional because it did not include a "health" exception. In the past, the high court had said states may not regulate abortion in a way that jeopardizes the health of women. A federal judge and the U.S. Court of Appeals struck down the entire law for that reason.

New Hampshire appealed, arguing that the law allowed girls to go before a judge and seek a waiver in special situations. The ACLU lawyers said that was insufficient. If a girl is facing a medical emergency, she should go to a hospital, not a court, they said.

Roberts led the way in fashioning a compromise. There is nothing wrong with the law in principle, he said. States can require doctors to inform parents before performing surgery on a minor. Parental-notice laws had been upheld. And most young girls seeking abortions do not face a health emergency.

But the chief justice also said the doctors could seek a court order that would make an exception for true medical emergencies. On this basis, the Supreme Court revived the state law but sent the case back to New Hampshire so a judge or lawmakers could craft a narrow exception for medical emergencies.

Roberts also spoke for a unanimous court in upholding a congressional law, known as the Solomon Amendment, in Rumsfeld vs. FAIR. Several law schools and professors, citing the free-speech clause of the Ist Amendment, had challenged the amendment, which required colleges and universities receiving federal funds to welcome military recruiters on the same basis as other employers.

But in two other high-profile cases, the chief justice seemed to do more than simply call balls and strikes.

In 1994 and again in 1997, Oregon's voters approved the Death with Dignity Act, which allowed terminally ill people to obtain a dose of lethal medication from a doctor to hasten death. Two physicians had to certify that a person's illness was incurable and that they had, at most, several months to live.

The Supreme Court in 1997 rejected the claim of a constitutional "right to die." Justices unanimously said that "end-of-life" issues should be debated and decided by the states, not federal judges. That year, Oregon became the first and only state to authorize a limited but legal right to die.

In Washington, several conservatives in Congress, among them then-Missouri Sen. John Ashcroft, asked Atty. Gen. Janet Reno to intervene. They contended that the Oregon law violated federal drug laws because medications were being used to end a life. She refused, saying the Controlled Substances Act of 1970, which gives the federal government control over dangerous drugs and narcotics, did not take away the states' traditional authority over the practice of medicine and the licensing of doctors.

But when Bush made Ashcroft his attorney general in 2001, Ashcroft issued an order saying that doctors in Oregon could lose their licenses to prescribe medication if they gave dying patients lethal drugs. Oregon's governor, doctors and some patients sued, and a federal judge and the U.S. Court of Appeals blocked Ashcroft's order.

The case of Gonzales vs. Oregon came before the Supreme Court in Roberts' first month as chief justice, and a 6-3 majority ruled for Oregon in January. But Roberts joined Scalia's dissent, as did Justice Clarence Thomas. The three said the use of legal drugs for ending a life was not a "legitimate medical purpose" and could be banned by the attorney general.

If Roberts' side had been in the majority, it would have voided the voice of Oregon's voters, taken away the state's traditional power to regulate the practice of medicine and upheld a single federal officer's new interpretation of a long-standing federal statute that had not been endorsed by Congress.

In the other case, Roberts supported a sharp pullback in the Clean Water Act of 1972, which makes it illegal to discharge pollutants into the "navigable waters of the United States" without a permit. Because water flows downhill, the Environmental Protection Agency since the 1970s has said it has authority over all rivers, streams, channels, marshes and wetlands that may send water — and pollutants — to major lakes, rivers and bays.

But in Rapanos vs. U.S., Roberts joined Scalia, Thomas and Samuel Alito in calling for a new, sharp limit on the EPA's authority. Federal authority, they said, only applied to permanent and "continuous flowing" bodies of water, such as rivers and their main tributaries. This would have eliminated federal protection for most streams and wetlands in the interior of the nation and nearly all those in the West and Southwest because their stream beds are dry for part of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0068493

For more than three decades, these federal regulations on wetlands and streams had stood, through Republican and Democratic administrations and through GOP- and Democratic-controlled Congresses. Yet, with one extra vote, the Roberts court would have rewritten the scope of the Clean Water Act in its first term — not the act of a modest Supreme Court.

In this term, which opens Oct. 2, the court will take up at least two cases that will test Roberts' umpire approach to judging. One involves the federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, which makes it a crime for doctors to remove a fetus largely intact during a second-trimester abortion. Six years ago, in a 5-4 ruling, the court struck down a nearly identical state law and ruled that there was "substantial medical authority" to say this method was sometimes the safest and best method of performing a legal abortion.

But Congress held hearings and said this procedure was "never medically indicated." Most lawyers who follow the court expect the new law will be upheld on a 5-4 decision, thanks to the addition of Alito, who replaced retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Such an outcome would, after all, uphold an act of Congress.

The most intriguing test may come in the area of school integration. Most conservatives, Roberts among them, say the government has no business treating people in a different way because of their race. But many school districts use racial guidelines to limit enrollment in some schools. This is the only way to maintain racial integration in cities where housing tends to be segregated, school officials say.

The justices agreed to hear challenges from white parents who say these guidelines amount to unconstitutional racial discrimination. If the high court agrees with them, it would be a big win for the principle of "colorblind" government, and it could change the rules for school systems across the nation. But it may not signal the dawn of a newly modest Supreme Court.

Half A Reform For Judges (NYT)

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

During his confirmation hearings a year ago, Chief Justice John Roberts pledged to study the serious ethics problem posed by the well-attended "judicial education" programs staged at luxury resorts and financed by private interests hoping to influence judicial decision-making. Chief Justice Roberts followed through, but his chosen antidote is far too timid.

Rather than requiring judges to forgo the privately financed education-vacations, the new rules just put in place with the chief justice's backing by the policy-setting Judicial Conference of the United States mandate only expanded disclosure: the sponsor must file a public disclosure statement setting forth the content of the program and its financing. Judges will need to report their attendance within 30 days, and that information, along with the seminars' reports, will be posted on judicial Web sites. Another overdue change will require judges below the Supreme Court level to install "conflict checking" software on their computers to avoid participating in cases in which they have a financial interest.

The improved transparency is a positive step. But Chief Justice Roberts should have at least insisted that improved disclosure of judicial junkets be accompanied by other steps to cut back on the size of the travel gifts, like limiting reimbursement to judges to the cost of coach fare to get to the resort, and requiring judges to pay for their own room and board.

Rumsfeld Also Plays Hardball On Squash Courts (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 23 — For the last six years, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has slipped down to the Pentagon basement many afternoons, changed into a T-shirt, sweat pants and headband, and spent a heart-thumping hour playing squash.

There, no matter how the war in Iraq was going or how many Democrats were calling for his head, Mr. Rumsfeld could uncork his deadly drop shot, leaving his foe helpless and himself triumphant, at least for a moment.

In some ways, squash offers a window into Mr. Rumsfeld's complicated psyche, revealing much about his stubborn competitiveness and seemingly limitless stamina. Pentagon officials and employees say Mr. Rumsfeld's play closely resembles the way he has run the Defense Department, where he has spent six years trying to break the accepted modes of operating.

"He hits the ball well, but he doesn't play by the rules," says Chris Zimmerman, a devoted squash player who works in the Pentagon's office of program analysis and evaluation and is sometimes in the Pentagon athletic complex when Mr. Rumsfeld is on the court.

Mr. Zimmerman has never actually played his boss. But he says he has noticed that Mr. Rumsfeld, 74, often wins points because, after hitting a shot, he does not get out of the way so his opponent has a chance to return the ball, a practice known in squash as "clearing."

The almost-daily matches, Mr. Rumsfeld, a former Princeton wrestler, acknowledged last year, have helped preserve his "sanity'' in a period in which he and the administration have come under increasing political attack.

DOJ_NMG_0068494

Yet even the squash court is no longer the refuge it once was. This summer, two of the aides he played with most left his office for other jobs. Last month, Mr. Rumsfeld started to break in a new partner, Lt. Gen. Victor E. Renuart Jr. of the Air Force, a tennis player who agreed to take up squash after not playing for 30 years so the boss would have a partner.

Mr. Rumsfeld packed his squash racket for an August trip to Alaska but never played a game, even though aides reserved courts at two stops. On the last day of the trip, he delivered his most cantankerous speech in months, likening criticism of the Iraq war to appeasement of the Nazis before World War II.

This month, Mr. Rumsfeld had surgery on his left shoulder, repairing a longstanding injury unrelated to squash. He has not played since, though aides say he is eager to get back on the court after he heals.

Mr. Rumsfeld took up squash more than 20 years ago when he was a business executive. Rather than tricky bank shots off the walls, a move that better-skilled players favor, Mr. Rumsfeld plays with power, hitting the ball hard and ending points quickly. And he relentlessly attacks his opponent's confidence.

"When you try a shot and miss, he'll say, 'You don't have that shot,' " said Lawrence Di Rita, a close aide who played against Mr. Rumsfeld regularly until leaving his job at the Pentagon this summer.

Mr. Di Rita is a former Naval Academy varsity player more than 25 years younger than Mr. Rumsfeld. He says he lost his share of games and never went easy on his boss. By tradition, the loser posted the score on Mr. Rumsfeld's office door, so his staff would know when he had beaten Mr. Di Rita or his other main partner, his military assistant, Vice Adm. James G. Stavridis, who was also on the academy squash team. Mr. Di Rita concedes that Mr. Rumsfeld rarely offers or asks for "lets," a replay point when one player feels aggrieved.

On the court, "he is very aggressive and he is very intense,'' Mr. Di Rita said. "He is very good at getting inside your head. He's everything you would expect Donald Rumsfeld to be."

Mr. Rumsfeld has declined invitations to play against reporters, as well as to describe his game for this article.

Mr. Rumsfeld himself has suggested that his ideas about transforming the military into a smaller, more agile force, like the one he pushed for in invading Iraq, were influenced by his squash playing.

In an interview with the military writer Thomas P. M. Barnett last year, Mr. Rumsfeld said, "I play squash with him," gesturing at Mr. Di Rita. "When I pass him in a shot and it's a well-played hard shot, I saw speed kills. And it does. If you can do something very fast you can get your job done and save a lot of lives."

Many politicians have relaxed by competing, and Mr. Rumsfeld is not the first to have earned a reputation for zeal. As governor of New York, Mario M. Cuomo was known for his sharp elbows and tongue on the basketball court; as president, Bill Clinton exasperated his golf partners by taking mulligans, or do-overs, after bad shots.

In squash, Mr. Rumsfeld's main advantage over more capable and fitter players is that he refuses to play anything but "hardball," a variation of the game that was once common in the United States but has largely died out over the last decade. Most competitors now play the international game, which uses a softer ball and a wider court, requiring more running and allowing more creative shot-making. The harder ball favored by Mr. Rumsfeld tends to come back to the center of the court, so players do not have to move as much to return it.

The Pentagon gym had eight hardball courts when it was built in the 1940's. When a new facility was built in 2002, one hardball court was kept for Mr. Rumsfeld and the handful of other Pentagon employees who still play that version of the game.

But some who know him say Mr. Rumsfeld refuses to concede that the game may have passed him by.

"One time I saw Rumsfeld and I referred to hardball as an old man's game, and he just stared at me," says David Bass, a public relations executive who sometimes plays on the Pentagon courts. "It's become a running joke with us."

Nor does Mr. Rumsfeld lack for bravado. Mohamed Awad, a former champion player who was once ranked as high as ninth in the world, spent a half hour hitting with him last February at a racquet club in Munich, where Mr. Rumsfeld was attending a military conference.

Mr. Rumsfeld plays well for a man his age, Mr. Awad said. Afterward, he said, Mr. Rumsfeld suggested that he could outplay another septuagenarian politician still known for his prowess in squash, the 78-year-old Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak.

"I told him, 'That can't be right because I have played with Mubarak, and he is much better than you are,' " said Mr. Awad, an Egyptian who now lives in Germany.

Mr. Rumsfeld, he said, just laughed. Pentagon aides say that they do not recall Mr. Rumsfeld boasting about being better than Mr. Mubarak.

NASA Chief Heads To China To Discuss Space Cooperation (NYT)

By Warren Leary

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 23 — The leader of NASA arrives in China on Sunday for a tour of space agency sites, making him the most senior American space official to go to China to discuss possible cooperation between the countries' programs.

Michael D. Griffin, the administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, has repeatedly cautioned that the tour, which will include Beijing, Shanghai and a desert launching site in Gansu Province, will be an exploratory visit that will not result in any bilateral space agreements or formal partnerships.

"This is a get-acquainted visit that has no preconditions to it," he said recently. "We are going to see things and meet people, and see where that takes us."

China is the third country, after the United States and Russia, to have sent humans into space. It has been seeking more international cooperation in aerospace projects, but the United States has been reluctant. Much of China's program is run by the military, raising concerns about possible technology transfers or other national security issues for any such cooperation.

Working with China in space has also been hampered by other issues under discussion by the two nations, like weapons proliferation, trade agreements, patent and trademark enforcement, and human rights, said a senior adviser at NASA, who spoke on condition that he not be identified.

Recently, though, the American position has begun to shift. When Chinese space officials invited the previous NASA administrator, Sean O'Keefe, to visit their operations two years ago, nothing came of the overture. However, when President Hu Jintao of China visited the United States in April and made the same request of Mr. Griffin, President Bush accepted the invitation.

"There has been a policy decision by the Bush White House to do this," said John Logsdon, the director of the Space Policy Institute at George Washington University. "It's part of an effort to engage China, to open a dialogue that may influence their policies in other areas. But it's starting slowly and deliberately."

Accompanying Mr. Griffin on the trip is William Gerstenmaier, the associate administrator for space operations, Michael F. O'Brien, the assistant administrator for external relations, and Shannon Lucid, a veteran astronaut. Ms. Lucid, who is the daughter of Baptist missionaries, was born in Shanghai and is returning to China for the first time since her childhood.

The group will meet Sun Laiyan, the administrator of the China National Space Administration in Beijing and tour aerospace operations and science centers there before going to Shanghai to visit space manufacturing plants there.

Also scheduled on the five-day trip is a visit to the Jiuquan Satellite Launch Center, an extensive rocket-launching complex from which the Chinese prepare and fly their manned spacecraft.

The Chinese launched their first manned spacecraft, Shenzhou, in October 2003, sending one astronaut into orbit for a day. In 2005, a Shenzhou with a two-person crew spent five days in orbit. Chinese authorities said their third mission, set for fall 2007, will send up three astronauts and will include spacewalks.

This year, Chinese officials visiting the United States outlined their plans for an extensive program of manned and unmanned programs, including orbiting a small, staffed space station by 2015 and establishing a moon program that includes sending a robotic orbiter next year, a lunar rover in 2012 and a lander that would return a moon sample to Earth in 2017. While there are no immediate plans to do so, Chinese officials also have expressed interest in sending humans to the moon.

Vincent G. Sabathier, a senior fellow on space issues at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said that in the past, the United States had tried to contain Chinese ambitions in space but that this was no longer possible. China has major space agreements with Russia, Europe and most other nations with space programs, and is clearly striving to have a major role in the area, he said.

"The Chinese are going their way and have a strategy in place," Mr. Sabathier said. "They want to work with the United States and be accepted as a major player, and the U.S. is obviously now seeing some potential in working with them, which explains Mr. Griffin's trip."

Mr. Sabathier and other experts said the composition of Mr. Griffin's team, including the head of NASA's human space flight program and Ms. Lucid, whose five trips to space included a long stay aboard the Russian Mir space station, suggests that some type of cooperation in space may be under consideration.

Forget The Right Stuff. Can He Handle A Monkey Wrench? (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

DURING the just-completed mission of the shuttle Atlantis to the International Space Station, viewers of NASA TV were treated to the sight of two highly educated spacewalkers straining against a balky bolt with a wrench and a cheater pipe. They worked with the grunts and wheezes — but not the curses — familiar to anyone who has ever had to change a tire or hook up a bathroom sink.

DOJ_NMG_0068496

Then, after Atlantis headed back toward Earth, astronauts on the station had to take emergency measures when a finicky machine, the Elektron oxygen generator, overheated and melted a rubber seal, sending a stench and small amount of smoke into the closed environment of the station.

Ad astra per aspera, sure, but bolts and plumbing? The venerable Latin epigram, which means "to the stars, with difficulty," probably wasn't supposed to be about such mundane matters.

From now until the scheduled end of the shuttle program in 2010, however, every mission currently planned will focus on station construction, and astronauts will continue to wrestle with the occasional frozen bolt, malfunctioning gizmo or other glitch. So why does NASA send brainiacs — the two Atlantis spacewalkers had advanced degrees in physics and aeronautics — when the missions might profit from a couple of shade-tree mechanics and seasoned construction workers?

"It's obviously a legitimate question," said Robert Mirelson, a spokesman at NASA headquarters. "Do you need to be a rocket scientist to be an astronaut?"

"With all the space tourists," he joked, "there are probably some plumbers out there who could afford to go to the space station."

Mr. Mirelson argued that because they go to space in small teams, astronauts must have a broad range of skills. But they can't know everything, he said, so NASA's mission controllers have experts on call at all hours to advise them, especially when something goes wrong.

Mike Mullane, an astronaut who came to space by way of the Air Force, said he was the "Forrest Gump of astronauts" because he felt underpowered in the brains department compared with some of his credentials-heavy colleagues. He said he knew the importance of mechanical ingenuity: on a family trip, his father once nursed an overheated car across the deserted mountains of southern New Mexico by having the Mullane boys urinate into the radiator.

But, he said, that outside-of-the-box thinking might not be the best approach in orbit, where a mistake could bring on disaster. "You're never going to say, 'Oh, something's broken — I'm going to get the toolbox and rip into this,' " he said.

So astronauts work under the close supervision of mission control, an arrangement that hardly calls for mechanical genius, Mr. Mullane said. The work can be done by "anybody with a basic understanding of a screwdriver and a wrench," he said, "and even most Ph.D.'s have that."

Tom Jones, a former astronaut who has a doctorate in planetary science, said NASA's rigorous training instilled the ability to handle every task. "By the time you get up there, you're not bad as a person who can follow directions and deal with this equipment," he said. "We get by."

These days, Mr. Jones added, he feels confident tackling home and automotive repair work that he never did before his astronaut training. "What a wonderful gift from the taxpayer," he said.

Some astronauts are accomplished handymen. Don Pettit has stripped and rebuilt a jet engine in his home workshop. During his stay aboard the station in 2002-03, he cobbled together a camera mount that, with a power drill as its driver, could precisely track the relative motion of the Earth and station to produce spectacular long-exposure photographs. And, he said, he is far from unique. "You've got a lot of tinkerers" among the astronaut corps, he said.

Historically, Mr. Pettit said, NASA engineers on the ground have resisted the idea of astronauts fixing things in space, and have tried to make systems redundant so repairs won't be necessary. When he was on the space station, he recalled, he overcame engineers' doubts by repairing his wristwatch. "All of a sudden, they let me fix things" that were not originally intended to be repaired in space, like a broken freezer that was used for science experiments, he said.

Dr. Jeffrey A. Hoffman, a former astronaut who has a doctorate in astrophysics and teaches aerospace engineering at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, was in on the selection of several astronaut classes before leaving the space agency in 1997. As the science component of missions grew, they brought in more Ph.D.'s; later, as station construction loomed large, they selected more engineers and people with operational experience.

Any construction worker hired to go into orbit would be hard pressed to meet the other demands of the job and the complexity of the equipment, he said. "You can't just give somebody a space suit and tell him, 'Go build a space station,' " he said.

In any case, he said, it's too late for that. With the shuttle program set to be wound down by 2010 and the next generation of space vehicles years away, he said, "I think it will be a while before we select any new astronauts."

OTHER NEWS:

Governor's Race Tight (BSUN)

By Andrew A. Green, Sun Reporter

DOJ_NMG_0068497

The Baltimore Sun, September 24, 2006

Poll shows O'Malley holding a slight lead over Ehrlich

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley is maintaining his lead over Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. in the race for Maryland governor, a new poll for The Sun shows, having countered a barrage of critical commercials expected to intensify over the six weeks until Election Day.

Still, Ehrlich, a Republican seeking re-election, remains a popular figure in a state where Democrats outnumber the GOP by about 2-to-1. Voters give Ehrlich and O'Malley - both 40-something telegenic politicians - about equal marks on leadership and ability to move the state forward, suggesting that the contest could wind up very close.

O'Malley, a Democrat, has a 6-percentage-point lead among likely voters, 50 percent to 44 percent, about the same margin he held over the Republican incumbent in July. But it is a much smaller advantage than the double-digit leads he held last year before Ehrlich began campaigning in earnest.

"This campaign should be neck-and-neck in November," said Keith Haller, the president of Potomac Inc., which conducted the Sun poll.

The statewide survey of 815 likely voters was conducted Sept. 15 through Sept. 18, and has a margin of error of 3.5 percentage points. The survey reveals underlying trends and perceptions that offer signs of encouragement for both campaigns.

Four years ago, Democrats lost the governorship for the first time in 36 years, when Ehrlich defeated former Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend. But voters say they have more confidence in Democrats to handle state problems than they did when Ehrlich took office - a positive sign for O'Malley.

In a Sun survey in January 2003, state voters said Republicans were better able than Democrat to handle state issues by 41 percent to 39 percent. But since then, support for Ehrlich's party has steadily slipped, and support for O'Malley's has steadily gained.

Now 49 percent of voters think Democrats are well-equipped to handle problems, compared with 35 percent for Republicans, a 16-point swing in four years.

Richard Crane, a 57-year-old O'Malley supporter from Essex, said he sees the mayor trying to tackle the problems important to the middle class, and calls Ehrlich fixated about legalizing slot machines.

"Yeah, there are some retirees who take their quarters once a month and go to Dover Downs, but how much money is going out of state because people are moving because of high taxes, crime and poor schools?" said Crane, who voted for Townsend in 2002. "Those are the problems that Ehrlich should be addressing, and he's not, and those are the problems that I see O'Malley addressing."

But despite the surge for Democrats, the poll shows that Ehrlich remains largely untouched by the problems his party faces.

The Bush effect Although President Bush has seen some improvement in his standing nationally, he remains profoundly unpopular in Maryland, with 34 percent of voters approving of his performance and 59 percent disapproving.

That hasn't rubbed off on Ehrlich, despite O'Malley's nearly constant attempts to link the governor with the president.

Ehrlich's job approval rating isn't as good as it was early in his term, and it has slipped by 6 points since July, largely because of an erosion of support among Democrats. But now, as throughout his entire term, a majority of voters - 51 percent - think Ehrlich is doing a good job. The poll found that 38 percent disapprove.

Allan Hess, a 58-year-old Democrat from Cockeysville, said he disapproves of Bush because of the Iraq war but said that has nothing to do with Ehrlich.

Hess, who works at the Johns Hopkins medical campus in East Baltimore, said he's not impressed with O'Malley's performance in the city, especially on crime and schools, and thinks Ehrlich is a more solid leader.

"He's a really good speaker, and he's addressed some of the issues, maybe not to my full liking, but at least there's a plan there that's solid," said Hess, who voted for Ehrlich in 2002. "Martin O'Malley has a plan to do this and this, but how are you going to pay for it? It reminds me of the Richard Nixon-era 'I have a plan to get out of Vietnam' but no specifics."

O'Malley has the solid support of his party's base. Liberals back him overwhelmingly - 81 percent to 11 percent - and Democrats back him by a 70 percent to 19 percent margin.

Moderate support But he also retains a 15 percentage point lead among moderate voters, the sort who abandoned the Democratic Party to support Ehrlich in 2002.

Another positive sign for the mayor is that he holds a 17 percentage point lead among frequent voters, the ones most likely to come to the polls if turnout is low, as it was in this month's primary.

Lester Sussman, 80, a poll respondent from Mount Washington, said he voted for Ehrlich in 2002 but plans to vote for O'Malley this year.

"He had an unenviable task in the city," Sussman said. "I don't think anyone could overcome something like that."

"It's more that I dislike Ehrlich. ... I don't like the way he stuffed the [Public Service Commission,]" Sussman said, referring to discontent over how the governor's appointees handled this year's BGE rate increase.

Ehrlich has solid support from his base, too. Even after pitching himself as a centrist and emphasizing in his campaign moderate- and liberal-friendly policies such as support for stem cell research and tighter air pollution rules, the governor retains the strong support of Republicans and conservatives. Likely voters who identify themselves as conservatives back Ehrlich 73 percent to 19 percent, and Republicans support him by an 81 percent to 12 percent spread.

Timothy Lang, 49, a construction company owner from Glen Burnie, rates Ehrlich's job performance as "not perfect, but not bad." The conservative Republican said deciding to vote for the governor is a no-brainer.

"He's a Republican, a conservative," Lang said, whereas O'Malley "toots a horn that don't deserve to be tooted."

The gubernatorial match-up results stand in contrast to the increasing confidence Ehrlich and his aides have displayed in recent days. They have repeatedly insisted that the governor is now leading in his internal polls and have even claimed that O'Malley's private surveys show the same thing. The mayor's campaign has said that's not true.

Echoes of 2002 On the campaign trail, Ehrlich has sought to frame this election as a repeat of the 2002 contest. Although he's the incumbent, he pitches himself as an insurgent campaigner, a change agent to break up the "Democratic monopoly" in Annapolis. On the stump, he tells supporters that the race is breaking for him, just as the 2002 campaign did.

"What you feel is actually happening," Ehrlich told the crowd that surrounded him at the Frederick County Fair last week. "We have the opportunity to win this race not close. We have the opportunity to have this race called at 8:01 p.m. on election night. That's where all the trend lines are going."

But the Sun poll shows signs that this race is not unfolding for Ehrlich as the last one did. In 2002, Ehrlich was a relatively unknown congressman whose candidacy caught fire as doubts about Townsend began to take root. Within a few months, Ehrlich had erased a 27-percentage point deficit and brought the race to a dead heat by this point in the election cycle.

Closing the gap This time, the gap is closing more slowly.

In part, that's because his base in the Baltimore suburbs, the crucial swing area in the 2002 race, isn't as strong as it was then. His approval ratings show he remains popular in the suburbs, but so far that isn't translating into the kind of advantage over O'Malley he enjoyed over Townsend.

Rep. C.A. Dutch Ruppersberger, the former Baltimore County executive and a strong O'Malley supporter, said before the poll was taken that the one key indicator of this race is how the candidates are doing in Baltimore County, Ehrlich's home jurisdiction, where he won almost his entire margin of victory in 2002.

Last time, Ruppersberger said, Ehrlich won the county by more than 20 percentage points. If he wins by only 10 this time, Ruppersberger said, he will lose the race.

Ehrlich said at a recent campaign stop that his goal for the county is 60 percent - "The first lady says 65," he joked. But the Sun poll shows he's now leading there by just 5 percentage points, 46 percent to 41 percent. At this point in 2002, the Sun poll found he was leading in the county 58 percent to 31 percent.

The new poll shows Ehrlich and O'Malley are in a statistical tie in the Baltimore region, which includes Baltimore, Anne Arundel, Howard, Carroll and Harford counties - as well as the city. Apart from Baltimore City, Ehrlich carried each of those jurisdictions by wide margins in 2002.

Voters gave a strong indication of how close the election could be when presented with a series of head-to-head comparisons about the skills and ideas Ehrlich and O'Malley bring to the race. On every one, the two were within a few points of each other or in a tie.

Leadership Ehrlich got a narrow edge on which candidate is a leader, 44 percent to 41 percent, and he tied O'Malley - 40 percent to 40 percent - on a question of who would best be able to improve public schools.

Voters usually give Democrats higher marks on education, but this figure suggests that questions about the city school system, which have been a centerpiece of the Ehrlich campaign, give the Republican an unusual opening on the issue. However, the numbers also show that the governor's focus on city schools in speeches and television ads in the last two months has done little to sway voters' perceptions; in July, O'Malley led in this measure by 5 points.

The mayor has a slight lead on the question of which candidate is more innovative or has better ideas, 44 percent to 39 percent, and on which candidate shares the voter's values, 43 percent to 39 percent.

On the question of which one is better able to move the state forward - which both campaigns have spent their time trying to answer for voters - they are essentially tied: O'Malley 44, Ehrlich 43.

James Elliot, 84, a retiree from Lutherville who voted for Ehrlich in 2002, said his decision this year is going to be a tough call.

"I think he's a good man," Elliot said of O'Malley.

And what about Ehrlich?

DOJ_NMG_0068499

"I think he's a pretty good man, too," Elliot said.

Crist Has Slim Edge Over Davis In Poll (FLSUNSEN)

By Mark Hollis, Tallahassee Bureau

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, September 24, 2006

TALLAHASSEE · Republican Charlie Crist leads Democrat Jim Davis by 6 points in the latest South Florida Sun-Sentinel poll on the governor's race, but undecided voters who favor Davis on key issues could drive the contest even closer.

With roughly six weeks remaining until the Nov. 7 election, only 7 percent of Florida's likely voters are undecided. Crist and running mate, Jeff Kottkamp, would get votes from 49 percent of those polled. Davis and his running mate, Daryl Jones, are favored by 43 percent, while other candidates in the race collectively get approval from 1 percent of those sampled.

Davis, a Tampa congressman, could make up ground on Crist, the state's attorney general, by stressing education themes to appeal to undecided "independents," blacks and women, the poll shows. Many of those voters are leaning toward Davis' stance on public school policies.

And many black voters, the poll reveals, are energized by Davis' selection of a lieutenant governor running mate who is black.

"There's no question that this race can tighten, and it probably will tighten," said pollster Del Ali. "The real silver lining for Davis" is that voters still don't know much about him. Davis' name recognition is low, with 59 percent of voters overall saying they don't even have an opinion about him.

"Davis has a lot more room to grow for people to view him favorably," Ali said. "Once they view him favorably, they can turn into his votes."

Those potential votes could come from people like poll respondent Marcia Suarez, 44, a Boca Raton Republican who is undecided. "I like Crist. I tend to vote Republican, because they are usually tougher. But I'd consider a Democrat."

The statewide telephone survey of 600 likely voters was conducted Sept. 18-20 for the Sun-Sentinel and Florida Times Union by Maryland-based Research 2000. The poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percent.

Crist is favored heavily by Republicans and slightly by independents, who will be key in the final weeks of the race. Independents comprise one-fifth of the likely turnout, and 10 percent of them are undecided. The rest favor Crist by 6 points.

Black voters, who traditionally align with Democratic candidates, comprise about 12 percent of the electorate. Twenty-two percent of blacks surveyed are undecided in the governor's race. And women are favoring Davis by 3 percentage points, with 8 percent of them still unsure.

The poll confirms that Davis has already helped himself draw support from blacks by selecting Jones as his running mate. Jones would become the first black lieutenant governor in state history.

Most voters say the running mate selection doesn't make a difference as to whom they'll pick for governor. But for blacks this year, it seems to matter. Without being told by pollsters that Jones is black, 56 percent of blacks surveyed said they are more likely to back Davis for having selected Jones. By comparison, 63 percent of all voters say the running mate selection doesn't affect their decision.

Even more important for Davis, independents, blacks and women all are indicating they are more compatible with Democrats when it comes to education policies, which voters overwhelmingly say is their top concern for the state.

More than a third of the independents agree with Davis in saying that Florida isn't spending enough on public schools. And by a 2-to-1 margin, they reject the state's FCAT, the importance of which Davis says he would downgrade. Crist says he would continue to depend on the Florida Comprehensive Assessment Test for grading schools, and student and teacher performance.

"[Davis] has an easier time [appealing] to independents based on where the candidates stand on the issues, such as education, more so than Crist," said Ali.

Anti-incumbency sentiments and opposition to President Bush are high nationwide and could pose a challenge for Crist, Ali said, if voters begin to link him too closely to national Republican leadership. But so far, Ali said, the poll shows Florida voters largely approve of the president's younger brother, Republican Gov. Jeb Bush, giving Crist insulation from this year's anti-incumbent, anti-George Bush surge.

Three other state offices -- attorney general, chief financial officer and agriculture commissioner -- are too close to call at this stage. The possibility remains, though, according to the poll, that the Florida Cabinet this year could switch from all-Republican to all-Democratic, which could have enormous implications for various state policies dealing with matters ranging from insurance regulation to environmental land purchases.

The attorney general's race featuring Democrat Walter "Skip" Campbell, a state senator from Broward County, and Republican Bill McCollum, a former congressman from Orlando, shows signs of being very tight on election night. Nineteen percent of voters are undecided in that race, with McCollum holding a 42-39 percent lead.

DOJ_NMG_0068500

The chief financial officer battle includes a woman, Democrat Alex Sink of Tampa, against Republican Tom Lee, the current president of the Florida Senate. Lee is leading by a 10-point margin over Sink, with 16 percent of the voters undecided. So far, the poll doesn't indicate a gender gap, the pollster said, with Lee leading likely because of his better name recognition.

Incumbent Republican Agriculture Commissioner Charles Bronson hadn't been expected to face much of a challenge. But in the poll, he leads Democrat Eric Copeland by only a slight margin, with a fifth of the voters undecided.

Swann Has Trouble Catching On (PPG)

By Tracie Mauriello, Post-gazette Harrisburg Bureau

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, September 24, 2006

CAMPAIGN 2006 / Governor's Race

HARRISBURG -- You already know him as a football star and sportscaster.

Now there's another role Lynn Swann wants to play: governor.

It's a job subject to more Monday-morning quarterbacking, less celebrity and lower pay than Mr. Swann had in the NFL, but he's willing to take it on just the same.

Mr. Swann is a football Hall of Famer whose name appears on eight Trivial Pursuit game cards. And he commands more than $30,000 an event for his work as a motivational speaker.

The quest to take over the governor's office isn't about fame or money, he says. It's about reforming a state where, Mr. Swann says, taxes are too high, access to decision-makers is too limited and public money is spent too freely.

Mr. Swann says his interest in running for office was sparked by the 2001 terrorist attacks.

"Sept. 11 created in me more of a drive to find ways to serve at a new level," Mr. Swann said. His interest was reinforced a year later when he became chairman of the President's Council of Physical Fitness and Sports and in 2004 when he served as a campaign volunteer for President Bush's re-election campaign.

"Add to that a strong feeling that our state is moving in the wrong direction," Mr. Swann said. "That's what made me think about whether I wanted to seek the office of the governor of Pennsylvania."

He began discussing his ambitions with high-ranking Republicans such as Senate President Pro Tempore Robert Jubelirer, R-Altoona, who helped him secure the party nomination at a time when the GOP needed a visible, credible candidate to face a popular incumbent.

Polls show that defeating Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell, an experienced politician with wide support, will be an uphill battle, steeper than the GOP anticipated during nominating season last winter.

Six weeks before the election, Mr. Rendell has a double-digit lead, according to separate polls released Thursday.

The Keystone Poll by Franklin & Marshall College puts Mr. Rendell's support at 54 percent to Mr. Swann's 34 percent. The IssuesPA/Pew poll put Mr. Rendell farther ahead, 58 percent to 30 percent.

"In the early part of the year, the party saw the potential for Swann to really energize voters with his celebrity and his personable characteristics, and that he would be someone much more competitive at this point," said Christopher Borick, professor of political science at Muhlenberg College

Matthew Woessner, assistant professor of public policy at Penn State Harrisburg, agreed.

"Frankly, I thought Swann was going to be a formidable candidate and I'm very surprised that he hasn't caught on. My best sense is that there is no substitute for an experienced, thoughtful, seasoned politician like Rendell," he said. "As charismatic and intelligent and substantive as Swann is, he is going up against a master politician."

Mr. Swann says he isn't discouraged. A series of television commercials launched this month, relatively late in the campaign season, ought to help, he said.

He's counting on a decline in Mr. Rendell's poll numbers, spurred by renewed voter anger over the now-repealed pay-raise law, which the governor supported. The issue came back into the spotlight recently after the state Supreme Court ruled that the pay-raise repeal did not apply to judges.

With six weeks before Election Day, Mr. Swann needs whatever help he can get, whether by spikes in his own popularity or declines in Mr. Rendell's.

Win or lose Nov. 7, Mr. Swann's candidacy alone helps the GOP, Dr. Woesser and Dr. Borick said.

"I'm sure there are people in the party that do not have real optimism that he's going to be able to unseat Rendell, and they're not looking at him in terms of what effect he's going to have on the rest of the ticket," Dr. Borick said. "If he can energize the Republican base, who are more likely to vote straight ticket, other candidates might get a little bit of a push from that."

Celebrity's two sides

Mr. Swann has the kind of name recognition that no amount of campaign dollars can buy, yet he is hampered by the difficulty some have in seeing him as anything other than a jock.

DOJ_NMG_0068501

Even people who idolize Mr. Swann for his athletic prowess aren't necessarily aware of his political ambition.

Longtime fan Jeff Kaliner, of Wilkes-Barre, for example, walked past four or five Swann campaign signs at La Festa, Scranton's Labor Day weekend Italian festival, and still didn't realize that the "Swann" written on the signs referred to the football giant.

"I kept seeing these signs, but I didn't even think about it. I didn't realize they meant him," said Mr. Kaliner, who felt faint after shaking Mr. Swann's hand at the festival.

"Somebody hold me up. I'm in shock. This is the best thing ever," he said.

Observers say Mr. Swann's celebrity is both an asset and a hindrance as he runs his campaign.

"A lot of people see him as their football hero," Dr. Borick said. "It draws people to him and gets him attention, but it also creates a wall he has to get over to say, 'Thank you for remembering me as a football star but, in the end, I'm running on my ability to lead as a political figure.' "

That's tough for fans to grasp, even when Mr. Swann is accompanied by an entourage carrying campaign signs.

For a moment at La Festa, it looked as if Mr. Swann had gained ground when a worker at Kay's Pizza booth wished him luck.

"I'm hoping to turn it in a different direction now," Mr. Swann said.

"Yeah, I know," the pizza maker replied. "I'm hoping it'll be against the Cowboys this year."

Mr. Swann nodded and kept walking. As campaign season has progressed, Mr. Swann has limited his time with sports fans to give it more freely to people who stop him to ask about his politics.

"His celebrity got him into the race and helped clear the field for him, but it isn't enough," Dr. Borick said.

That's fine with Mr. Swann's supporters, who say he's got plenty more than football fame going for him.

"Everyone focuses on his celebrity. What they don't focus on is what it took to achieve that," former Lt. Gov. Bill Scranton said.

"He started from very humble beginnings. You don't achieve what he has without a lot of grit and determination," said Mr. Scranton, who sought the Republican gubernatorial nomination last year but backed out after Mr. Swann emerged in February as the party favorite.

"It wasn't a personal contest. It was about who could best deliver the message, and he won that contest. I completely support Lynn Swann," Mr. Scranton said. "He and I want the same things."

Pushing tax reductions

Those things include fiscally responsible government, lower taxes, fewer government regulations on farmers and an end to the state's tax on inherited property.

One major part of the platform is a plan to create a system of taxing property by tying payments to a home's purchase price instead of its assessed value. He also wants to prohibit tax increases exceeding the rate of inflation.

"We want a system that's fair and equitable, where you can predict your taxes 10 years from now," Mr. Swann said. "The predictability is as much a sense of relief as anything."

Tax reductions would be offset by budget surpluses, gambling revenue and savings from requiring school employees to enroll in a consolidated statewide benefits program. If that isn't enough to cover, Mr. Swann would dip into the general fund.

Critics from the Rendell camp say the plan is unworkable.

There isn't enough money to cover the reductions promised by Mr. Swann, at least $150 per homeowner in the first year, said Mr. Rendell's campaign spokesman, Dan Fee.

"Where is the money coming from if there isn't a surplus? There's not a big percentage of the budget you can whack because a lot of it is linked to federal mandates," Mr. Fee said. "Their plan doesn't work."

Someone with no political experience, Mr. Fee said, is not a good choice for governor of a large state with a $26 billion budget.

"He's simply unqualified," he said. "Being governor isn't just about making speeches. It's about making progress."

Even some of Mr. Swann's former teammates lack confidence in his abilities to govern.

"He's very bright, he's very articulate and he is hardworking ... but he is a novice to the political government arena," said former Steeler Dwight White, a lifelong Democrat who supports Mr. Rendell.

"There are some things you can only learn through experience and time. There are exceptions to that rule, but I don't know if I'm willing to toss the dice," Mr. White said. "It's not a personal thing. I like Lynn Swann."

Mr. Swann's supporters say his lack of political experience is an asset because he is not beholden to legislators and lobbyists.

"He's not politically connected and he has no agenda. His freshness and newness are huge assets," said longtime friend Gary Brown, a Mt. Lebanon businessman.

DOJ_NMG_0068502

"It's not like he's totally unaware of what would happen when he arrives in Harrisburg. He knows the issues and his fresh approach would be welcomed," said Mr. Brown, who met Mr. Swann shortly after the Steelers drafted the wide receiver in 1974.

Since then, Mr. Swann has gotten married, played on four Super Bowl-winning teams, had two children, been a spokesman for a company that makes fibers for sleeping bags, hosted the game show "To Tell the Truth," danced on stage with Gene Kelly and, to the amusement of friends like Mr. Brown, who know of his aversion to cold weather, covered the Iditarod Dog Sled Race in Alaska.

"Just because you're a success at one career doesn't mean you can't transfer those skills and do something else. Being an athlete and having a career in sports doesn't disqualify you from having success in other fields," Mr. Swann said. "I'm not just an athlete."

True.

He also is a TV actor, appearing on episodes of "Family Matters" and "The Paper Chase;" a motivational speaker; a businessman; a former national spokesman for Big Brothers Big Sisters of America; and a board member for H.J. Heinz Co. and Hershey Entertainment and Resorts.

Mr. Swann said his work and volunteer experience helped him hone skills that will transfer easily to the governor's office.

During about 25 years volunteering as national spokesman of Philadelphia-based Big Brothers Big Sisters, he learned about the plight of poor children in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, said Judy Vredenburgh, the organization's chief operating officer.

"With that insight and with his understanding of what people's needs and motivations are, his policies will make a huge difference for kids," Ms. Vredenburgh said.

Early life lessons

At age 12, young Lynn defied his mother, Mildred, who did not want her youngest boy to play a rough-and-tumble sport like football. He sneaked out, anyway, and joined his older brother at tryouts for Pop Warner football. Both made the team.

"My mother let me play, but she said, 'If you're going to play, you can't quit,' " Mr. Swann said. "Now, we had a Marine-drill-sergeant type coach who made us do pushups with weighted vests and run laps."

There were times, he said, that he thought about quitting, but that wasn't an option in the Swann family.

"My mom felt that if I was going to be doing something, I needed to be out there doing it fully. My mom always said, 'Don't give up,' " he said.

He didn't give up then, and he won't now, despite being down in the polls and in fund raising, he says.

"I'm trying to get the job done and I will push as hard as I can," said Swann, who has crisscrossed the state, making campaign appearances at a seemingly exhausting pace.

"I don't think about whether it's hard or easy. I just do what has to be done," he said.

Angelides Puts Iraq On Table (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

The gubernatorial candidate says he would immediately seek the Guard's withdrawal.

In a move to bolster his appeal among Democrats, state Treasurer Phil Angelides said Saturday night that on his first day as governor, he would call on President Bush to withdraw California's National Guard troops from the war in Iraq.

The Democratic nominee for governor said in a telephone interview that he would take court action against Bush if necessary to extract the state's National Guard members from Iraq. He said he would also urge other governors and members of Congress to join his effort.

"I will do everything in my power as governor of the state of California to bring our National Guard troops home," Angelides said.

At a Democratic primary debate in May, Angelides said governors lack the power to force the Pentagon to send a state's National Guard troops home from the war. But in the interview Saturday night, he said there might be some legal leeway on the matter.

Angelides said roughly 1,700 California National Guard troops are stationed in Iraq, but the number could not be verified on Saturday night. He also said he would not call for the withdrawal of several hundred California National Guard troops deployed in Afghanistan.

Earlier this year, Angelides opposed Bush's request to put other National Guard troops on the border with Mexico. Schwarzenegger agreed to send 1,300 Guard members there but refused a later Bush administration request for more border troops. The governor has maintained control over troops requested for border missions but not those sent to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0068503

The treasurer, who is trailing Schwarzenegger in the polls with little more than six weeks left before the election, plans to lay out his views on California's National Guard deployment in Iraq in speeches in San Francisco and Burbank on Tuesday and then in Sacramento on Thursday, aides said. The Angelides offensive on Iraq is part of his effort to remind voters of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's Republican roots and his support for Bush's reelection.

"Schwarzenegger has let our troops down by not speaking out against the war," Angelides said in the interview.

On NBC's "Meet the Press" in February, Schwarzenegger defended Bush's decision to invade Iraq.

"I think that we had to go in," he said. "There was a threat of terrorism. I think that it was the right thing to do."

The United States, he added, needed "to get out as quickly as possible, but also in a sensible way."

As for the state's National Guard troops, Schwarzenegger said he was not concerned that the Iraq deployment would leave California with too few to deal with an earthquake, flood or other natural disaster.

In response to Angelides' remarks on Saturday, Schwarzenegger campaign spokesman Matt David suggested voters would see the move as a campaign ploy. "California voters know the difference between a governor and a president," David said. "If Angelides wants to run for president, he should be spending more time at the Iowa state fair and less time in California union halls."

The move comes at a time of major difficulties for Angelides. He has trailed Schwarzenegger in raising money, and his main benefactor, organized labor, has yet to spend heavily on his campaign. Schwarzenegger, meanwhile, has made inroads among Democrats and independents.

Angelides faces a tough challenge in making the war in Iraq a decisive topic in the gubernatorial campaign. Public opinion surveys have found that California voters rate education, immigration and other matters as more important issues for the state to address.

But the war is a central focus of the national battle for control of Congress in the Nov. 7 midterm election. It is also one of the main reasons that the national political climate has soured for Republicans. With low turnout widely projected in the California election, Angelides is counting on that national environment to drive more Democrats to the polls, along with the independents who often side with them.

Angelides is also banking on a low turnout among Schwarzenegger's political base of conservatives, some of whom have been irked by his deals with Democratic lawmakers on vast public works bonds and other matters.

"It's going to be who has the most energized base at the end of the day, and that's where we're going to concentrate our efforts," Angelides media strategist Bill Carrick said in an interview last week.

In July, a Field Poll survey found 58% of Californians want the U.S. to withdraw all or some of its troops from Iraq. The poll also found that 67% disapprove of Bush's handling of the war and 61% disapprove of his overall job performance.

The most recent wave of Angelides television advertising is a Democratic Party spot that shows Schwarzenegger campaigning for Bush in Ohio, a crucial 2004 swing state, and mentions the troops in Iraq.

michael.finnegan@latimes.com

Akaka Takes Early Lead In Hawaii Primary (AP-Y)

By Mark Niesse, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Liberal incumbent Sen. Daniel Akaka held an early lead Saturday night over upstart challenger Rep. Ed Case in the Democratic primary after absentee ballots and early votes were released.

Akaka was leading 56.4 percent to 43.6 percent after 84,088 votes were counted. The figures do not include any votes cast Saturday.

Akaka had 47,446 votes compared to Case's 36,642.

Akaka, 82, has served in Congress for 30 years and drew on his experience to boost his candidacy.

Case, 53, tried to convince voters that Hawaii needs to elect a younger, more moderate senator.

Democrats Set To Air Ads In Bid To Derail Steele (WT)

By Jon Ward, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's assertive campaign for U.S. Senate since the Sept. 12 primary has prompted national Democrats to start running attack ads sooner than they had planned.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee originally bought $1 million worth of TV time for the two weeks leading up to the Nov. 7 general election, then decided to start running ads Tuesday, according to the Steele campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0068504

"This is a clear indication of the national Democratic Party bosses' scramble to maintain control over Maryland," said Michael Leavitt, campaign manager for Mr. Steele, a Republican.

Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic committee did not return phone calls, but has said he will not comment on strategic decisions in the campaign for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, who defeated Kweisi Mfume in the Democratic primary.

Mr. Steele, the first black person elected to statewide office in Maryland, says the Democrats' strategy against him was revealed as early as last spring when an internal party memo was leaked to the press.

The memo called Mr. Steele, 47, a "unique threat" to black voters' loyalty to Democrats and advised Maryland Democrats to begin a "persuasion campaign ... as soon as possible to discredit Steele as a viable candidate for the community."

"Connecting Steele to national Republicans ... can turn Steele into a typical Republican in the eyes of voters, as opposed to an African American candidate," the memo stated.

Mr. Steele also points to the illegal theft of his credit report by a Democratic committee staffer a year ago, before he had declared his candidacy. The staffer pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor in federal court and was sentenced to community service.

"The fact that they had to steal it speaks to the fear that they have of my campaign," Mr. Steele said recently. "Quite frankly, the only way they think they can beat me is to, as they said in their own memo, denigrate and demonize me."

Mr. Cardin, 62, rarely attacked Mr. Mfume, past president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, whom he defeated by three percentage points.

But the congressman from Baltimore has been following the Democratic memo's advice by attacking Mr. Steele for supporting President Bush's policies.

"We can't allow this seat just to be another vote for President Bush," Mr. Cardin said in a speech in Catonsville last week.

The state Democratic Party has set up a Web site called "The Real Steele" that has multiple pictures of Mr. Steele on stage with Mr. Bush at a fundraiser last year.

The latest Steele TV ad, in which Mr. Steele warns voters that critics will go as far as accusing him of not liking puppies is intended to blunt the effect of such criticisms and images.

"Soon your TV will be jammed with negative ads from the Washington crowd -- grainy pictures and spooky music saying 'Steele hates puppies' and worse," Mr. Steele says in the ad. He then pauses and says playfully, "For the record, I love puppies."

The ad was created by Brad Todd at On Message Inc., in Alexandria, after a conversation with Mr. Steele, who came up with the puppy idea. Mr. Todd is partners with Alex Castellanos, a longtime media consultant to the Republican Party.

Mr. Steele also has held several campaign events aimed at cutting into Mr. Cardin's built-in support among black voters in Baltimore.

The day after the primary, Mr. Steele stopped for a haircut in the primarily black section of Baltimore's Park Heights neighborhood.

Mr. Cardin, who is white and Jewish, has represented the neighborhood, which includes a section to the north that is heavily Jewish, for 20 years.

Mr. Steele told the crowd outside the barbershop, "When I go to the United States Senate, I will represent both sides of Park Heights. You're going with me to Washington."

Mr. Mfume's son, Christopher, attended a rally in Baltimore last week for Mr. Steele, and endorsed his candidacy.

The Steele campaign has also criticized Mr. Cardin after a staffer was discovered Sept. 15 to have posted racist and anti-Semitic comments on an online blog. The unidentified staffer has since been fired.

Sen. Burns, Tester Debate In Montana (AP-Y)

By Matt Gouras, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

U.S. Sen. Conrad Burns accused his Democratic challenger Saturday of wanting to raise taxes and weaken the U.S. Patriot Act, but brushed off allegations of ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Jon Tester, locked in a tight race with the three-term incumbent, blasted Burns during their debate for running up the federal deficit and claimed he has lost touch with Montana.

Burns didn't answer a question asking for details on his staff's relationship with Abramoff, saying the allegations are being trumped up by Democrats for political gain.

"There we go again — baseless allegations drummed up in a negative campaign that started almost a year and a half ago. We have answered those questions," Burns said. "What does that do for jobs in Butte, Montana? What does it do for jobs in any part of the state of Montana?"

Tester has made ethics a campaign centerpiece, and invoked Abramoff's name several times during the debate.

DOJ_NMG_0068505

"You have to have honest leadership, someone who will go to Washington and fight for you," Tester said. "I won't sell Montana down the road by cutting deals with lobbyists like Jack Abramoff."

They also disagreed sharply on the U.S. Patriot Act. Burns said it is needed to intercept calls placed to known terrorist phone numbers and gives law enforcement the same tools they use to fight organized crime.

"I don't think Mr. Tester understands this enemy," Burns said. "We cannot afford another 9/11. I can tell you that right now. He wants to weaken the Patriot Act."

Tester said the Patriot Act is eroding the very freedoms the terrorists are trying to take from Americans.

"Let me be clear. I don't want to weaken the Patriot Act. I want to get rid of it," Tester said.

During a Sept. 10 debate, a raucous crowd heckled and jeered Burns, forcing him to cut short his statements. This time ushers at Butte's Mother Lode Theater were on hand to keep the crowd under control and applause was banned until the end.

Fueling The Fire (NYT)

By Deirdre Mcnamer

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Missoula, Mont.

THIS state, in recent years, has gained a new season, and it's not one we like very much. High summer and early autumn as Montanans used to know them — bright, clean-edged and wild-yonder-blue — have given way to the sooty skies, red moons and general unease of fire season.

Runaway fire makes anyone edgy, even when you're not in its path or even very near by. And if you're in a neck-and-neck race for the United States Senate, you're not the soul of serenity to begin with.

Witness the Republican incumbent, Conrad Burns, toward the beginning of fire season in late July, when he gave an impromptu tongue-lashing to a team of firefighters at the Billings airport who were on their way back home to Virginia after a week on a 92,000-acre fire in southern Montana. Senator Burns told them they had done a rotten job and later said that the crew "didn't do a goddamned thing" and that they just "sit around."

Not the most politic remarks he could have made as he began to defend himself in earnest against a stiff challenge for his seat from a Democrat, Jon Tester, whose mantra is that Mr. Burns has lost touch with "Montana values," like defending the ordinary guy who's doing a hard, hot job.

Senator Burns apologized for his maladroit remarks and said he should have gone to higher-ups with any beefs he or some of his rancher constituency had with the way the fire had been managed. And he later sponsored an amendment to a military spending bill that bolstered federal firefighting dollars.

But the race heated up, and the incendiary remarks continued to fly. Mr. Burns lost the Montana cab-driver vote when he remarked that the country is up against a "faceless" enemy, terrorists who "drive taxicabs in the daytime and kill at night."

Nor has Mr. Tester kept foot out of mouth; in telling a reporter about the faith he has in his staff, he said, "Nobody has done anything to make me think they're trying to tomahawk me," a verb that delighted the state Republican Party spokesman, who said it denigrated American Indians, the state's largest minority group.

By the time the candidates convened for their second debate two weeks ago, even the audience seemed atypically fired-up for a Montana crowd that wasn't watching a sporting event in the strict sense of the term. The debate was held in Hamilton, in the Bitterroot Valley near the Idaho border, where forest fires had periodically been sending smoke hither and yon. As the candidates jousted, the crowd booed Mr. Burns and someone shouted "psycho" at him, and then a Burns supporter chastised the booers for rudeness.

Mr. Burns, who received more money from the disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff than any other member of Congress, accused Mr. Tester of being an unaccountable "lawbreaker" in his fund-raising practices. (He mentioned a $7,000 "slush fund" that Mr. Tester used for gas and meals on the campaign trail, and which the state's political practices' commissioner has said is legal.) The senator also accused Mr. Tester of failing to "report" a trade-mission trip he took to Taiwan as president of the State Senate.

In turn, Mr. Tester reeled off a longish list of Senator Burns's trips, including 10 to Las Vegas, as well as the names of the multinational corporations from which the senator has taken money. And so on, and so forth.

A good time was sort of had by some.

After the debate Mr. Tester drove up to Missoula for a block party I also attended. The suggested donation was $35, which didn't do a lot to erase Mr. Tester's financial disadvantage. (Senator Burns had raised $7 million to the Tester campaign's $1.5 million as of June 30.) It's a margin that's going to play out on the airwaves. "You're going to hear a lot of things that aren't true," he said with a weary grin. "Of course, all our ads will be the truth."

DOJ_NMG_0068506

The crowd cheered. Smoke had cleared from the skies the day before, and September looked the way it was supposed to look if it wasn't fire season. But it still was. And everyone in both camps knew it was going to get a lot hotter, and a lot smokier, before it was over.

Fla. GOP Activists Show Harris Some Love (AP-Y)

By Brendan Farrington, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Days after President Bush flew into the state and complimented U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, the congresswoman got some more love — this time from GOP activists at a rally Saturday.

It was one of the bright spots for Harris, whom party leaders had previously tried to force out of the U.S. Senate race before she won the GOP primary. She will face Democrat incumbent Bill Nelson in the November election.

State party Chair Carole Jean Jordan called Harris a hero, a term many Republicans used after Harris, as secretary of state in 2000, oversaw Bush's disputed 537-vote victory.

"Katherine has overcome tough times. She's a gutsy lady and we love her," said Jordan, who tried to get Harris out of the race before the primary.

The women hugged before Harris spoke.

"You have honored me. This race is not about me, it's about you," Harris said. "It's about each and every one of you and the citizens of Florida who deserve far more representation than what Bill Nelson has done. He's squandered these last six years in the United States Senate."

Nelson campaign spokesman Bryan Gulley said Harris was making "unfounded and wild charges."

"The fact is Bill Nelson is one of the most accomplished and successful freshman senators — with some 40 pieces of legislation to his credit," he said. "And he's been instrumental in keeping the oil companies away from the state's coast."

Before Harris won the primary with less than half the vote in a four-way race, Republican leaders in Tallahassee and Washington tried to find a candidate who could defeat her. Gov. Jeb Bush openly said she couldn't win the November general election, and Jordan wrote to her saying the same.

Harris is trailing Nelson by more than 30 points in the polls and by millions of dollars in campaign contributions. She has been tied to a corrupt defense contractor, given embarrassing television interviews and seen top members of her staff quit in frustration.

Also at the rally, Charlie Crist, Florida's Attorney General, took a couple of light shots at his opponent in the closely watched governor's race. Crist drew laughs as he poked fun at Democrat Rep. Jim Davis for having the second-to-worst attendance record for votes in the House while running for governor.

"I'm going to work as hard as I can. I love to work, unlike my opponent," Crist said. "I love to show up for work."

Davis spokesman Josh Earnest said Davis "will work to make things better for Florida families."

"Who's he been working for? He hasn't worked to lower property taxes," he said of Crist. "He hasn't worked to improve schools. He hasn't worked to address the property insurance crisis."

Battle Lines Sharply Drawn Over Iraq War (KCS)

By David Goldstein

The Kansas City Star, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON | Stay the course, or gradually start to pull back in Iraq?

Republican Sen. Jim Talent favors the former. "Complete the mission," he says.

Missouri Auditor Claire McCaskill, who hopes to unseat Talent on Nov. 7, says American troops should be withdrawn but not "precipitously," over two years, more or less. She says the American presence is a "crutch" keeping Iraq from making decisions about its future, even as Afghanistan heats up and the region grows more dangerous.

The war and what to do about it mark a deep divide between the candidates. Since fighting began in March 2003, nearly 2,700 U.S. troops have been killed, including nearly 50 from Missouri. Yet the violence has increased in much of Iraq, and earlier hopes that many troops could start to return home have faded.

Voters think the war is the country's biggest problem, according to recent polls. It has hurt President Bush's popularity and become a factor in many House and Senate races.

The Kansas City Star spoke to Talent and McCaskill separately about Iraq. | Excerpts from the interviews, A21

My Return To Balance (NYT)

By Robert Hicks

DOJ_NMG_0068507

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Franklin, Tenn.

I LEFT home — and my front-row seat for observing Representative Harold Ford's apparently quixotic effort to take the Senate seat being vacated by Bill Frist — two weeks ago to spend six days crossing the Atlantic by boat and a week using Jefferson's notes to retrace his tour of villages, gardens and great houses of southern England. What a difference a couple of weeks can make.

I returned the other day to polls showing Mr. Ford in a statistical tie with his Republican opponent, Bob Corker. While anywhere else this might not seem like a big deal at this point, Tennessee isn't anywhere else.

When I left, most folks I know, both old-time Southern Democrats and my new Republican neighbors in their McMansions, wouldn't have given the young black liberal from a family that seems always ready to stretch the bounds of propriety much of a chance in a statewide race. Particularly not against Mr. Corker, a very agreeable and successful former mayor of Chattanooga who easily K.O.'ed his more conservative Republican opponents in the primary.

In talking with my neighbors, however, I get the picture that several things are keeping the Ford campaign alive and thriving. Interestingly, most of them are to Mr. Ford's credit, and not the result of missteps by Mr. Corker. Truth is, Mr. Corker is working hard to bring political moderation to his campaign, and is doing a good job.

That said, Harold Ford may just be doing what folks down here thought he could never do. He is emerging as an electable Senate candidate in a state that has been moving deeper and deeper into the Republican ranks. In this, he seems to be emerging as part of that new class of sensible Southern Democrats, along with our Democratic governor, Phil Bredesen, who is coasting to re-election.

The governor has built his base as a fiscal conservative who believes in smaller government. That plays well with both old-line Southern Democrats and new-money Republicans in the Volunteer State. Similarly, Mr. Ford votes a bit like a card-carrying conservative on a few issues. He supported President Bush's No Child Left Behind reforms and optional school prayer. He has also voted to limit the amounts that trial lawyers can walk away with in class-action lawsuits. He is against same-sex marriage and late-term abortions.

On other issues, he has found a way to balance liberal and conservative ideas. On national security, he favors federalizing rules on drivers' licenses as a check on terrorists, although he opposed unwarranted wiretaps. And while in the past he supported most gun-control bills brought before him, Mr. Ford, like most of his fellow Tennesseans, is now a calling himself a "fan of the Second Amendment." All this smacks of balance and reason to a lot of folks. As Rick Warwick, my neighbor down the road and our county historian, told me recently, "You know, Harold Ford is looking more and more like one of us."

After the primaries, everyone assumed that at this point, Mr. Corker would be way ahead in the polls, with the race maybe tightening toward the end. Yet, if Harold Ford can continue to present himself as a "Bredesen Democrat" who believes that less government is often the best government, maybe, just maybe, we will have a real horse race of an election come November.

Tennesseans have a long tradition — going back to Andrew Jackson — of loving a good horse race.

A Campaign In Crisis Mode (NYT)

By Charles Baxter

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

Minneapolis

WHILE my assignment was to write about Minnesota's important Senate race, I think there's more to be learned right now from the far closer contest in Minnesota's Sixth Congressional District, which borders Minneapolis-St. Paul to the east, north and west. The race, between Michele Bachmann, the Republican, and Patty Wetterling, the Democrat, has revealed a Bush-era national trend now visible locally.

That is, we are facing a choice between a "conservative" who wants to institute radical reforms and a "progressive" who wishes largely to maintain the status quo. In Minnesota's Sixth District, liberalism is the new conservatism.

Ms. Bachmann, who was born and raised in Anoka, Garrison Keillor's hometown, is technically a daughter of Lake Wobegon, but there the resemblance ends. She holds a law degree from Oral Roberts University. As a Minnesota state legislator, she spoke out against the minimum wage, arguing that eliminating it would result in universal employment. She became well known for her tireless attempts to add a gay-marriage ban to the state Constitution. She has stated that evolution has a "cult" following. Concerning Iran, she has said, "We should not remove the nuclear response ... from the table." Her favorite topics are not local, but national, global and cosmic.

Somewhat predictably, she draws her support largely from evangelicals. The centrist Republicans I know — those few who are still around — tend to regard her as superficial. President Bush visited Wayzata, Minneapolis's most affluent suburb (though not in the Sixth District) to speak on her behalf. The two are quite in sync.

DOJ_NMG_0068508

Having allied herself firmly with the president's policies on Iraq and privatizing Social Security, she also advocates eliminating the estate tax. For supporting these radical reforms she is called an "archconservative," though what she is trying to conserve, other than large family fortunes, is never scrupulously clear.

Compared to Ms. Bachmann, a suburban radical of an increasingly familiar sort, Patty Wetterling seems rather tame and pleasant and sensible — conservative, that is. In the view of Ms. Wetterling (who came into local prominence when her son was abducted at gunpoint and disappeared in 1989) we are not in the end times but in a stable world shaped by well-financed public education, Social Security, benefits for veterans, a decent respect for the opinions of others, a reluctance to engage in foreign adventures, and balanced budgets.

As a former public-school math teacher, Ms. Wetterling has an aura of kindliness and good sense, as if she believed in a general social welfare that depends upon all citizens "joining hands," as a former Republican governor of Minnesota, Elmer L. Andersen, once put it.

But citizens don't join hands much anymore in Minnesota, nor are they encouraged to. The problem faced by politicians who wish to preserve the social programs enacted by their grandparents is that President Bush has been wildly successful at creating an air of constant crisis, both foreign and domestic. Crisis rhetoric, which is inherently radical rather than conservative, dissolves social stability.

In this sense, terrorism has infected every subject and every discussion, even locally. Alarmism has become so ubiquitous in discussions of Iraq, the decline of the family and financing for Social Security and education that polarization is assured. Extremity, after all, is more newsworthy than good sense.

This outlook has the effect of trivializing most local issues — who cares about farm-price supports when radical Muslims want to make Stillwater part of the caliphate? And it ensures that the volume will always be turned up to 11 — at least until everybody begins to suffer crisis fatigue and tries to calm down.

In House Race, Focus Shifts To Security (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

For much of this year, Representative Nancy L. Johnson, a moderate Republican from Connecticut, has run the kind of campaign she has run many times before in this swing district, focusing on domestic issues like health care and taxes, even as she distanced herself from her party's conservative leaders in Congress.

But in recent days, Mrs. Johnson has taken her campaign down a sharply different path, shifting the battle with her Democratic opponent, Christopher S. Murphy, to a new front, national security.

The day after the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, Mrs. Johnson began showing a television commercial assailing Mr. Murphy, a state senator, as weak on defense because he has criticized the Bush administration's program of warrantless surveillance.

Then, on Monday, Mrs. Johnson stood alongside Senator John McCain, a prisoner of war in Vietnam and a strong supporter of the war in Iraq, during an appearance in Danbury, Conn., before military veterans.

"The security of our people is my No. 1 priority," she told reporters before the event with Mr. McCain, a Republican of Arizona.

Her campaign has also begun referring to Mr. Murphy as a "Ned Lamont liberal," a pointed reference to the antiwar candidate who defeated Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, a vocal supporter of the Iraq war, in the Democratic primary last month. Mr. Lamont won her district with 52 percent of the vote.

It has not always been this way for Mrs. Johnson, who in her 12 terms in Congress — the longest tenure in the state's history — has earned a reputation as a serious policy thinker on health care and social programs.

Democrats say her tactical shift shows that the race has tightened and that she is mounting a negative campaign out of desperation.

But Mrs. Johnson's new focus on terrorism also shows that Republicans believe that national security is still a winning issue for them, even in a state where opposition to the war in Iraq is high, support for President Bush is low and their candidate is far better known for domestic policy.

Polls show that voters, despite qualms about the president and the war, still give Republicans an edge in dealing with terrorism.

Mrs. Johnson's moves coincide with an effort by Mr. Bush to make the case that tough defense policies have made America safer since the 9/11 attacks, but that the threats against the nation remain.

Though Mrs. Johnson has kept her distance from Mr. Bush on other issues, she has begun to echo that message with gusto.

DOJ_NMG_0068509

Her district is one of about 40 around the country that are deemed to be in play as the Democrats try to reclaim control of the House this fall.

Underscoring the importance of the race, the National Republican Congressional Committee plans to spend $1.2 million on television advertisements supporting Mrs. Johnson during the final weeks of the race, while the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee plans to spend $1.8 million to try to defeat her.

The new thrust of the Johnson campaign follows a bruising summer in which Mr. Murphy and at least one prominent liberal group, MoveOn.org Political Action, spent thousands of dollars seeking to portray her as an entrenched member of a Congress with ties to special interest lobbyists.

The Johnson campaign asserts that she has often defied her party's leadership, on issues including drilling for oil in the Alaska National Wildlife Reserve and stem cell research.

It also cites endorsements from organizations like the League of Conservation Voters as evidence of her independence.

Now, though, Republicans say that Mr. Murphy's criticism of the surveillance program has provided a golden opportunity to make the election a choice between two candidates with distinct views on national security and on other issues, instead of a referendum on the currently unpopular Republican-controlled Congress.

There is, of course, some risk for Mrs. Johnson in aligning herself more closely with the president, who in a poll last month by Quinnipiac University received an approval rating below 30 percent in Connecticut. The poll was conducted before the president began his public push on national security.

In an interview, Mrs. Johnson would not discuss the politics driving her decision to put national security at the forefront of her campaign. But again and again, in simple and stark language, she argued that her opponent failed to grasp the gravity of the threat.

"He doesn't understand the need for a tough policy," she said. "I want my constituents to know that the threat is real."

Under the surveillance program, the government, without warrants, has monitored the international communications of people in the United States.

The Johnson campaign has asserted that Mr. Murphy would force the government to go through the time-consuming process of getting a court order before wiretapping communications involving suspected terrorists.

Mr. Murphy has responded that the Johnson campaign is trying to distort his position, which he said would not cause delays in monitoring suspected terrorists. The Bush administration, he said, was violating the law by circumventing existing procedures, which allow the attorney general to authorize the emergency use of electronic surveillance provided that he subsequently seeks court authorization within 72 hours.

The campaign debate is so fierce that only an hour after Mrs. Johnson's event with Mr. McCain, Mr. Murphy accused her of "playing politics" with national security.

"I think it's pretty disgusting that Nancy Johnson has decided to politicize the 9/11 attacks," Mr. Murphy told reporters.

So far, Mrs. Johnson has pumped much more money into the race than Mr. Murphy, spending about $1 million compared with roughly $181,000 by him, according to their latest campaign finance reports. Both campaigns have large reserves of cash as they approach the final weeks of the race: $2.6 million for Mrs. Johnson and about $1 million for Mr. Murphy.

The Iraq war has not played as central a role in the contest as it has elsewhere in the state, where antiwar activists have put Mr. Lieberman and another strong supporter of the war, Representative Christopher Shays, a Republican, on the defensive.

The Murphy campaign has raised the issue, criticizing Mrs. Johnson for voting to authorize the military invasion of Iraq.

But while Mr. Lieberman and Mr. Shays have been outspoken in their support of the war, Mrs. Johnson has not talked all that much about her position, which is to support the president.

Beyond that, Mrs. Johnson's views about what to do in Iraq do not appear to differ significantly from Mr. Murphy's. Both are against an open-ended American military presence in that country, and both argue that Iraqis need to play a greater role in their own defense so that the United States can begin reducing the number of troops there.

Mrs. Johnson is opposed to a timetable for withdrawing troops. Mr. Murphy says that Washington should advance a schedule for withdrawing troops, to prod the Iraqis into taking greater control of their own security, but that the specifics of removing troops should be left to American military leaders.

Mrs. Johnson stuck to her strategy through the week, talking about national security again on Friday during an appearance in Waterbury to accept an endorsement from a political action committee representing veterans.

In the meantime, the Murphy campaign says it still intends to make Mrs. Johnson an emblem of the excesses of one-party control in Washington and what it describes as a Republican penchant for bestowing favors on big campaign contributors.

In particular, the campaign has cited the acceptance by Mrs. Johnson, one of the top fund-raisers in Congress, of tens of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions from the insurance and pharmaceutical industries in 2003, around the time she helped write legislation adding prescription drug benefits to Medicare. Democrats have complained that the new drug program would enrich insurance and drug companies at the expense of the elderly.

DOJ_NMG_0068510

But Mrs. Johnson has been aggressively promoting the prescription program and her work on it.

In an interview, Mr. Murphy said that Mrs. Johnson's attacks concerning national security would not resonate with voters because the Republicans have failed to address other security issues, including ports, and because the war in Iraq has made the nation less safe.

"It's familiar ground for them," he said of the Republicans' attempts to portray him and other Democrats as weak on national security. "But it's much more dangerous."

Basketball Legend's Campaign Gets An Assist From His Fame (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Jim Vandehei, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

But Sports Rivalry Could Rebound GOP Incumbent

MADISON, Ind., Sept. 23 -- From beauty shops to bars, Baron Hill says, he is besieged by people wanting to talk basketball.

Hill is not a coach. He is a Democratic candidate for Congress.

But that is not how he is known best in these parts, where a basketball goal stands in nearly every driveway. Hill is still the guy who was an all-star guard for Seymour High School -- 35 years ago.

Trying to unseat Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R), he does not hesitate to invoke his basketball credentials to prove his down-home bona fides. Hill still holds the school record for most points scored (1,419) and was inducted into the Indiana Basketball Hall of Fame in 2000 alongside a "hick from French Lick" named Larry Bird.

Hill, who still exudes an athletic air, sat for an interview in a coffee shop in Madison (population 12,000), whose Main Street could have been the set for "Pleasantville." Of basketball, he said, "When it comes up, I take advantage of it."

But Hill's heroics on the court have not always rebounded in his favor politically. In earlier races, he said, sports rivalries often cost him votes -- in precincts where fans with long memories could not bring themselves to support a Seymour star.

The Indiana 9th is a vivid reminder that control of the House will not turn solely on national debates over interrogation rules or the future of Iraq. Often, elections turn on voters' intuitive reactions about who better represents the values of a district.

Hill learned that lesson the hard way. After serving three terms in Congress, he lost to Sodrel by 1,400 votes in 2004 -- a defeat he is "still trying to figure out." One reason for the loss, he says, is that national Republicans were able to portray him as a liberal whose views were out of step with average voters.

Hill said he got the message: "I have to sharpen my image as it relates to values, even though I have my basketball credentials."

Those credentials are gold in a state whose basketball-as-civic-religion tradition was immortalized in the 1986 film "Hoosiers." (The movie is said to have been based on a 1950s high school in the 9th District.)

On Friday, Hill said, 20 people in Floyd County stopped him to chat about the latest Indiana basketball news.

In a district that includes Bloomington and its famed Indiana Hoosiers basketball team, it is no surprise that Hill is regularly recognized as the lithe point guard who carved up opposing defenses.

Hill recalls people packed cheek to jowl at every home game -- no small feat given that Seymour's gym holds more than 8,000 people and the town's population is about 18,000. "Back in those days, basketball was everything," said Hill, who graduated in 1971 and is 53 years old.

Although hoops is not so all-encompassing these days, Hill is hoping his athletic rÃ©sumÃ© establishes him as a credible messenger on the values so important to the district.

Hill's first two television commercials of the race are called "Values" and "Minister." The first focuses on his "Hoosier values," and the second attacks Sodrel for breaking a vow to a minister to run a clean campaign.

Not surprisingly, Sodrel is doing his darnedest to shatter that image. An ad paid for by his campaign alleges that Hill "just doesn't share our values."

Sodrel said basketball was a political asset for Hill -- before the Democrat went to Congress for six years. Sodrel said his opponent's votes against bans on same-sex marriage and flag burning are far more important to voters. "Basketball can't overcome that," he said. "He is out of sync with voters." Still, Sodrel said polls showing him slightly behind at this point are probably accurate.

A recent survey conducted for a news station in Indianapolis shows the Democrat with a 46 percent to 40 percent edge, and Hill confidently proclaims: "I am up. There's no question."

DOJ_NMG_0068511

At this time in 2004, Sodrel trailed badly in surveys. But his popularity surged -- and voters in the state resoundingly supported President Bush and Gov. Mitchell E. Daniels Jr. (R). Sodrel is on his own this time; neither Bush nor Daniels is popular in the district or the state -- as evidenced by the fact that three of the Democrats' best chances of defeating incumbents are here in the Hoosier State.

Observers on both sides believe this race will once again be decided by the narrowest of margins, meaning that a few hundred voters who remember Hill -- fondly or otherwise -- from his playing days could make a crucial difference.

Danny Brown, who played for Jefferson County High -- Seymour's rival -- still remembers Hill as a "very quick and very fast guard." Brown, a Republican, says he is leaning against supporting Hill but warns reporters not to underestimate the emotional tug basketball exerts on voters in this area.

Bill Harmon, a district resident who played against Hill as a freshman in 1971, has moved on -- sort of. He said losing to Seymour hurt bad -- but not bad enough to affect his vote. "That was 30 years ago, and you have got to let stuff like that go."

Political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb contributed to this report.

Unofficial Results Give Victory To Wynn In 4th (BSUN)

By Kelly Brewington, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, September 24, 2006

Veteran Rep. Albert R. Wynn appeared to have prevailed over challenger Donna Edwards in a fiercely contested 4th Congressional District Democratic primary after the last ballots were counted yesterday.

Seven-term incumbent Wynn edged Edwards by more than 2,000 votes, according to unofficial results.

Montgomery County elections officials were the last to record their tally of provisional ballots yesterday, 11 days after a primary election fraught with glitches.

Those results showed Edwards winning in Montgomery County, with 15,851 votes to Wynn's 9,129. But along with Prince George's County's results from a day earlier, Wynn was the unofficial winner with a total of 40,766 votes, compared with 38,091 for Edwards.

Neither candidate returned calls for comment yesterday.

The results will not be verified until tomorrow, after State Board of Elections officials confer with Montgomery County's elections board.

Edwards, a civic activist and former foundation executive, has threatened to sue over alleged voting irregularities in Prince George's County, where Wynn lives.

Incumbent Seen Winning Md. House Primary (AP-Y)

AP, September 24, 2006

A six-term incumbent congressman emerged Saturday as the apparent winner of a hotly contested primary after officials finished counting more than 11,000 provisional ballots.

The unofficial tally for the 4th District race gave Rep. Albert Wynn 39,482 votes, or 49 percent, and Donna Edwards 37,174 votes, or 47 percent. George McDermott was a distant third with 3,113 votes, or 4 percent.

The winner faces Republican Michael Starkman in November.

Edwards ran strongly in Montgomery County, where the provisional votes were counted, but could not overcome the incumbent's advantage in neighboring Prince George's County.

It was the toughest challenge Wynn had faced after taking at least 80 percent of the vote in Democratic primaries and general elections in six previous campaigns.

Edwards, a Prince George's County community activist, had attacked Wynn on the Iraq war, taxes and bankruptcy.

Wynn said he was campaigning on his record of delivering services and federal money for his district and called Edwards a "professional critic from the sidelines."

Neither candidate had an immediate comment on the results announced Saturday.

In Montgomery County, voters had to use provisional ballots when cards needed for electronic voting machines weren't delivered to polling places.

In the confusion that followed, many precincts ran out of provisional ballots. In some cases, voters made their choices on photocopied ballots or scraps of paper.

Edwards has threatened to file a lawsuit over alleged voting irregularities in Prince George's County, where voters were listed with the wrong party at polling places, polls opened late and there were problems transmitting data from precincts to the county election board.

___

DOJ_NMG_0068512

On the Net:
Maryland State Board of Elections: http://www.elections.state.md.us

Engel Calls For Funding Of Veterans' Health Care And Benefits (MIDHUD)

Mid-Hudson News, September 24, 2006

Washington – Congressman Eliot Engel of Westchester and Rockland counties has joined Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Members of Congress to ask President Bush to fully fund veterans programs.

The lawmakers sent a letter to the President asking that he provide the necessary funding for the Department of Veterans' Affairs health care system and related benefits programs. "Mr. President, the time is right for your administration to change course and fully fund the VA, cease efforts to shift the costs of health care onto the backs of veterans, and finally recognize and implement the concept of 'shared sacrifice' with respect to the federal budget," the letter states.

"I know that the Veterans in New York have done a great service for our country, and it is the Federal Government's job to see that they are given proper health care and have their benefits fully funded," said the Democratic Engel. "I am tired of the Bush Administration turning a blind eye to the needs of America's veterans when they return home."

Engel said theirs is a "simple request" to the President that he provide funding in the 2008 budget "so that our men and women returning from Iraq and Afghanistan receive the care and benefits they have earned and deserve."

The Montrose and Castle Point VA hospitals are located within the Hudson Valley – Montrose in Westchester County and Castle Point in Dutchess County.

HEAR today's news on MidHudsonRadio.com, the Hudson Valley's only Internet radio news report.

Many Hopefuls Keep Bush Ties Under Wraps (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Since President Bush's approval rating sank to the lowest level of his presidency in May, nearly six in 10 of his appearances helping Republican candidates have been closed to all media coverage.

Unlike his barnstorming leading up to the 2002 congressional elections, when he was more popular and the divisive Iraq war had not begun, Bush has yet to hold a single traditional campaign-style rally for one of his party's hopefuls this election cycle.

Every one of his events for GOP gubernatorial, House and Senate candidates has been to raise money from faithful Republican donors — not to urge support among the broader voting public.

The GOP's control of Congress is in danger. The tendency of many Republican candidates to keep their president under wraps is represented starkly in Bush's schedule in the week ahead.

Republicans hardly have abandoned their enthusiasm for having the president exercise his talent at raising money for their campaigns. But of six fundraisers Bush is headlining this week, all but one — for Alabama Gov. Bob Riley — are private, by agreement between the White House and the campaigns.

GOP Sen. Mike DeWine of Ohio, one of the more vulnerable Republicans, is a case study in the sometimes tricky dynamics of a president's assistance.

Bush is raising money for DeWine on Monday at a private home in Cincinnati. It is the third time the president will have helped the senator, to the tune of about a $1 million each time. No other candidate has rated as many appearances from Bush, and all have happened out of public view.

Earlier in the year, there was so much discussion of why DeWine was snubbing the president whenever he traveled to Ohio that the senator eschewed his family's baseball seats to take in the Cincinnati Reds' home opener at Bush's side.

A photo of the two, taken at the airport in June when Bush last traveled to Ohio for a closed DeWine fundraiser, is the primary image of an anti-DeWine ad by the Senate Democrats' campaign committee. Above the picture of the two, smiling with arms around each others' shoulders, the ad says: "Mike DeWine likes working together ... with George Bush."

DeWine's campaign stresses that all the senator's fundraisers are closed and that there is no attempt to shun the president. "Not at all," said spokesman Brian Seitchik, who added that DeWine plans to appear with Bush during a tour, open to reporters, of a business earlier Monday.

Still, DeWine's ads have emphasized his independence and ability to work with Democrats.

Ohio Rep. Deborah Pryce, the fourth-ranking House Republican, once cozy with Bush. Now she stresses her independent side as she struggles to hold onto her seat in an evenly split district. Bush is returning to Ohio on Thursday to raise money for her; this reception also is closed.

The president appears to be itching to join the battle. Highly competitive and a political junkie, he becomes invigorated in front of large and supportive crowds.

DOJ_NMG_0068513

"I'm looking forward to the campaign. I'm looking forward to reminding the American people there are significant differences in between what our party believes and what the other party believes," the president said Thursday at the first of two open fundraisers in Florida. He pounded his lectern and shouted so loudly that donors sometimes had to cover their ears.

That event in Tampa, to collect cash for state Rep. Gus Bilirakis' bid to succeed his father in Congress, was in a safely Republican district.

The White House says more fundraisers will be opened to coverage as Nov. 7 gets closer, that Bush will start speaking before larger crowds in bigger venues and that he will hold some rallies. But White House press secretary Tony Snow acknowledged that the president's role through the end of the campaign will remain largely fundraiser in chief.

Republican Party and White House officials say Bush is in such great demand by candidates that he cannot fill all the requests and that he is appearing at political events at the same rate as he did in 2002.

But the nature of the events this time around is different.

In 2002, between July and the end of September, nearly all of Bush's political appearances — most fundraisers — were open. From the end of August to this time in 2002, Bush also appeared in a half-dozen areas with tough races at "welcome" events, thinly veiled attempts to marshal presidential power to boost the struggling Republican candidates smiling at his side.

But this year, in the same time period between July and the end of September, nearly two-thirds of Bush's political events are scheduled to be closed, held in private homes where the White House says media coverage would damage the intimacy and intrude on hosts' privacy.

Overall, from the first political event Bush headlined in March 2005 through the end of September, 47 percent of Bush's 68 political events — for candidates, the national GOP, several state counterparts and the campaign arms of House and Senate Republicans — will have been private. Before May's approval-rating slide, the percentage of closed events was 34 percent; since, it is 59 percent.

Of the candidates Bush will have helped by the end of this week, 16 have chosen to have him in private and 23 have elected public appearances. Two have had public and private events — Sen. Jim Talent of Missouri, in a tough re-election race, and Bob Corker, hoping to beat Democratic Rep. Harold Ford to succeed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist in Tennessee.

Most who choose public displays, such as Bilirakis, are running in Republican-leaning districts.

Most preferring a private Bush appearance are competing in some of the toughest races. Among them are Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, whom Bush has helped twice; Reps. Clay Shaw of Florida and Dave Riechert of Washington, and Rick O'Donnell, running for an open House seat in Colorado.

Still, several Republicans in close races have not shunned Bush, including Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl, Montana Sen. Conrad Burns, and Reps. Heather Wilson of New Mexico and Jim Gerlach and Mike Fitzpatrick of Pennsylvania.

As Bilirakis put it Thursday in Florida, for some people nothing beats having the president of the United States at your side.

"Today we have the honor and the privilege of hearing from a man of great character and strong conviction: President George W. Bush. I'm proud to stand on this stage with the president," he gushed.

___

Associated Press Writer David Hammer contributed to this report.

Both Parties Sensing Tighter House Races (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

After months of unrelenting bad news, President Bush and his Republican allies have begun to change the mood, if not the overall trajectory, of a midterm election campaign that has tilted against them for a year.

A combination of good luck -- in the form of a sharp decline in gasoline prices -- and dogged persistence by the president's political team in trying to redefine the terms of the fall campaign has given a much-needed morale boost to beleaguered Republican candidates. The ebullience many Democrats exhibited throughout the summer has given way to more cautious assessments of how difficult the final six weeks may be.

Republicans remain very much on the defensive, anticipating losses in the Senate and possible loss of control in the House. Surveys show that voters strongly disapprove of the performance of this Congress and continue to express far greater willingness to vote for Democrats over Republicans in House races in November.

But top strategists on both sides believe the battle for the House will be hard-fought to the end. Democrats need to win 15 seats to take control of the House and six seats to recapture the Senate.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said conditions continue to favor his party, but many Democrats in Washington have been "out over the tips of the skis" with unduly optimistic predictions of a November takeover of the House. "Anybody associated with this process the past 19 months has been nothing but pragmatic" about prospects for winning a majority, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068514

Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (N.Y.), chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, reiterated to reporters last week his belief that Republicans will still control the House in January. His predecessor, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), said in an interview that while Republicans are still running uphill, the Democrats' "forward march has been halted" since Labor Day.

"Voters early on decided they didn't want Republicans, but they haven't decided they want Democrats," Davis said. "So the House is very much in play."

Bush's anti-terrorism initiative timed to the fifth anniversary of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the end of hostilities in Lebanon, a rise in the stock market and last week's compromise between the White House and three powerful but rebellious GOP senators on the treatment of detainees have all helped give Republicans a sense of forward momentum for the first time in months.

Some of that may prove illusory. Iraq has not disappeared as a burden for Bush and Republican candidates, and despite the recent drop in gasoline prices, economic worries persist, polls show.

Republican hopes on Nov. 7 -- 45 days away -- now hinge on whether the president can sustain the modest gains of the past few weeks and whether that translates into a rise in approval for congressional Republicans.

Bush's approval ratings remain low by historical standards but are markedly higher than they were at their lowest point in the spring, when they dipped below 35 percent. Most of the polls taken after Bush's nationally televised Oval Office address Sept. 11 put the president's approval rating above 40 percent, with two polls -- USA Today-Gallup and Los Angeles Times-Bloomberg -- pegging his approval at 44 percent. A New York Times-CBS News poll put his approval at 37 percent.

The president's support among Republicans has risen, and once-balky GOP voters apparently have begun to coalesce around vulnerable House incumbents, operatives on both sides believe. "Republicans seem to be awakening and coming back to their partisan senses," said a Democratic strategist, who would discuss private data only on the condition of anonymity.

Democrats see independent voters, who continue to register disapproval of Bush and Congress, as the key to victory. Republicans, citing low turnout in many primaries this year, believe many of those independents will not vote in November and are focused on mobilizing their own base.

A sustained rise in the president's approval rating could translate directly into fewer lost seats in the House, according to two political scientists who have built models forecasting House elections.

Alan Abramowitz, a professor at Emory University in Atlanta, previously projected Democratic gains of about 25 seats in the House, but based on the latest Gallup Poll, he said the gains might be closer to 15 seats.

If Bush's approval is at 40 percent, that will translate to Democratic gains of 13 to 16 seats, projected James Campbell, who is on the faculty at the State University of New York at Buffalo. He said that could drop to 10 to 14 seats if the president's approval stands at 45 percent.

What continues to encourage Democrats is their advantage in what operatives call "generic ballot" polls. That is when surveys ask voters which party they intend to vote for in the election -- with no names of candidates attached. This measurement often appears more optimistic for the Democrats than the actual election results, but Republicans have been about 10 percentage points behind the Democrats through much of this year, including in the latest polls that showed Bush's approval rising.

The decline in gas prices has diminished the significance of an issue that has the power to move voters to the Democrats. In May, when average gasoline prices were $2.95 a gallon, 15 percent of Americans in a Washington Post-ABC News survey cited the issue as the single most important in determining their vote. An ABC News poll in early September, when the average price of a gallon was $2.73, showed that just 5 percent of those surveyed cited it as their most important issue. Gasoline prices have fallen even further since then.

Bush's speeches on terrorism, culminating with his nationally televised Oval Office speech on the night of Sept. 11, were designed to shift focus away from the unpopular war in Iraq to the broader issue that aided Republicans in 2002 and 2004. Whether Bush has succeeded in doing so is not yet clear, although there are signs that Republicans have gained ground against the Democrats in the public's evaluation of which party is better equipped to confront the threat of global terrorism.

"It's probably their best issue because they've won with it in 2002 and 2004," said Rhodes Cook, an independent analyst. "It's like in football. If a play is successful, you keep running it until your opponents stop you, and the Democrats haven't stopped them."

In a new memo from the liberal Democracy Corps, Democratic strategists Stanley Greenberg, Jeremy Rosner, Amy Gershkoff and James Carville argue that Democrats can contest the national security issue successfully, if they engage robustly with the Republicans and continue to press economic issues. "The president's strategy is backfiring because it is driving independents to the Democrats," they wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0068515

How all this is affecting House races is what preoccupies strategists in the two parties. Democrats say they see no significant shift, while GOP strategists say they have seen some improvements in their candidates' standing. But they caution that the overall climate remains negative. A survey in targeted House districts by the Republican firm Fabrizio, McLaughlin & Associates comparing voters' attitudes today versus four years ago found that, "in every measure tested, GOP fortunes have eroded significantly."

The impact in individual districts appears uneven, based on interviews with strategists tracking the races. In the Northeast, where Democrats must pick up a number of seats to regain the majority, Republicans say their prospects have improved. They point to recent GOP polls that show embattled Pennsylvania Reps. Jim Gerlach and Curt Weldon and Connecticut Rep. Nancy Johnson leading their challengers as evidence of progress. Republicans also say they are more confident about holding several potentially vulnerable districts in New York.

But Republican incumbents in Indiana and Kentucky remain in deep trouble and Ohio's environment has kept Republicans on the defensive. Democratic prospects in several districts where Republican incumbents are retiring have brightened in recent weeks. Republicans, for example, see little chance of holding the seat in Arizona's 8th District after conservative Randy Graf won the primary. Late last week, the NRCC canceled October television time it had reserved in that district. Open seats in Iowa and Colorado now held by the Republicans also could easily tip to the Democrats, as could the Texas seat left vacant by former House majority leader Tom DeLay.

Not all the movement is related to the GOP political offensive. In Connecticut, the nasty Senate race between insurgent Democratic nominee Ned Lamont against Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, who is now running as an independent after losing the primary, appears to have spilled over on the three critically important House races in the state.

Lieberman has been leading Lamont in the polls, thanks to Republican and independent support, and key Democrats say they are increasingly worried about the party's prospects of carrying the GOP districts held by Reps. Johnson, Chris Shays and Rob Simmons.

These races, like many others this fall, are expected to remain close until Election Day.

Polling director Jon Cohen contributed to this report.

Democrats' Edge Erased In New Poll (WT)

By Donald Lambro, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

The Democrats' yearlong lead among likely voters has evaporated, strengthening Republican chances of holding majority control in the House, according to the Gallup Poll.

Gallup's latest survey of voters who say they will go to the polls Nov. 7 showed the contest is a "dead heat" between those who say they will vote Republican (48 percent) and those who say they intend to support Democrats (48 percent). The poll of 1,003 adults was conducted Sept. 15-17.

Democrats continue to maintain an advantage among registered voters; however, pollsters consider likely voters to be a more accurate measurement of the electorate's preferences. The neck-and-neck estimates suggest the Republicans have the potential to offset the Democrats' lead "with greater turnout," Gallup said last week in an analysis of its findings.

"Should that result persist until Election Day, it suggests Republicans would be able to maintain their majority-party status in the House," Gallup said.

Democratic strategists dismiss Gallup's survey and other polls showing a similar tightening of the election, but some acknowledge that Republicans' numbers were helped by President Bush's higher job-approval scores -- now at 44 percent -- and his recent speeches highlighting the war on terrorism and its connection to the ongoing conflict in Iraq.

"Nobody believes those numbers. I don't think anybody in the country believes the generic party preference is even right now," said Simon Rosenberg, president of the New Democrat Network.

Still, Mr. Rosenberg said, Mr. Bush's efforts to elevate the terrorism issue in the campaign "has been marginally effective."

"The Republicans got a bounce out of his 9/11 speech. The president does have the ability to change the debate in the country. The problem is, it is not sustainable," he said.

However, additional polling data released by Gallup within the past week suggest that not only is the president changing voter attitudes about the war in Iraq, but that the Democrats' inability to shape a strong message about dealing with terrorism and Iraq may be hurting them among their own base.

DOJ_NMG_0068516

"Americans are more positive about the war on terror, and voters are more likely to vote for a candidate who supports Bush on terrorism, rather than one who opposes him," Gallup said in a separate analysis. "By a slight margin, Americans tend to think that the country will be safer from terrorism if the GOP retains control of the House, rather than if the Democrats take control."

While a majority of Americans still disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of the war in Iraq, only one in four now "believe the Democrats have a clear plan on Iraq -- fewer than those who say this about the Bush administration," Gallup said.

"Also, Americans are about equally likely to say they would vote for a candidate who supports President Bush on Iraq as to vote for a candidate who opposes Bush," the pollsters said.

What should worry Democratic campaign officials "is the fact that only 14 percent say the Democrats have a clear plan, but Bush does not, while a greater percentage (23 percent) says Bush has a clear plan, but the Democrats do not," Gallup said.

Gallup's findings on these and related issues mirror those from several other polls that show a similar movement in the Republican Party's favor. One poll conducted last week for the Los Angeles Times and Bloomberg found "the GOP may be gaining momentum before November's battle for control of Congress."

While that survey of 1,347 registered voters showed Democrats leading 49 percent to 39 percent in the party preference question, the Times said "that advantage may rest of softening ground: On virtually every comparison between the parties measured in the survey, Republicans have improved their position since early summer.

"In particular, Republicans have nearly doubled their advantage when voters are asked which party they trust most to protect the nation against terrorism -- the thrust of Bush's public relations blitz in recent weeks," the newspaper reported.

With Prices Falling, Gas May Lose Its Electoral Punch (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

AMERICA, the cost of filling up your Hummer just got $16 cheaper.

The price for a gallon of regular gasoline now averages just under $2.50 nationwide, according to the Energy Information Administration. While that is not exactly cheap, it beats the $3-plus per gallon seen as recently as last month. (For those keeping score at home, the Hummer H2 has a 32-gallon tank.)

So what does this mean for the midterm elections?

Democrats have been beating the oil drum for months, coupling rising gas prices with oil companies reaping record profits and big tax breaks. In commercials from the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee, Representative Sherrod Brown, a Democrat running for Senate from Ohio, is described as having “fought for tax cuts for the middle class, not for oil companies,” while a different ad criticizes Senator Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican, saying he “voted oil companies billions in special tax breaks.” Yet another ad from the committee, for the Senate race in Missouri, asserts that the Republican incumbent, Jim Talent, “has voted to give the oil and gas companies billions,” while his Democratic opponent, Claire McCaskill, would instead invest more federal money in alternative fuels.

Voters can expect this tack to continue, despite the falling prices.

“We still see it as a strong issue for two reasons,” said Charles Schumer, the New York Democrat who runs the Senate campaign committee. “First, just about everybody believes they’re going to go back up again, and second, it’s an example, one of many, of the administration and the Republican Senate not having a policy that makes people’s lives better.”

Republicans, on the other hand, believe the sting of this argument is waning.

“Virtually every newspaper in America is reporting on their front page that gas prices are plummeting,” said Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Campaign Committee. “That denies Democrats another issue that they’re trying to use to nationalize the election.”

Poll numbers show that high gas prices are receding as an issue. Back in May, 14 percent of those surveyed by the Pew Research Center said energy prices were the nation’s most important problem, ahead of terrorism and Iraq, up from 5 percent in March. This month, only 7 percent gave energy prices top billing. Gallup has had similar findings.

“It’s certainly good for the Republicans,” said Andrew Kohut, director of the Pew Research Center. On the other hand, he added, prices have been high for a long time, “and they’ve taken a toll on people’s pocketbooks and people’s sense of well-being.”

Frank Newport, editor in chief of the Gallup Poll, said “it’s common sense that if the price of gas continues to go down, it’s more favorable to the party in power.”

“There aren’t many other economic measures that are so readily available,” he said, adding, “you see those big numerals as you drive down the street.”

But recent Gallup numbers have also shown that the decrease in gas prices has not translated into general optimism about the economy. And there is no shortage of skeptics who doubt that only market forces are at work. A USA Today/Gallup poll conducted last weekend found that 42 percent of the roughly 1,000 adults surveyed nationwide said they believed the Bush administration had "deliberately manipulated the price of gasoline so that it would decrease before this fall's elections."

DOJ_NMG_0068517

Tangible reasons cited for the dip in prices include the end of the Israeli-Hezbollah war, which had raised tensions across the Middle East. Also, forecasts of a severe hurricane season that could disrupt oil supplies from the Gulf of Mexico have not, so far, panned out.

Even with the summer's increases, gas prices still have not topped their inflation-adjusted peaks from the early 1980's. And the long gas lines of the 1973 oil embargo left more of a mark on the national psyche. But the recent high prices have lined the pockets of nations like Iran and helped undercut what's left of the domestic auto industry, which built much of its business around inexpensive gasoline.

How long will prices keep falling? At least for a few more weeks, predicted Michael Burdette, the Energy Information Administration's senior oil analyst, because crude prices are dropping and retail prices have not fully caught up.

"We probably have another 20 to 25 cents in retail declines we would expect to see over the next few weeks," he said. "On the flip side, there are some people out there calling for retail prices way under $2 a gallon. We just don't expect to see that."

How about a forecast for Election Day?

"No," he said, "I'm not going to go there."

GOP Mines Data For Every Tiny Bloc (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

AMERICA VOTES

The Battle for Control

--

WASHINGTON — As Democrats drive to extend their power in Congress, holding on to Debbie Stabenow's Senate seat is a must. And the Michigan incumbent is currently ahead in the polls.

But Republican strategists are working hard to upset Stabenow, in part through a low-profile appeal to a group that most politicians rarely think of as a voting bloc — snowmobilers.

And the stealth campaign to woo the thousands of working-class, historically Democratic Michiganders whose cold-weather passion is snowmobiles is just one small example of a technique known as "micro-targeting" that GOP strategists are using across the country as they try to pull off another election day victory against the odds.

By most measures, the November elections offer Democrats their best chance in years. If anti-Republican sentiment turns out to be a tidal wave, strategic and tactical brilliance may not be enough to protect the GOP majorities in Congress.

But if control of Congress comes down to three or four dozen closely contested races, as now seems likely, then micro-targeting and the other technologies that Republicans are using in battleground states could make a difference.

The GOP system — built around a database nicknamed Voter Vault — combines huge amounts of demographic, financial and other personal information on individual voters with the data-mining techniques used by direct-mail advertisers to deliver surgically targeted appeals to voters identified as likely to respond, including many who might be considered part of the Democratic base.

In Michigan, for example, the GOP contacted snowmobilers by mail, telephone or other personal communication suggesting that Democrats' environmental views stood in the way of greater opportunities for snowmobiling.

Though details of the GOP system are secret, snowmobilers and other categories of voters are identified from such diverse sources as credit card transactions, product warranty files, magazine subscription lists, consumer surveys, vehicle registrations and other public records.

Going back at least to the 2002 elections, the Republicans' use of technology, coupled with elaborate computer profiles that make educated guesses about individuals' political inclinations, has demonstrated its power in close races.

In the recent Rhode Island Senate primary, the GOP assessed reams of data — from prior voting histories to signatures on petitions — to identify Democrats and independents whose profiles suggested they might support beleaguered Republican incumbent Lincoln Chafee; his victory improved GOP chances of holding the seat in November. In June, the same technology helped the GOP retain the House seat vacated by convicted felon Randall "Duke" Cunningham of Rancho Santa Fe.

Democratic strategists understand the power of the new technology and techniques, and they have scrambled to develop their own micro-targeting capabilities. The Democratic National Committee is deploying a new system in six states, and another system will be available in 20 or so others.

With the November elections only seven weeks away, however, many Democrats concede they are far behind — their efforts hamstrung by a late start, arguments over tactics, personal feuds and divisions inside the party's leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0068518

The GOP system was developed by the Republican National Committee with the encouragement of White House political strategist Karl Rove.

In addition to locating potentially sympathetic voters, it proved more effective than traditional get-out-the-vote schemes in 2002 and 2004 in making sure they got to the polls.

In their search for voters, Republican strategists can quickly pull up information not only about voting histories, age, address and marital status, but also consumer habits, vehicle ownership, magazine subscriptions, church membership, hobbies, major purchases — even whether a household prefers bourbon over gin. (Bourbon drinkers tend to be Republican; gin is more often a Democrat's drink).

The data and the profiles, held in a centralized system to maintain quality control and help strategists monitor overall trends, are continually updated and massaged on the basis of contacts with voters.

In Michigan alone, Republican workers are making 20,000 telephone contacts with voters per day; Democrats also have telephone banks, but they are not integrated into a system as advanced as that of the Republicans.

Because both parties shroud their efforts in secrecy, it can be difficult to compare their programs, especially in individual races. Still, the evidence suggests the Democrats are substantially behind in micro-targeting and related technologies.

The Democratic National Committee will have a test version of its micro-targeting models available in only half a dozen states; the basic GOP system has been in place nationwide since the campaigns began.

"We are not where we need to be," says Maren Hesla, who handles voter outreach for Emily's List, a liberal group that is part of a coalition helping Democrats develop more sophisticated grass-roots operations, including micro-targeting, in about two dozen states.

Hesla insists that her party "will have enough going on in enough key states to surprise people about what we are able to accomplish."

The question is whether it will be enough to help Democrats achieve a breakthrough victory.

So serious do some Democratic leaders consider the technology gap that they have begun devising their own separate systems, especially for House and Senate races.

"It's every man for himself," said Donna Brazile, a longtime party strategist who managed Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign and is now working to unite party leaders behind a strategy for translating favorable opinion polls into victories.

Brazile, like Hesla, says she sees positive developments for Democrats, but she also worries that the party is behind.

Although micro-targeting may seem like inside baseball, activists in both parties say that the methods and technology Rove and others pioneered may revolutionize campaigns. They predict the new techniques will become as crucial in future campaigns as opinion polling — virtually unheard of in congressional races four decades ago — is today.

"The revolutionary change here is that Republicans … are going after voters as individuals, as opposed to a census tract or a media market," says Harold Ickes, a Democratic Party strategist.

Campaigns traditionally relied on geography or other broad indicators to target voters. Democrats, for example, would blanket predominantly African American neighborhoods because those populations had historically supported Democrats. Republicans would focus on suburbs, which were historically Republican.

Such targeting was far from precise. And many of the old targeting assumptions are less true now. Some suburbs have become more liberal as jobs spread beyond the central city. And enough African American voters peeled away from Democrat John F. Kerry in 2004 for Bush to retain the presidency.

Now, Republicans nationwide can identify approachable voters inside what had previously been seen as Democratic territory, then deliver appeals to them on issues that cut across party lines.

The system's real power develops when complex algorithms are used to rate how likely individuals are to vote for particular Republican candidates.

Bruised by the power of the GOP system in 2004, Ickes commissioned a study in early 2005 that concluded: "The Republicans are light-years ahead of us. This is not rocket science, and we Democrats will get our clocks cleaned if we don't catch up."

A year later, Ickes launched his own effort to develop such resources with a new coalition of labor and activist groups. His $9-million project, active in two dozen states, is taking a leading role in making micro-targeting and other advanced technology available to Democrats.

Even combining this effort with that of the DNC, Democratic strategists lament that their party remains behind the GOP.

Looking at the technology available to Democrats in Michigan, where the party is at its most advanced, a Democratic coalition strategist said ruefully, "We can't do snowmobilers."

DOJ_NMG_0068519

The snowmobiler appeal was developed by state GOP Chairman Saul Anuzis. Michigan has a higher proportion of snowmobilers than any other state. Anuzis says the "extreme environmental views" of Stabenow and incumbent Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm have hindered development and use of snowmobile trails.

Anuzis says that created an opening to reach out to snowmobile users — many of whom belong to demographic groups often considered Democratic.

Similarly, Michigan Republicans have sent messages to African American households in predominantly Democratic inner-city Detroit extolling education plans that give parents more choice.

In the hottest congressional race in Minnesota, where the DNC and the Ickes group have developed micro-targeting capabilities, Democratic candidate Patty Wetterling has not yet begun using the technology but expects to start soon.

The campaign manager for Republican Michele Bachmann says the GOP system has proved to be "a critical asset." Using Voter Vault's ability to track voter preferences on hot issues, Bachmann's campaign even identified households where one family member opposed abortion and the others did not. The campaign tailored different messages to different members of those households.

In GOP-dominant Tennessee, where Democrat Harold E. Ford Jr. is running even with the Republican candidate to succeed retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Ford's campaign obtained voter data files months ago from the DNC.

But the campaign had to hire its own consultants to develop the computer models necessary to use that data, while the Republican candidate enjoyed access to the full Voter Vault system that has been massaged and updated for years — a potentially crucial difference in a race that is expected to be decided by the ground operations in the final days.

Surveying the Democrats' effort to close the technology gap, veteran strategist Brazile insists her party is making gains. "Unfortunately," she said, "it's late and last-minute. We're still perfecting drive-by campaigning."

tom.hamburger@latimes.com

peter.wallsten@latimes.com

1994, The Election To Embrace (and Avoid) (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

WASHINGTON

IF it's a truism that the military always fights the last war, it's also true that political parties fight the last big campaign. This year, both parties are studying the climactic 1994 midterm Congressional elections, when Republicans, led by Newt Gingrich, swept Democrats out of power for the first time in 40 years.

That campaign matched relentless Republican discipline against complacent Democrats unaccustomed to political combat. And the environment was very much like the one the parties find themselves in this fall: the voters were unhappy with the president, deeply dissatisfied with Congress and worried about the government's direction. This time, Democrats are the challengers, and Republicans are the incumbents, and politics has changed greatly over the past 12 years. But both parties, for better and worse, are putting many of 1994's lessons to use this fall.

Here, a look at the new old thinking.

Prepare for the Worst

"There were lots of Democratic incumbents who went down in 1994 who thought they were in safe seats," said Philip A. Klinkner, a professor of government at Hamilton College in New York, who edited a book on the 1994 elections.

Remembering how Democrats were caught unaware and fully understanding that these are difficult times for the party in power, Republicans have been preparing for over a year for an onslaught.

Ken Mehlman, the Republican National Party chairman, has raised $175.8 million for his get-out-the-vote operation and television commercials — compared with $97 million raised by his Democratic counterpart, Howard Dean.

Republican workers have scrutinized the records of potential Democratic challengers, coming up with potentially damaging information that can be seen in the advertisements now pelting viewers across the country.

And Republicans pushed the panic button through the summer, loudly telling the world that they were in trouble. Those alarmist sentiments may well have been heartfelt, but there has been some political calculus here as well. Warning of a Democratic takeover gets contributors to write checks, encourages dispirited Republicans to vote and pushes candidates to campaign scared.

It also has allowed Republican leaders to do what Democrats largely failed to do in 1994: Persuade incumbents who are not facing a serious challenge to give up some money to candidates who are. Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the head of the Republican Congressional campaign effort, has made clear to incumbents who seem certain of re-election that he expects them to divert their campaign funds to help Republicans in trouble.

DOJ_NMG_0068520

Put It In Writing

One of the few things that Mr. Gingrich and Mr. Dean agree on, it seems, is that Republicans won in 1994 in no small part because they laid out an agenda, the Contract With America.

"The contract really mattered for a wide range of reasons," said Mr. Gingrich, who was the Republican leader in the House at the time. "It said to every Republican candidate, you can be confident, you can be positive. If we had run a negative campaign, if we had run a hate-Clinton campaign, we would not have gotten control of the House."

Joe Gaylord, a Republican consultant who was Mr. Gingrich's political lieutenant in engineering the takeover, said he and Mr. Gingrich determined that the first priority in an insurgent campaign was to spell out "what we do when we get in power."

"If people are going to vote for change, they need to know what kind of change they are voting for," Mr. Gaylord said. There were less obvious benefits as well: An agenda worked out in Washington gave weaker candidates "a lifeline to hang on to and explain what they would do if they got elected."

Some Democrats argue that this year, the party would be better off standing aside, to keep the focus on a faltering White House. After all, why put out ideas that give Republicans a target in the days ahead? And some political analysts argue that the Contract With America's impact on the election was overstated: most voters didn't even know about it. But by now, most Democrats agree that part of the 1994 strategy was what the party needs in in 2006: Mr. Dean said he was convinced Republicans took over because "they were clear that they were unified and they wanted a new direction."

Democrats have released their own six-point agenda — "Six for '06" — but it doesn't seem to have made much of a splash yet. In a New York Times/CBS News Poll released last week, just 38 percent of those surveyed said Democrats had offered a clear idea of what they would do if they won the White House.

That may be because the 2006 Democrats have not been able to match the unity of the 1994 Republicans. For example, Mr. Dean and Representative Rahm Emanuel, the head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign committee, are not talking, in a feud over money.

Attack First

Mr. Gaylord, the Republican consultant, said he learned one thing from Democrats in 1994: that the old rule of politics — ignore your challenger — was wrong. He said that a party in power had to slap back threats early and harshly. The party in power must discredit them — political professionals prefer the word "define" — before they have a chance to make themselves known.

Which is precisely what Republicans are now doing. In North Carolina on Friday, Republicans launched a fierce television commercial attacking Heath Shuler, a Democrat challenging Representative Charles Taylor, for paying his taxes late. Republicans said they expect to spend the vast majority of their advertising budget on negative ads.

Democrats have learned the same lesson, and have fought back with attacks of their own. And they have also moved to seize the advantage by doing what Mr. Gingrich did in 1994: Transform the election into a referendum on the party in power and an unpopular president.

For example, Mr. Emanuel said that his committee has borrowed from a 1994 Republican radio advertisement, in which a voice that sounded like President Bill Clinton left a message on an answering machine of a Democratic congressman, thanking him for voting with the White House. This year, a Democratic advertisement features a voice that sounds a lot like Mr. Bush leaving a similar message for Representative Chris Chocola, an embattled Republican from Indiana.

Control the Electoral Map

Finally, in 1994, the number of seats in play was large: 100 or so compared with just 40 now. That gave Republicans plenty of targets to shoot at, making their victory — in retrospect — seem almost easy. That lesson has not been lost on either party this year.

Democrats have made a concerted effort to expand the number of competitive races, to the evident anxiety of Republicans.

Republicans have countered by investing early and heavily in races that appear on the brink of being competitive — for instance, in upstate New York and in Florida — to try to lock them down immediately.

Clearly, both the challengers and the incumbents have drawn what they consider to be the right lessons of 1994. But with all due respect to Mr. Gingrich and Mr. Gaylord, at the rate this campaign is going, it seems a pretty good bet that the next time there is a pivotal midterm election, it will be the Campaign of 2006 — and not the Campaign of 1994 — that Democrats and Republicans will be studying.

They All Approve This Message (WP)

By Peter Carlson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068521

Not Too Red and Not Too Blue, a Perfectly Bland Sound Bite Stew. Serves 300 Million.

Tired of political commercials?

So are we. In fact, we're even more tired than you are, because we just pored over the transcripts of 122 TV and radio ads for this year's crop of candidates for senator and governor from all across America. We were looking for trends and themes and insights into the state of American democracy. Unfortunately, by the time we finished, our brains were far too frazzled for rational thought.

But we did learn some things: We learned that America is in crisis. We learned that Americans want change. We learned that Americans value values, particularly Ohio values, Colorado values and Nebraska values. We learned that almost every pol has new ideas but that almost none of them reveals what those ideas are. And we learned that the guy who paid for the ad is a man of vision and values but his opponent is a gutless, crooked hack. And vice versa.

Now, after enduring this hideous ordeal, we have taken pieces of these 122 ads and used them to create the ultimate political commercial for the ideal candidate.

Every phrase, indeed every word, comes from a real political commercial aired this year. Here goes:

* * *

ANNOUNCER: It's the big squeeze. Taxes go up every year. Gas prices through the roof. The cost of living is skyrocketing. The legislature wastes more and more. Every week brings new scandals. People are leaving our state. Criminals are coming across the border, victimizing American citizens.

Are you tired of politics as usual? Do you ever feel like no one's representing your interests? Isn't it time for a fresh start?

CANDIDATE: We need to make a change. We need real change. It's time to change the way things are done in Washington. If you want a change, I'm your guy.

ANNOUNCER: Grandson of a farmer. Son of a police officer. Raised by a single mother. Born in a rural small town. His values were shaped in rural Arkansas, a half-mile down a dirt road. A paper route earned a new bike.

He worked his way up from poverty to Harvard Law. He volunteered and saw combat in Vietnam. He built an investment company from the ground up. With his wife, Debby, he founded Kids Reading Network in honor of his mother.

He was elected mayor. Cut taxes. Created jobs. Balanced the budget. Cut waste, fraud and abuse. Abolished 71 obsolete boards, commissions and task forces. Turned the city around.

CANDIDATE: I want to set the record straight. I'm opposed to illegal immigration and methamphetamine. I believe in the wonders of science. I believe you deserve better. I believe our state needs government that works -- servant leadership. Our children deserve a senator who wants the job. That's why I'm running for governor.

ANNOUNCER: The choice? A successful businessman and mayor -- or an ineffective congressman.

She's a liberal, supports gun control, abortion on demand, mandatory gay rights. He voted against strengthening criminal laws against terrorist attacks. He voted against the Patriot Act, which gives law enforcement the tools to fight terrorism. Weakening America's security. Out of touch with Ohio values.

CANDIDATE: The choice in this race is simple. If you're satisfied with the way things are, I'm not your candidate. I believe change starts with ideas. You deserve good ideas. But more importantly, you deserve a governor who gets the job done for you.

I'll stand up for the little guy. It's that simple. It's that fair. It's that important. And I'm not just talking about these issues. I've done something about them.

ANNOUNCER: Protecting the California dream. Changing Maryland for the better. Ready to lead Massachusetts. Turn around Ohio. Make Wisconsin great again.

Colorado values. Nebraska values. Nebraska common sense. Real Montana.

CANDIDATE: This grandma wants to shake Austin up. Bring some passion back to Albany. We need a senator who will stand up for New Jersey. I'll fight for Florida. I'll fight for Iowa's future. That's the Colorado promise -- and mine, too.

ANNOUNCER: Courageous, determined, a fighter for our issues. Challenging politics as usual with honest ideas to lift our state. Hard work. Results.

CANDIDATE: I approved this message about conservative change. I approved this message because working together is the only way to solve our problems. I approved this message because I won't play politics with our security. I approved this message because we've got a great future here in Michigan and I'm fighting for it every day.

ANNOUNCER: It's time to have a governor on our side.

CANDIDATE: I approved this message because it's time for a new politics of unity and purpose. I approved this message because when good ideas cross party lines, we should, too. I approved this message because we really need to know how our representatives vote.

ANNOUNCER: Smart solutions that work.

DOJ_NMG_0068522

CANDIDATE: I sponsored this ad because we need someone on our side. I sponsored this ad because we need to protect our borders. I sponsored this ad because you can't change Washington unless you change the people you send there.

ANNOUNCER: Together we can.

CANDIDATE: Why the hell not?

Lost Horizons (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

It should have been an easy morning for Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee. He had settled in for a radio interview with a friendly questioner, Frank Beckmann, broadcasting live on WJR from the first floor of the Renaissance Center, home to General Motors in Detroit. As the traffic report hummed over the studio monitors, Mehlman and Beckmann bantered about the liberal media and the war on terrorism and all the problems with the Democrats. But something changed when the microphone went live. Beckmann did not turn hostile, but he was nothing like the cheerleader-interviewer Mehlman tends to find on the other side of the table. Why has Bush been so slow to make a case — "He waited too long, didn't he?" — for Iraq? Was Bush's unpopularity dragging Republicans down in places like Michigan, one of the few states where Republicans actually had a chance to topple a Democratic governor and senator? And why was Bush, sounding just like a Democrat, pressing an immigration plan that could help illegal immigrants become citizens? "Why should anybody support what the president puts out there on this, Ken?" Beckmann asked.

It is hard to fathom how much Mehlman's life has changed since he took the chairman's desk at the Republican National Committee headquarters on Capitol Hill in January 2005, the reward for managing, together with Karl Rove at the White House, what was widely praised as one of the most sophisticated and groundbreaking presidential campaigns in a generation. "It was an election where they knew more than we did," Joe Lockhart, a senior strategist for

John Kerry, the Democratic presidential candidate, told me. For the next year, Chairman Mehlman talked big and thought big about the Republican Party: about how he and his allies could fundamentally redraw the political architecture of America, change the way Americans conceptualize the two parties and establish Republicans as the dominant party in America long after George Bush returned to Texas. That meant putting a lock on the White House and Congress, and it meant winning statehouses and governorships, which draw the redistricting maps that are the cement of long-term political realignments. This was nothing short of a campaign to marginalize the Democratic Party and everything that Mehlman, reflecting Bush and Rove, said it stood for: big government, high taxes, liberal judges, a timorous foreign policy.

In meticulous detail and with a cool mastery of his subject, he preached about the revolution in marketing and data technologies and the new world of advertising and communications that had transformed politics since he first arrived at the George Bush for President campaign in Austin seven years earlier. It is a political paradigm that Republicans — particularly Rove, Mehlman and the Bush campaign's senior strategist, Matthew Dowd — grasped before Democrats did, and nearly as much as anything else, it accounted for Republican successes in 2002 and 2004. After he was named chairman, Mehlman began filling his days with appearances before African-American audiences across the country, where he apologized for past Republican slights to black Americans, portrayed Republicans as the "party of Lincoln" and pledged to challenge Democrats for black, as well as Hispanic, support. Quixotic? Perhaps. But it reflected just how bullish the second-term Bush Republican Party, with its eye to history and legacy and lasting power, had become.

There was time for such indulgences in the days before a hurricane roared through New Orleans and the country turned against the war Bush had launched in Iraq. These days, of course, talk of a Republican realignment has given way to talk of simple survival this November. Now the lofty ideals and bold ambitions of Mehlman and Rove often seem in direct conflict with the short-term survival instincts of Republicans who want nothing more than to get past the next election. House Republicans sabotaged Bush's immigration plan, ignoring Mehlman's warnings about the damage that an enforcement-only immigration bill could do to the party's long-term growth among Hispanic voters, a critical part of the party realignment that the White House had envisioned. He spent much of July trying to manage the fallout among black leaders after House conservatives delayed a routine extension of the Voting Rights Act. Earlier this year, at the American Jewish Committee's 100th annual meeting, Mehlman, the second Jewish chairman in the history of the Republican National Committee, heard scattered boos as he defended the Iraq war to a room fearful that the White House's Iraq policy had empowered Iran, whose new president had expressed a desire to destroy Israel. It was dispiriting for Mehlman, especially since Jewish voters are another group that Republicans are trying to peel off the Democratic base.

Mehlman finds himself this fall atop a Republican Party as divided as at any time since George W. Bush came to Washington. He is confronted, day after day, with Republican candidates who criticize the president and his policies or who execute a high-profile skedaddle when Bush comes to town — both of which Mehlman reacts to with a peculiar combination of empathy and disapproval. “My goal for them is to win elections,” he said last month, sitting in a wing chair in his office, under a photo that showed him and Rove talking as they walked out of the West Wing behind Bush. “But if you don’t want this election to be a referendum on Bush, don’t make it a referendum on Bush. If they run against Bush — rather than running as an independent Republican — it can’t help them; it can only hurt them.”

DOJ_NMG_0068523

While Mehlman blames Iraq for most of the administration’s problems — a conflict that he argues was noble and one that, he says, will in the end make the world safer — he acknowledges the damage his party suffered because of Katrina. Mehlman is renowned in Washington for his organizational skills, for assembling lean and efficient operations filled with loyal and largely happy people who rarely make mistakes, so it is understandably vexing for him that many Americans have come to see the administration as managerially incompetent and politically inept. Late this past spring, Mehlman began warning Republicans that the party could lose the House, something that seemed unthinkable a year earlier. Over dinner this summer, he told me he was fairly certain that Republicans would hold on in November, yet the bouncy confidence he once displayed seemed gone. When asked if he worried that Republican voters, demoralized by this tough year for the Bush White House, would stay home in November, Mehlman responded with a one-word answer — <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="173185;154756;313721">“Yes” — that was striking to anyone who has spent time with this always-on-message chairman.</object.title>

Mehlman still travels tirelessly on behalf of his party (270,000 miles to 43 states and Puerto Rico since becoming chairman) and is still raising money at a breakneck pace ($184 million from the beginning of 2005 through the end of August). He is still fast to the draw in an argument on any subject, no matter how technical or arcane, and never without a defense for an administration that certainly seems to need one these days. “The president is dealing with big and hard things,” Mehlman patiently told a Republican volunteer in a Detroit suburb who could not understand why Bill Clinton — Bill Clinton! — was more popular than George Bush. But there are dark bags under Mehlman’s eyes now, and the wear of this past year was etched on his face when he turned 40 in August. A man who never seemed to take pleasure in the kind of sledgehammer attack that Rove so clearly savors — who seemed much happier talking about the legacy of

Ronald Reagan or microtargeting as a tool for turning out voters — could be heard in recent weeks issuing searing partisan attacks, reverting to the familiar stance of a party leader who does not like what he sees on the horizon.

“I’m not flipping out,” he told me recently, looking straight ahead. “There are absolutely days when you are — you know — when this is very challenging. Absolutely.”

Ken Mehlman jumped into the front seat of the S.U.V. squiring him through a three-day rush of fund-raisers and pep talks to Republican activists, his spirits lifted on this wet June day by what he had just seen in a squat and messy sprawl of an office in the battleground suburbs of Detroit. It was the Macomb County “victory center,” a jumble of tables and folding chairs and boxes of cold pizza where dozens of volunteers clutched Republican Party-issued cellphones against their ears — the days of banks of telephones plugged into a wall are over — and read from scripts. At the end of each interview, they blackened a circle on a bubble sheet (think No. 2 pencils and the SAT test), signifying whether this was a voter the party would circle back to — once, twice or more — to make certain he or she would be at the polls on Nov. 7. It was still nearly five months before Election Day, but the 72-hour plan, the Republicans’ voter-turnout program that ambushed the Democrats in 2002 and 2004, was already humming along. Mehlman was delighted as he watched what he said was his party’s latest technological adaptation. The bubble sheets could be scanned by a computer, he said proudly, saving time and money as the results are incorporated into the Republicans’ formidable database. “It is a relatively nice day at the end of June, and in the building we just left, they just made 10,000 ID calls,” Mehlman said. “That is really good for the party.”

If there is a defining characteristic to Mehlman and his tenure as Republican national chairman, it is his fascination with the communications and technological revolution that is sweeping American politics. This has produced once-unimaginable new ways to track down potential voters, by predicting voting habits based on where Americans live and the cars they drive and the magazines they read, and delivering tailored messages to different segments of an overly saturated electorate. Mehlman’s chairmanship has become an argument for the notion that the garrulous and instinctual political boss may be all but obsolete in this age of supersophisticated polling, data mining, niche marketing and microtargeting. In an arena that seems to value instinct, bravado, gall and undisciplined excess, Mehlman is empirical and deliberative. Why should a campaign manager direct resources based on a hunch when there is consumer data that can flush out Republicans living deep in Democratic enclaves? Why guess when you can measure what words will be most persuasive to the middle-class exurbanite voter marching on the StairMaster (watching, no doubt, the Republican ad that the Bush campaign placed on the closed-circuit gym channel after realizing that its voters were no longer at home watching the network news)?

When Mehlman talks about politics, he doesn’t talk about Machiavelli; he talks about “Moneyball,” Michael Lewis’s book about how the Oakland A’s employed statistical modeling to assemble a powerhouse baseball team, sending to pasture the old-line scouts with their years of calling it from their guts. “We are the party of ‘Moneyball!’” Mehlman proclaimed, practically shouting and bouncing on the balls of his feet, talking to a room of slightly bewildered Republicans in California last year. “They measured everything. We are doing the same thing in politics.”

DOJ_NMG_0068524

Mehlman, the son of a certified public account, seems as happy talking about the latest employee-relations techniques as he is talking about the inspiration he said he found watching Reagan stand up to the Soviet Union. “Gut alone is crazy,” Mehlman told me. “Why do gut when you can go with objective information? Hope is not a strategy. And gut instincts are always less effective than objective analysis.” Mehlman’s endless talk of metrics and management techniques is viewed as a quirky if fundamental part of his chemistry. His White House colleagues and friends poke fun at his obsession with order and measurement, at his daily spreadsheet of to-do lists. “He’s anal-retentive, man!” Karl Rove says.

Back when Mehlman took the job of party chairman, Republican command of the technologies of winning elections seemed the icing on the cake. Now it seems more like the cake itself. If there is one defining question in this campaign, it is whether the two big Republican Party weapons in this age of Bush — voter turnout and national security in the post-9/11 era — can be wheeled out again to overcome a political environment that has curdled for the Republican Party. As in 2002 and 2004, the White House has been hitting Democrats on national security and terror in a choreographed way, with a rollout that began, predictably, around Labor Day. But Democrats are pushing back this time, arguing that Bush’s policies have if anything made the world a less safe place, an argument reinforced by the continued images of turmoil from Iraq. Polls show that the Republican advantage on the issue is not what it once was, and even some Republicans worry about how many times the White House can credibly go back to this same well.

By contrast, the intricate political machine that Mehlman has built to identify and turn out Republicans is growing, and if the election in November is close, it could provide the Republican Party with the fire wall it needs. Democrats have, if belatedly, learned lessons from what the Republican Party has done and are adopting many of the same techniques. Still, no one thinks the Democrats have caught up on get-out-the-vote, or even can catch up before Election Day. Harold Ickes, a long-term national Democratic leader and one of the smartest strategists in either party, didn’t hesitate when asked if he thought the Republican Party had lapped the Democrats in the area of targeting and turnout. “Yes — there’s no question about it,” he said. Ickes’s response was revealing because he has embarked on a private effort to build a national database of registered voters, an implicit rebuke of the slower pace of Howard Dean, the Democratic Party leader, in this area. And Ickes was warm in his appraisal of Mehlman. “The general view is, he’s very good,” Ickes said. “They have good systems and he’s a good system person.”

Mehlman has for this election taken what the Republican Party assembled in Ohio in 2004 — a database of every voting-age resident that includes voting history, party registration, demographic data and consumer history — and expanded it, he said, to include every voting-age American in the country. “In Ohio, in ’04, we got the tip of the iceberg,” Mehlman said. “What we did over the last two years is we got the entire iceberg.” With that kind of data, Republican campaign workers in every state in the country can identify potential Republicans who may never have voted before and bring them to the polls. To help neighborhood organizers plot their door-to-door visits — and to make what might be a dreary exercise at least interesting — the Republican Party uses satellite pictures from Google Earth to chart the routes for house-to-house canvassing.

There have been two early tests of this machine already in this election cycle, and both were encouraging for Mehlman. The most recent was in Rhode Island earlier this month, where Republicans dispatched 72-hour teams to help Senator Lincoln Chafee beat back what had seemed to be a very threatening conservative challenge by Steve Laffey, the mayor of Cranston. (Mehlman and other top Republicans concluded that they had no chance of keeping the seat in this Democratic state if Laffey won.) Turnout shattered the Republican primary record for the state, set in 1994: 62,099 people voted, a 38 percent increase. Republicans said their 86 get-out-the-vote volunteers made 198,921 contacts with prospective voters in the final 11 days of the campaign. As Chafee declared victory, Democrats could not help taking note of these numbers. And earlier, on June 6 in California’s 50th Congressional District, in San Diego, in a special election to replace

Duke Cunningham, the Republican congressman from San Diego who quit in scandal, the Republican Party put the full press of a 72-hour plan to work. The Republican, Brian Bilbray, squeaked out a victory with 49 percent of the vote over the Democrat, Francine Busby. That was a race, Mehlman said, in which turnout was able to overcome a very challenging environment.

Still, this is a district where Republicans should not be crowing about a 49 percent victory. For one thing, it has a substantial Republican edge; Cunningham beat Busby 58 percent to 36 percent in 2004. Bilbray campaigned for tough immigration controls in this district snug on the Mexican border, and Busby threw him a lifeline in the final weekend of the campaign when she appeared to be encouraging illegal aliens to vote for her. The 72-hour plan helped pull the Republicans through that Tuesday. But will it be able to manage such extensive operations nationwide if, say, 50 districts are really in contention come Election Day? And what if the White House’s campaign-season drumbeat on terrorism doesn’t work this time? As Mehlman himself says, turnout operations help — but only so much. “Historically, turnout matters at the margin,” he said. “If you are losing an election because of an issue or the environment or the candidate, you are not going to win it on turnout.”

DOJ_NMG_0068525

"Just left the Urban League," Mehlman wrote in a BlackBerry message to Donna Brazile, reporting on his attendance at a reception with black leaders. "Got nice acknowledgment and applause." This was in the spring of last year. Back then, Mehlman kept up a regular e-mail correspondence with Brazile, a prominent African-American Democratic leader who was, in 2000, the manager of Al Gore's presidential campaign. (She later shared the e-mail messages with me.) Mehlman made a habit of letting Brazile know about each of his appearances before black audiences, where he invariably described Republicans as "the party of Lincoln and Frederick Douglass." He told her of his efforts to recruit black candidates for statewide offices around the country, a roster that today includes candidates for governor in Ohio and Pennsylvania and for Senate in Maryland (in the person of Michael Steele, whom Mehlman warmly describes as a "good friend"). "Am always going to try to bring candidate or local elected official with me to African-American newspaper ed boards so they build relationships that will go beyond my leadership," Mehlman wrote Brazile in another e-mail message. Mehlman gave a speech to the N.A.A.C.P. saying that some Republicans had been "trying to benefit politically from racial polarization" and that "we were wrong." Brazile was impressed. She told me at the time that she was accustomed to Republicans making high-flying but short-lived appeals to blacks but said she thought that Mehlman seemed to be on a different kind of mission.

A year later, a small group of Washington reporters attended a luncheon in a private dining room at Charlie Palmer, a glistening modern steakhouse within walking distance of the Capitol. In attendance was a Republican running for the United States Senate. The rules of the lunch stipulated that the candidate could be quoted but identified only as a Republican candidate for Senate. The "Republican candidate for Senate" spent a good part of the lunch offering harsh criticism of the White House; indeed, at times he sounded like a Democrat. Dana Milbank, a Washington Post columnist who was there, wrote it all up — precisely following the rules of the lunch, identifying the speaker only as a Republican Senate candidate — to devastating effect. Mehlman was highly distressed upon reading the Post article, one associate said, and flabbergasted after learning that the candidate was his friend Michael Steele. This was four days after Bush finally spoke before the N.A.A.C.P., after refusing its invitations for the first five years of his presidency. (His aides had cited harsh attacks on him by the organization's leaders.) Bush went, in part, in response to pleadings by Mehlman, and he went a few weeks after the Voting Rights Act was tabled in the House by conservatives. The reception Bush got was tepid.

Democrats like Brazile no longer view this Republican appeal for African-Americans with much concern, or even interest, and she did not need the platform of a not-for-attribution lunch with reporters to make that view known. Mehlman, Brazile said, was on a roll in 2005. "But Katrina washed away any illusions that Republicans had something to offer African-Americans," she told me. "I know he's out there every day. I just don't know if his sales pitch has any potency at the moment."

The problems that Mehlman has encountered in his effort to make the Republican Party the party of Lincoln suggest a recurring frustration of his chairmanship. Mehlman argues that the "opportunity" initiatives that Bush has put forward, albeit with limited legislative success — giving Americans more control over their health-care insurance, setting up private accounts for retirement, school choice — are the core of the Republican appeal for black support. Mehlman wants Republicans to compete with Democrats for black votes not on so-called racial issues, like affirmative action, but on basic issues of economics and the role of government. He talks about the high-level black appointments Bush has made to his cabinet. He points to the three black statewide Republican candidates running under his watch. He suggests that Democrats have taken the black vote for granted all these years. Less obviously, the White House push on such issues as a ban on gay marriage is aimed in part at socially conservative blacks.

But is that enough?

Bruce S. Gordon, president of the N.A.A.C.P., says that Mehlman called him after the Voting Rights Act faltered. "He didn't seem too satisfied with the behavior of some members of his party," Gordon told me, recounting their conversation. "He said he doesn't have much control over them. But he's the chairperson of the Republican Party: he's got some clout." And it's not just the Voting Rights Act. Or Katrina. The war in Iraq is also highly unpopular among blacks. So are the cuts in social programs; and the nomination of judges who oppose affirmative action; and the problems with financing No Child Left Behind, the education-reform bill that Mehlman often cites as the kind of measure African-American parents should embrace.

There is certainly a degree of calculation to Mehlman's outreach campaign: it is designed, at least in part, to make the party more appealing to moderate white voters who might be scared off from supporting a party identified with racial intolerance. As demonstrated in Ohio in 2004, it takes only a few percentage points to affect the outcome of an election: with such a polarized electorate, small shifts can produce large gains. But the political calculations go only so far in trying to account for Mehlman's dedication — "his maniacal focus," as Brazile put it, admiringly — to attract African-American votes.

The black leaders and elected officials I spoke with said they had no doubt about the sincerity of Mehlman's motivations — that he really was uncomfortable heading a party that is so white and is considered with suspicion by so many black Americans. "I think Ken is sincere in wanting to see greater diversity in the Republican Party, in the same way that George Bush wants to see greater diversity in the Republican Party and in his cabinet," says Senator Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat, who attended Harvard Law School with Mehlman. “But what they are not willing to do is fundamentally change a set of priorities, or reorient their party, in a way that is actually going to help the African-American community get ahead.”

DOJ_NMG_0068526

J.C. Watts, a Republican former congressman from Oklahoma, who has been critical of the White House in its handling of racial issues, says that Mehlman’s efforts as chairman “are probably unprecedented in the time I’ve been a Republican. This is his passion; I think it’s in his DNA to do what he is doing.”

Mehlman was raised in a Jewish family in Baltimore, his mother a Democrat who voted for Jerry Brown (yes, that Jerry Brown) for president. Mehlman counts the civil rights movement as one of the seminal political events in American history and lists two Democrats (and no Bushes) among his three most influential presidents of the past century: Reagan, F.D.R. and Johnson. “What he did on civil rights makes him one of the great presidents of the 20th century,” Mehlman says of Johnson. Mehlman, according to his office, has appeared before 50 black audiences since becoming party leader. When members of the Republican National Committee gathered in Pittsburgh in August 2005 for their annual summer meeting, the banner across the stage read: “Give us a chance, We’ll give you a choice — Strengthening Lincoln’s legacy.”

Three weeks later, Katrina ripped through New Orleans. Mehlman was on the Greek island of Mykonos that week, attending the wedding of Nicolle Devenish, who was then the White House communications director, and Mark Wallace, a deputy director of Bush’s 2004 campaign. Mehlman said he followed what was happening, a little helplessly, from his hotel in Greece. “I certainly recognized watching CNN that it was not good,” he said. “And it required a large infusion of ouzo. Which I had every night. My answer to Hurricane Katrina was Hurricane Ouzo.”

When Bush ran for re-election in 2004, he drew 11 percent of the African-American vote. That counted as progress; in 2000, Bush drew the support of 8 percent of the black electorate. But in a New York Times/CBS News poll conducted last month, just 6 percent of black respondents said they approved of the job the president was doing. And in a separate New York Times/CBS News poll in July, only 9 percent of blacks said they had a favorable opinion of the Republican Party, a year and a half into Mehlman’s outreach campaign.

Earlier this month, Mehlman and I had dinner at a restaurant he goes to frequently — Georgia Brown’s, a spot not far from the White House that has a large African-American clientele. Mehlman was upset with an article of mine The Times published that described his effort with black voters as faltering, and as he dived into a salad with knife and fork, he argued vigorously that it was wrong to use public-opinion polling as the measure of progress for what he had always said would be a long climb. “If you had told me in the beginning of 2005 that 100 days before the election we would have African-Americans all in striking distance for governor of Ohio, governor of Pennsylvania and senator in Maryland, I would have told you that is incredible,” he said.

Ken Mehlman and Karl Rove started every day of the 2004 presidential campaign with a 7 a.m. telephone call, during which they discussed what happened over the past 24 hours and what they wanted to happen over the next 24. It would be the first of what would be — by the account of both men — dozens of daily telephone calls and e-mail messages between the two, going into the night, over the course of nearly two years. Mehlman, who was the White House political director for the first two years of the Bush administration, was officially the campaign manager, and Rove was Bush’s chief White House adviser, but Mehlman was the subordinate in this relationship. “Karl was far and away the senior leader,” says Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker, talking about the campaign. Bush famously called Rove the “architect” of his victory. Mehlman lifted an eyebrow when I asked him about that. “I don’t know — I think a bunch of us were architects,” he told me.

The relationship between Mehlman and Rove — two men of similar fascinations, skills and ideologies — has long been at once cooperative and competitive; Mehlman’s friends voice private frustration at just how much credit Rove drew for the campaign of 2004, though Mehlman is far too disciplined and corporate to concede any such resentment. But Rove’s star has dimmed because of the troubles of the second-term Bush White House and his own legal battles, and heading into the fall the two men appear to be equals in calling the shots on this midterm campaign. And it is Mehlman who is out front — along with the White House’s political director, Sara Taylor — immersed in dealing with candidates, contributors and consultants, riding campaign managers, overseeing the latest voter-turnout innovation, determining where money and resources will be spent. Mehlman is the public face of this campaign, giving speeches at events, appearing on television, talking to reporters; Rove has largely kept out of public view. And it is Mehlman, rather than Rove, who seems positioned to take much of the blame if November delivers the first big defeat of the Bush political machine since it took the White House six years ago.

Mehlman’s friends say they doubt that he will seek another term as party chairman at the end of the year, no matter the outcome of the election, and that he is interested in entering the private sector, perhaps as a consultant. If anything, this has made him even more intent on maintaining Republican control of Congress; he does not want to be identified with a Republican loss. Still, there is a good argument to be made that the problems darkening the Republican Party this fall have much more to do with what has happened in the building where Rove works than with what has taken place at the headquarters of the Republican National Committee. A Democratic victory in November would add another paragraph to the rather glum second term of the Bush presidency. But it may not say much about the new Republican Party. The G.O.P. under Mehlman has changed the way elections are run and won in this country. That is what Mehlman understood when he told Republican workers in the victory center in Michigan to soldier on, ignore the bad news, flip open their cellphones and call another Republican voter.

DOJ_NMG_0068527

Polls Give Both Parties Things To Hang Onto (HC)

By Bennett Roth

Houston Chronicle, September 24, 2006

GOP touts Bush approval ratings; Dems cite voters' level of discontent

Several polls released last week gave both parties ammunition as they plot strategy with about six weeks until the congressional elections.

Republicans touted a USA Today/Gallup poll that found President Bush's public relations offensive on terrorism may have paid off. His public approval rating rose to 44 percent, from a low in May of 33 percent. The survey also showed that likely voters were evenly split over whether Republicans and Democrats should be elected to Congress. Other polls have given Democrats an advantage on that question, although most surveys included registered voters rather than the smaller sample of likely voters.

Meanwhile, a New York Times/CBS poll bolstered the Democrats' argument that they will benefit from a sour public mood toward Washington. The survey found that Congress's approval had dipped to 25 percent, the lowest level for lawmakers since 1994, when Republicans ousted Democrats from control of Capitol Hill.

Only 39 percent in the Times poll said their representatives had done good enough jobs in Congress to deserve reelection; 48 percent said it was time to give someone new a chance.

Experts warned about reading too much into changes registered in any one survey. Karlyn Bowman, a polling expert at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, noted the "extraordinary continuity" in polling data over the past year, with pessimism pervading public attitudes.

Whether Democrats can win the 15 House seats and six Senate seats needed to take back control of the chambers may depend on whether they can counter a well-funded voter turnout effort by the GOP.

Financial reports released last week by party operations showed that at the end of August, Republicans had $94 million on hand, compared with $76 million for the Democrats. The GOP advantage is largely the result of fund-raising by the Republican National Committee, which had $39 million compared with the Democratic National Committee's $11 million.

DNC Chairman Howard Dean has diverted much of his party's funds to building up party operations in 50 states, causing friction with House and Senate Democrats who wanted the money spent in competitive races.

Retirement boosts Democrat's chances

One of the best chances for a Democratic pickup in the House this year is a border district in Arizona that has been represented by Rep. Jim Kolbe, a moderate Republican and one of three openly gay House members.

Kolbe's retirement set off a fight among local Republicans, with Randy Graf, who stressed his hard-line stands on immigration, winning the GOP primary this month. Graf, however, was opposed by national Republicans, who feared he is too conservative to win a district that includes the university town of Tucson.

Kolbe has refused to endorse Graf against former Democratic state Sen. Gabrielle Gifford. The independent Cook Political Report last week changed its assessment of the seat from a toss-up to leaning Democrat.

Incumbents locked in tight Senate races

Senate incumbents in Ohio and New Jersey are fighting for their political lives, according to polls released last week.

In New Jersey, Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez trailed his Republican opponent, state Sen. Thomas Kean Jr., by 3 percentage points, according to the Quinnipiac University poll.

Even though New Jersey is a Democratic leaning state, Menendez has been dogged by ethical questions regarding a property he rented to a charity for which he helped secure federal funding.

In Ohio, Republican Sen. Mike DeWine is trailing his Democratic challenger, U.S. Rep. Sherrod Brown, by 4 percentage points, according to the Ohio Poll by the University of Cincinnati.

DeWine may be suffering from voter disgust over ethical problems hanging over other state Republicans.

Pelosi Takes Barbs In Pursuit Of Gavel (AP-Y)

By Nancy Benac, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 24, 2006

Rep. Nancy Pelosi stuffs cotton in her ears when she takes her grandkids to a rock concert. She's so petite that a policeman once lifted her out of her shoes during an evacuation of the Capitol. She's a chocoholic with a great giggle.

And she's Exhibit A as Republicans argue that Americans would be crazy to let Democrats take over the House.

DOJ_NMG_0068528

"A disaster," former GOP Speaker Newt Gingrich warns, calling the prospect of the San Francisco-area congresswoman standing third in the line of presidential succession truly frightening. "A hyperpartisan obstructionist," a GOP campaign tract pronounces.

Pelosi, leader of the House Democrats, has twice presented Republican Dennis Hastert with the speaker's gavel as the GOP extended its control of the House for two more years. "This is getting tiresome, Mr. Speaker," Pelosi joked last time.

Now, heading into the November elections in which Democrats have their best chance yet of retaking the House after 12 years in the minority, all sides are taking the measure of the woman who would become the first "Madam Speaker" if her party succeeds.

"It's the battle of definitions," said Jack Pitney, a political scientist at Claremont McKenna College in California who has written extensively about Congress. "If the Republicans have their way, she's a wacko San Francisco liberal; if Democrats have their way she's an Italian-American grandmother."

Or, as Pelosi described herself this week: "An Italian Catholic mother of five, grandmother of five, going on six."

In truth, Pelosi, born Nancy D'Alesandro, is an energetic, street-smart politician from Baltimore, a liberal who knows that the key to leading the fractious House Democrats is to accommodate the broad spectrum of views in the party when possible and come down hard to enforce unity when necessary.

Pelosi, the daughter and sister of Baltimore mayors, moved west in her 20s because her investment banker husband wanted to return to his roots. She managed to work herself into California's Democratic political structure while raising five children who were born over six years. She was first elected to Congress when her youngest daughter reached high school.

The 66-year-old Pelosi represents one of the country's most liberal congressional districts, taking in much of San Francisco. She has a voting record that consistently gets her laurels from liberal interest groups and raspberries from conservatives.

She also is a pragmatist.

"She's good at counting noses, which means that she'll do everything she can to represent the whole caucus," says Bruce Reed, president of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. "She'll have to."

California Rep. Dennis Cardoza, one the Blue Dog Democrats who advocate fiscal restraint, is quick to point out that Pelosi has promised to make an early push for reinstating "pay-as-you-go" budgeting rules. These require that any tax cuts or increases in entitlement spending be paid for by raising taxes or cutting spending elsewhere.

"You wear members out if you ask them to go to the well on every single vote," said Rep. Anna Eshoo, a California Democrat who has known Pelosi for three decades.

But, Eshoo adds, "When it comes to the votes that really define Democratic Party principles, she, in her very strengthful and convincing way, sits down with one member after another to present that case."

Pelosi presides over a Democratic caucus, united against President Bush, in which members voted with their party 88 percent of the time in 2005, one of the most cohesive records in decades, according to an analysis by Congressional Quarterly.

That is not to suggest the party lacks fissures, though, or that Pelosi operates only through gentle persuasion.

Black members, for example, were irked earlier this year when Pelosi successfully pushed to strip Louisiana Rep. William Jefferson, a member of the Congressional Black Caucus, of his seat on the House Ways and Means Committee while an FBI bribery investigation is still under way.

In 2002, Pelosi raised eyebrows by giving a political contribution to one of two House Democrats who were being thrown into the same, newly redrawn congressional district in Michigan. It was no coincidence that Pelosi backed Rep. Lynn Rivers, who had supported Pelosi's bid to become Democratic whip, over Rep. John Dingell, who had been allied with Pelosi's competition. Dingell won.

Pelosi helps instill loyalty with cold cash: Her political action committee, PAC to the Future, has given nearly $450,000 to federal candidates this election cycle, which ranks 15th among all leadership PACs and is exceeded by only two other Democrats, according to the private Center for Responsive Politics.

"No one is working harder to bring us out of the desert," says Eshoo. "This woman is a human tornado."

Rutgers political science professor Ross Baker said that as a leader of the Democratic minority, Pelosi has been tireless at "conducting a guerrilla warfare against a vastly superior force." Her weaknesses, he said, include the Democrats' failure to offer a clear message to counter the Republicans and her sometimes halting television presence. "She needs some work in the green room," he said.

"My hunch is that there is some uneasiness in the House about her as speaker," Baker said, saying that such reservations are tied partly to her representation of such a liberal district.

DOJ_NMG_0068529

Pelosi demurs when asked to talk about a potential Speaker Pelosi's agenda, saying she is focused for now on Nov. 7, when Democrats need to pick up 15 House seats to take control of the House. But she has promised to put in reforms to make the House operate with more civility, fairness and fiscal accountability.

Early policy actions probably would include a push to:

_increase the minimum wage.

_revise the Medicare prescription drug program to provide more help to the elderly.

_put in place recommendations of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks.

_overhaul immigration policy.

_make it easier to get student loans.

_reduce subsidies for oil companies.

With Pelosi leading the House, Democrats could be expected to let most of Bush's tax cuts expire and block any new effort to privatize parts of Social Security.

Pitney, the California political scientist, predicts that Pelosi's talk of treating Republicans more fairly than they have dealt with Democrats "would be the first casualty of a Pelosi speakership. ... With a narrow majority and a lot of passionate partisans on her side, she is going to have to play very, very tough with procedure."

The president merely snapped, "That's not going to happen," when The Wall Street Journal asked him what Pelosi might be like as speaker.

But other Republicans are happy to expound on the likely hallmarks of a Pelosi-led House, using them as a GOP rallying cry.

In a recent eight-page release, "America Weakly," the Republican National Committee cast Pelosi as a tax-raising, soft-on-terrorim, extreme-on-abortion, questionable-on-ethics liberal who wants the nation to "cut-and-run" from Iraq and would focus on "launching bitter partisan investigations" of the Bush administration, including possible impeachment hearings.

Eager to douse any speculation about impeachment, Pelosi's office earlier this year put out word that she privately had advised the Democratic caucus that impeachment was off the table.

"It speaks volumes that she felt it necessary to deny it," says Republican pollster Whit Ayres.

Falwell Says Faithful Fear Clinton More Than Devil (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

The evangelical leader tells a conference that the New York senator will mobilize his base like no one else if she runs for president.

WASHINGTON — Nothing will motivate conservative evangelical Christians to vote Republican in the 2008 presidential election more than a Democratic nominee named Hillary Rodham Clinton — not even a run by the devil himself.

That was the sentiment expressed by the Rev. Jerry Falwell, the longtime evangelical icon and founder of the once-powerful Moral Majority, during private remarks Friday to church pastors and activists as part of the Values Voter Summit hosted this weekend by the country's leading Christian conservatives.

A recording of Falwell's comments was obtained by The Times, and his remarks were confirmed by eyewitnesses.

"I certainly hope that Hillary is the candidate," Falwell said, according to the recording. "She has $300 million so far. But I hope she's the candidate. Because nothing will energize my [constituency] like Hillary Clinton."

Cheers and laughter filled the room as Falwell continued: "If Lucifer ran, he wouldn't."

At that moment in the recording, Falwell's voice is drowned out by hoots of approval. But two in attendance, including a Falwell staff member, confirmed that Falwell said that even Lucifer, the fallen angel synonymous with Satan in Christian theology, would not mobilize his followers as much as the New York senator and former first lady would.

One critic who has been observing the conference said Saturday that Falwell's words offered a rare glimpse into how religious conservative leaders were planning to inflame opposition to the Democrats with below-the-radar messages that are often more scorching than the ones showing up in public.

"He was calling Hillary Clinton a demonic figure and openly arguing that God is a Republican," said the Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of the advocacy group Americans United for Separation of Church and State. "It's hard to know whether people thought he was joking or serious, but once you start using religious imagery and invoking a politician in this way, it's not funny. A lot of people who listen to him do think that she's a dark force of evil in America."

Such controversy is nothing new for Falwell, who once described Islam's prophet Muhammad as a terrorist and said that abortion providers, feminists, gays and lesbians were to blame for the 9/11 attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0068530

An aide to Falwell said Saturday that the Lucifer reference was an "off the cuff" comment and that Falwell "had no intentions of demonizing her."

Falwell's remarks about Clinton were part of a 40-minute address at a private breakfast that included assurances that God would preserve a Republican majority in Congress and that moderates such as former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani could not be allowed to win the GOP presidential nomination.

Falwell's estimation of Clinton's campaign war chest appeared to be hyperbole; she has raised about $47 million for her Senate account this cycle, according the Center for Responsive Politics. But she has raised millions more for other candidates, and many strategists believe that if she decides to run, Clinton will amass record-level contributions.

Falwell wasn't the only public figure to invoke Satan in reference to a political adversary last week. Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez referred to President Bush as the devil before the United Nations General Assembly, speaking the day after Bush had stood at the same rostrum.

About two hours after Falwell's speech at the Values Voter Summit, James Dobson, founder of the influential group Focus on the Family, spoke publicly at the same conference. Dobson denounced what he said was a limp response by both political parties to Chavez's comment. Dobson, whose group was a sponsor of the weekend gathering, told the nearly 2,000 activists crammed into a hotel ballroom near downtown Washington that Chavez had "attacked our president viciously."

"And there has hardly been a statement of defense out of members of Congress about that," Dobson said. "There's been [only] a few pantywaist comments."

Neither Falwell nor Dobson responded to interview requests.

One conference official, Family Research Council President Tony Perkins, said Saturday that he believed Falwell intended his comment to be a "humorous remark."

Asked if he was comfortable with the connotation, Perkins deferred questions to Falwell.

"I can only be responsible for what I say," Perkins said, adding that he disagreed with Falwell that a Clinton candidacy would be good for conservatives. "I think it would be a little too risky. Anything could happen, and that's just one step closer to her actually being elected."

Falwell's remarks about Clinton were not the only indication this weekend that the evangelical movement was focused on the senator from New York.

One meeting on the agenda featured three analysts from the conservative Heritage Foundation for a discussion of health policy titled "The Future of Health Care: HillaryCare or Values-Driven Health Care?" The title was referring to Clinton's 1993 efforts to draft a national health plan that conservatives continue to deride as a form of big-government socialism.

But Falwell's speech captured the spirit of much of the weekend, which was devoted to revving up the GOP base for November and beyond, and included appearances from several prospective Republican presidential candidates — Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Sam Brownback of Kansas.

At the breakfast, Falwell made it clear that he thought the 2008 nominee must be a true conservative.

"It can't be a Giuliani and it cannot be a [New York Gov. George E.] Pataki," he said. "It cannot be a pro-choice. It cannot be a person on the wrong side of the social issues. We've got to have somebody worth fighting for because we will be energized if Hillary is the standard-bearer."

Falwell predicted that this year's midterm elections would go in the GOP's favor, despite polls showing Democrats in position to make gains.

"I think we're going to keep the House and the Senate," he said. "I think the Lord will take care of that."

peter.wallsten@latimes.com

GOP Hopefuls Audition At 'Values Voters' Summit (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

Potential Republican presidential candidates spent the weekend revving up evangelical "values voters" by pledging to keep up the fight against abortion and same-sex "marriage," and to protect religious freedom.

Sens. George Allen of Virginia, Sam Brownback of Kansas, and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, as well as Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee participated in the Family Research Council's "2006 Values Voter Summit," which drew about 1,800 conservative activists to the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Northwest. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich was scheduled to address the crowd last night.

Mr. Santorum, who is in a bruising re-election battle, was among several who strongly advocated marriage as being only between one man and one woman.

DOJ_NMG_0068531

"I believe the family is the central unit of our society and marriage is the glue that holds it together," he said yesterday in a recorded speech. Mr. Santorum had planned to attend the summit, but his visit was canceled because of a family obligation.

The two-term senator, who is trailing his Democratic opponent in polls, said that like others in the crowd, he has "paid a price" for taking a strong stand against abortion and same-sex "marriage" but will continue the fight. The audience applauded when he said life begins at conception.

Mr. Santorum's comments echoed those made Friday by Mr. Huckabee, who said, "Marriage has been between a man and a woman for all time, in all civilizations."

For his part, Mr. Allen called for protecting religious freedom, private-property rights and traditional marriage and urged immigration reform.

"We shouldn't reward illegal behavior with amnesty," he said Friday to loud cheers.

There did not appear to be a strong consensus among the attendees on which Republican leads the field of possible White House contenders for 2008.

"I'm impressed with all of them, because they're speaking my language," said Janis Christensen of North Ogden, Utah.

"I think George has got a shot at being the next president," said Doug Hesse of Eatonton, Ga., who heard Mr. Allen speak for the first time on Friday. "He was articulate; I was impressed."

"I like Mitt Romney," said Judy Boteler of Roanoke, adding that it was the first time she had "zeroed in on him."

Her husband, Bruce, said he liked all the potential Republican presidential candidates but didn't see any of them "running above the crowd" yet.

"We don't see any Ronald Reagans," he said. He quickly added of the Democratic field: "I don't see any Harry Trumans, either."

"We were impressed with all of them," said Margaret Blackwood of Hartselle, Ala. When asked who she would vote for, she said, "I think it would be Mitt Romney, but I could change my mind."

Several other possible presidential contenders were invited to the conference but didn't attend. They were Democratic Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, John Kerry of Massachusetts and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, as well as Republican Sens. Bill Frist of Tennessee and John McCain of Arizona.

Outside the event yesterday, a small group of protesters held signs with slogans, such as "Hate is not a family value" and "Focus on your own Darn Family." The latter referred to Focus on the Family, the conservative group led by evangelical icon James Dobson, who was a frequent speaker at the conference.

· This article is based in part on wire reports.

The Tide's In For Independents (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

The independence being demonstrated all over the political spectrum these days -- by Democratic Sen. Joe Lieberman and Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee, both in tough reelection battles, and by Republican Sens. John McCain and John Warner -- has its roots in American history. When they ran for the presidential nomination, Ronald Reagan and John Kennedy defied the preferences of their parties' power brokers. And earlier, Teddy Roosevelt and Abe Lincoln did the same thing.

The American people often have been equally ready to discard conventional wisdom by rewarding independence and those candidates who, in the words of the Declaration of Independence, show "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind." In my view, and that of many others, had Colin Powell chosen to run for president in 2000, in either party or in none, he could have been elected -- his character and reputation overcoming any partisan ties and any lingering racial prejudice.

Instead, we had George W. Bush, a president who has governed on party-line votes and who, after taking the country to war in Iraq, repeatedly has used the war on terrorism as a partisan weapon against Democrats.

Powell will not run in 2008, but if this year's election strengthens the hands of the independent members of both parties -- those who are prepared to defy the dictates of their interest groups and clamorous extremes -- the next presidential race may be very different from recent cycles.

Who could provide such a contest? On the Republican side, either of the two men atop the early polls, McCain or former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani. Giuliani has flourished in Democratic New York by defying his party's rigid doctrine on social issues. McCain has challenged everything from the first of President Bush's deep tax cuts to Bush's recent demand for a free hand in questioning and trying alleged terrorists.

I also would guess that Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney would be such a candidate. Like Giuliani, he has governed in Democratic territory, and he managed with an overwhelmingly Democratic legislature to pass a major step toward universal health care coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0068532

On the Democratic side, Sen. Hillary Clinton would, if she runs, provide a crucial test case for the independence movement. Though tied to some of the party's most important constituencies, she has, like her husband before her, carved her own path in policymaking. Friends say that she has learned in her Senate service to value some of the members of the opposite party she previously distrusted, and she has followed the example of Sen. Ted Kennedy in seeking Republican co-sponsorship of her bills.

Clinton is not alone among possible Democratic aspirants in showing her independence. Others, such as Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and former Virginia governor Mark Warner, have demonstrated their ability to conciliate differences without abandoning principles. And the field of potential candidates who are moderate is a large one. A race involving any of these people would provide more substantive debate than cheap shots and demagoguery.

And looking beyond 2008, think about a future contest involving Democratic Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina -- or any of many other pairs of younger talents, with similarly inclusive and expansive views of the national interest. What a boon for the country.

But is this rosy scenario likely? Look at the powerful forces working against it. Congress is rigged to promote partisanship and extremism. Most congressional districts are drawn to favor one party or the other, and contests take place only in primaries, where low turnouts favor candidates who appeal to the motivated extremes. The flow of special-interest money into congressional races adds to this tilt, and now the bloggers are pummeling anyone who deviates from their definition of ideological purity.

The sequencing of presidential primaries, it is said, has the same effect on the race for the White House. Democratic aspirants have to satisfy the lefties to win Iowa, just as Republicans must placate the religious right to have a chance in South Carolina.

All that may be true. But still the forces of the independent center are gaining. The public disgust with the breakdown of Congress as a functioning institution has liberated more House and Senate candidates to challenge the status quo. They may be the same people, but they're not behaving the same way.

And the political environment is changing. More and more traditional conservatives are complaining that the Bush administration is wrecking their heritage, with its reckless military, foreign and fiscal policies and its disregard for the law. I hear this regularly and have reported it. David Brooks has been making that same point in his influential New York Times columns.

The tide is turning against dogmatism -- and toward political independence.

davidbroder@washpost.com

Bush Sending Delegation To Lebanon (AP)

AP, September 24, 2006

President Bush announced Saturday that he is sending a delegation to Lebanon to meet with Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Siniora and discuss ways to help rebuild his nation left in ruins after this summer's 34 days of fighting between Israel and Hezbollah.

Dina Habib Powell, an Egyptian-born former White House official who is now assistant secretary of state for promoting educational and cultural exchange, will lead the five-member delegation.

The other four delegation members are: Jeffrey Feltman, U.S. ambassador to Lebanon; John Chambers, president and chief executive officer of Cisco Systems; Yousif Ghafari, chairman of GHAFARI Inc.; and Ray Irani, chairman, chief executive officer and president of Occidental Petroleum Corp.

In a statement, the White House also announced that Chambers, Ghafari and Irani along with Craig Barrett, chairman of Intel Corp., are launching a nationwide effort to encourage private donations for reconstruction needed as a result of the conflict. In coming days, the group will ask Americans to donate money to a fund set up to help the Lebanese people, the White House said.

Lebanon's Three-Sided Postwar Game: Who Gets Shabaa Farms? (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

SHABAA, Lebanon — Disarming Hezbollah, the militant Lebanese Shiite group that fought Israel last month, is a major goal in Washington, Jerusalem and even among the political elite in Beirut. But the main stumbling block, at least according to Hezbollah's current position, is a 10-mile-square area of hilly land known as Shabaa Farms.

Israel and the United Nations say the land belongs to Syria and is part of the Golan Heights that has been occupied by Israel since the 1967 war. But the Lebanese insist it is theirs, and Hezbollah says it will not lay down its weapons until Israel gives it back.

DOJ_NMG_0068533

"As long as we have evidence that we own that land, Hezbollah must fight," said Qassem Saab, 52, reiterating Hezbollah's position. Mr. Saab, a Sunni Muslim, was born in his family's mud-brick house on the now-occupied land.

When the long and bloody civil war ended in 1990, all of Lebanon's warring militias agreed to give up their arms — except Hezbollah, which argued that it needed to keep its weapons to fight Israel, then occupying southern Lebanon.

Israel and many other observers say the Lebanese claim on Shabaa Farms gained traction only when Israel withdrew from southern Lebanon in 2000.

According to that view, Hezbollah, backed by Syria, has seized on the farms as a way of legitimizing what it describes as continued resistance against Israeli occupation. Whether or not that claim is legitimate, it is one of the central issues in bringing a sustainable peace to the region.

"Shabaa is the key," said Patrick Renaud, the European Union's representative in Lebanon.

Of course, there is no guarantee that Hezbollah will disarm if the Shabaa Farms area is transferred to Lebanon.

[The leader of Hezbollah, Hassan Nasrallah, told a crowd in the Beirut suburbs on Sept. 22 that no army could force the militia to disarm. He said that even after the 34-day war with Israel, Hezbollah was stronger, and that it had more than 20,000 missiles.]

"Shabaa is important," a Hezbollah Politburo member, Ahmad Malli, said during an interview last week. "But maintaining the sovereignty of Lebanon is more important. We will keep our weapons as long as there is a real threat from Israel."

Even so, the coalition of Lebanese parties opposed to Hezbollah says that removing the Shabaa issue would, at the very least, give it more leverage in pressing Hezbollah to give up its arms.

Israel sees it the other way around. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has said that if Lebanon fulfilled its obligations under the United Nations resolution that ended the fighting — including the disarming of Hezbollah — then Israel would be willing to discuss Shabaa Farms.

For as long as anyone here can remember, the people of Shabaa say they have farmed the southwestern slope of the Mount Hermon foothills, overlooking the Hula Valley of what is now northern Israel.

After France split Lebanon from Syria in the 1920's, most maps showed the border running between the town of Shabaa and the farms. It is one of many pockets of land that were separated from their historic administrative jurisdictions when the Great Powers carved up the Levant, as the region was known, after World War I.

But the maps were moot as far as people on the ground were concerned. Though the French-drawn border put the Shabaa Farms in Syria, the people who owned the farms continued to pay taxes to the government of Beirut and continued to register births, deaths and other events in Lebanon.

The Lebanese say a study commissioned by President Adib al-Shishakli of Syria in 1951 and finally published in 1964 found that the farms were part of Lebanon and that the maps showing them in Syria were wrong. Even Syria still agrees that the farms are Lebanese.

The original 14 farms were divided and passed down through the generations to eventually become 14 hamlets of 20 or 30 houses each. By the time Israel took over the territory, about 200 families shared the land. Sitting in his parlor here, Mohamed Ibrahim Atui, 80, unfolded a stained handwritten deed from 1952 recording his purchase "of 32 olive trees."

"My father sold the land to Mohammad Mahdi in the 1940's, and I bought it from him," Mr. Atui said. He keeps the deed hidden in his house for safekeeping.

Besides olive trees, Mr. Atui said he raised grapes, corn, tomatoes and chickpeas on the land. But he has not seen his land since 1970. "The Palestinians were firing rockets at Israel from the area and so Israel began occupying the land, farm by farm, until they pushed us here," Mr. Atui said.

While protection from such attacks is the primary reason Israel occupied the farms, many Lebanese say that water is the reason Israel is reluctant to let the territory go. Springs and streams fed by the melting snow from Mount Hermon irrigate northern Israel and form the principal tributaries of the Jordan River.

"It's not security, it's water," said the Druse leader, Walid Jumblat.

Shabaa is a Sunni Muslim town, and Mr. Atui, like most of the townspeople, is a staunch supporter of the late Sunni prime minister, Rafik Hariri. Many people in Lebanon contend he was assassinated at the behest of Syria, which backs Hezbollah.

The assassination has driven a wedge between Sunni Hariri supporters and Shiite Hezbollah supporters elsewhere in the country. But the Sunnis of Shabaa support Hezbollah nonetheless.

Hezbollah's persistent attacks are widely credited here with forcing Israel to withdraw that year.

Mr. Atui says he believes that Hezbollah is the only reason Israel would ever give back the farms, because the Lebanese Army and government are so passive on the issue.

The problem for Lebanon is that the United Nations certified that the 2000 Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon was complete. Until the United Nations recognizes Shabaa as Lebanese territory, Israel has no reason to leave unless it withdraws from all of the Golan Heights. The United Nations wants Lebanon and Syria to decide where the border lies before it takes any action.

DOJ_NMG_0068534

But Syria — even though it publicly supports Lebanon's claim to the land — is apparently happy to let the issue simmer, hoping it will lead to negotiations with Israel over the return of the larger territory seized by Israel in the 1967 war.

"Shabaa Farms, from the Syrian point of view, won't be delineated as long as the Golan is occupied," said a political analyst in Damascus who is close to the Syrian government, who spoke only on condition of anonymity. "When you delineate one side you delineate the other, but what is the other, Syria or Israel? Delineating the border would be legitimizing the Israeli occupation."

Like many Lebanese, Mr. Atui contends that once the landowners have recovered their land, Hezbollah will no longer need a militia.

"Hezbollah should continue until the farms are liberated and the prisoners are free, but after that they should put all of their forces under the Lebanese Army," he said. "God willing, they'll do it."

Mr. Saab said, "It's Nasrallah's last reason to fight Israel."

U.S. Delegation for Lebanon

By The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Sept. 23 — A delegation of business leaders will head an effort to encourage Americans to donate money to assist the people of Lebanon in the aftermath of the recent war between Hezbollah and Israel, President Bush said Saturday.

Delegation members also will meet with Prime Minister Fouad Siniora and local business leaders in Beirut, the White House said.

The effort will be headed by Craig R. Barrett, the chairman of Intel; John T. Chambers, the chief executive of Cisco Systems; Yousif Ghafari, the chairman of Ghafari; and Ray R. Irani, the chief executive of Occidential Petroleum.

Delusion In Damascus (WP)

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Bashar Assad believes that Syria won the Lebanese war.

IN THE aftermath of the summer war in Lebanon, the Middle East is haunted by the hubris of two self-declared winners. Israel and Hezbollah, which did the actual fighting, are both licking their wounds. But Iran is in a triumphalist mood, as the rhetoric of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at the United Nations last week confirmed. And so, it seems, is Hezbollah's other foreign sponsor, Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. Countries around the region are responding to what they see as the new strategic menace from Tehran; witness Egypt's announcement that it would soon propose its own nuclear program. But Syria is more likely to trigger a new round of armed conflict in the near future.

The threat stems from Mr. Assad's overt resistance to the U.N. Security Council resolution that ended the war. Among other provisions, the resolution mandated the expansion of a U.N. peacekeeping force along the Lebanese-Israeli border and prohibited any state from helping Hezbollah to rearm. Mr. Assad has denounced the deployment of European troops as part of the U.N. force; last week he described it as a Western plot to divide the Arab world. More significantly, he has threatened that any deployment of the force along the Lebanese-Syrian border would be treated by Damascus as hostile.

Mr. Assad's bluster has successfully deterred the Lebanese and Western governments from taking serious steps to stop the traffic of arms and explosives from Syria to Lebanon. The scores of roads and tracks crossing the border have been the principal routes for missiles and other arms supplies to Hezbollah. They also carry the bombs that Syria's agents have used in a continuing assassination campaign against Lebanese politicians who favor the country's independence from Damascus.

Mr. Assad knows that if he attempts to supply Hezbollah with new weapons he will invite an attack by Israel, which has vowed to prevent any resupply. The Syrian president even referred to that possibility in an interview published last week. But he appears undeterred. In a speech last month he declared that Hezbollah's "victory" in the war had ushered in "a new Middle East," one in which the "enemy" Israel would inevitably be defeated by force of arms. When U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan arrived two weeks later to ask for Syria's cooperation in implementing the resolution, Mr. Assad treated him to "a diatribe . . . depicting the Western powers as bankrupt and powerless," according to a report by Warren Hoge of the New York Times.

Remarkably, Mr. Annan emerged from that meeting to tell the world that Mr. Assad had assured him that Syria would take steps to secure the border. The many statesmen who have tried to do business with the Syrian president in the past -- such as former secretary of state Colin L. Powell or Egypt's Hosni Mubarak -- have discovered that such assurances are not only worthless but deliberately mendacious. Yet Mr. Annan and the European governments deploying troops to Lebanon are essentially counting on those words -- rather than firm measures of their own -- to prevent a new crisis in which their own soldiers would be at risk. That's a lot to expect from a callow and corrupt dictator who believes he is on top of a "new" Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0068535

Setback On Forming Palestinian Coalition (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

CAIRO, Sept. 23 (AP) — Efforts to form a Palestinian government acceptable to the West have gone "back to zero," the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, said Saturday, a day after the militant faction Hamas said a coalition that recognized Israel would be unacceptable.

Hamas won elections in January, but agreed this month to share power with Mr. Abbas's Fatah in hopes of ending a crippling international aid boycott of the Palestinian Authority.

The Hamas-Fatah coalition deal sidestepped recognition, saying the government would seek a Palestinian state alongside Israel, which implies recognition. However, the United States and Israel demanded a clear Hamas commitment, and Mr. Abbas was forced to revisit the issue.

At the United Nations on Thursday, Mr. Abbas indicated that a unity government would recognize Israel. But the Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniya, said the next day that he would not lead a coalition that recognizes Israel.

Mr. Abbas said Saturday during a visit to Cairo to meet with President Hosni Mubarak that "backtracking took place" on the negotiations for a unity government with Hamas. "Sadly, we are back to zero," he said.

A CONVERSATION WITH MAHMOUD AHMADINEJAD (WP)

Lally Weymouth

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

Do you think it would be in Iran's best interest to move toward a normal relationship with the United States?

We are interested in having talks with everyone. We believe that talks are much better than threats and confrontation. We are currently holding talks with many countries. I have said before that the United States is no exception, but the U.S. administration -- that is, a section of the U.S. administration -- does not create the right circumstances. It destroys chances for constructive talks.

Because a part of the administration wants to overthrow your regime?

It is the behavior I am talking about; the attitude is inappropriate. They believe that they own the entire world so they speak from that position, looking down at us -- even when they meet us. If they change their behavior, it is possible to talk about everything. Some politicians in the United States think that the nuclear issue is a way to put pressure on Iran, but they are wrong. One that has actually produced and used nuclear bombs cannot claim that they now want to stop proliferation.

Why don't you let the IAEA inspectors back in, as the U.N. Security Council demanded last summer?

The Security Council's involvement is, in fact, illegal. We are working under the framework of the IAEA, and the cameras are on our sites. Could you please show me at least one report by the IAEA on the United States' nuclear facilities?

Are you really serious when you say that Israel should be wiped off the face of the Earth?

We need to look at the scene in the Middle East -- 60 years of war, 60 years of displacement, 60 years of conflict, not even a day of peace. Look at the war in Lebanon, the war in Gaza -- what are the reasons for these conditions? We need to address and resolve the root problem.

Your suggestion is to wipe Israel off the face of the Earth?

Our suggestion is very clear: . . . Let the Palestinian people decide their fate in a free and fair referendum, and the result, whatever it is, should be accepted. . . . The people with no roots there are now ruling the land.

You've been quoted as saying that Israel should be wiped off the face of the Earth. Is that your belief?

What I have said has made my position clear. If we look at a map of the Middle East from 70 years ago . . .

So, the answer is yes, you do believe that it should be wiped off the face of the Earth?

Are you asking me yes or no? Is this a test? Do you respect the right to self-determination for the Palestinian nation? Yes or no? Is Palestine, as a nation, considered a nation with the right to live under humane conditions or not? Let's allow those rights to be enforced for these 5 million displaced people.

If the Palestinian people decided that they wanted a two-state solution, would you support that decision?

The politicians in the United States should allow the Palestinians to vote, and then we'll all respect the results. They won't even accept a small Palestinian state. That's why we think the root cause of the crisis must be addressed. Jews, like other individuals, will have to be respected. It's not necessary to occupy the land of others, to displace them, to imprison their young people and to destroy their homes and agricultural fields and to attack neighboring countries.

What is your analysis of Hezbollah in Lebanon today? What has been the impact of the war?

DOJ_NMG_0068536

Everybody has said that the attacks of the Israeli government against Lebanon were pre-planned. The question is: The planes that leveled Lebanon, the laser bombs, where did they come from? Who provided the Zionists with the armaments? Who prevented a cease-fire in the beginning?

I think a section within the U.S. administration must take a new look at the Middle East. They should not assume that they can fix the problems of the Middle East through war.

In your meeting with the Iraqi prime minister last week, did any ideas emerge as to how to stabilize the situation in Iraq?

Saddam was a detested individual, no doubt, and although he was supported by a group of American politicians during the eight-year war with Iran, we nonetheless were happy when he left. This paved the way for the American government to improve their relations with the people in the region, but they lost the opportunity -- they decided to occupy Iraq in search of oil and their own interests. . . . The Iraqi nation has deep roots -- an ancient, civilized culture -- it cannot accept to remain under occupation. It cannot accept that its authorities are told on a daily basis what to do by American authorities. In the past years, hundreds of thousands of Iraqi civilians have been killed. Even worse than what it was under Saddam.

Everybody in Iraq is unhappy. Iraq has a government now that has risen as a result of the vote of the people and it has a constitution and a parliament. Let them run and administer the country. Our policy is to support the government of Iraq, to create security for the country.

It seems as if a Shiite majority has emerged with the bulk of power in Iraq. Is this good from Iran's point of view?

We are friends with the entire nation of Iraq. Our nation is like an extended family of the Iraqi nation. . . . We are not like American politicians who divide people and fracture.

[Prime Minister Nouri al-]Maliki has said that the most important job for him is to control the militias, many of which have close contact with Iran and some of which receive money from Iran. Will you help Prime Minister Maliki control the militias?

This is your mistake again. Mr. Maliki is a friend of ours. Our nations are very close. The country that is hurt most by the insecurity in Iraq is our country.

Everyone in the region says Iran is now the most powerful country -- that the result of the U.S. invasion is that Iran is more powerful than it has ever been.

Do you think there is a problem with Iran being a powerful country? Are you implying that the Americans went there to strengthen Iran?

No, but don't you think that is the end result?

Iran is a powerful country. A powerful Iran will benefit the region because Iran is a country with a deep culture and has always been a peaceful country. If the Americans had not imposed the shah, Iran could have been a far more powerful country.

Are you going to continue backing terror groups -- Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad?

Are you here on a mission or are you a journalist? A journalist does not judge. You say that Hamas is a terror group. Hamas is working in its own territory, in its own country. Why do you call them terrorists? If someone occupied the United States and the American people rose to defend their home, would you call the American people terrorists?

I would say they were terrorists if they started killing civilians.

The Palestinian people have the right to live. Gaza is being bombarded. Homes are being destroyed. Why? Because some politicians in the United States insist on supporting the Zionists at the cost of destroying the Palestinians and buying the hatred of all the nations in the region.

This will work against the American government because anti-American sentiment and hatred is increasing by the day. One day it could turn into a storm.

You've made statements about the Holocaust, saying maybe it was exaggerated. Is that your opinion?

It's not the numbers that are important here. It's a very fundamental question: When we allow all researchers to do research freely, why don't researchers have the right to research this history as well? Let's remember that 60 million people were killed as a result of World War II. So let's put everything in context and let's research it further. . . . We know this was a historical event that has happened. But why is it that people who question it, even in the smallest sense, are persecuted and attacked?

Are you willing to take any steps to suspend uranium enrichment?

We think that the American politicians should change their attitudes. If they think that by threatening Iran they'll have results, they are wrong. I'll ask you: Who cut ties with Iran? It was the U.S. government. Who imposed the war with Saddam on us? So who is the one who has to give the positive signal, us or the U.S. government?

What do you want the United States to do for you and what are you willing to do in turn for the U.S.?

I sent a very detailed and caring letter [to President Bush]; I truly mean it when I say that I hope Mr. Bush will change his behavior and attitude. It doesn't make us happy that sentiments against him rise on a daily basis around the world. This can be reversed. It's the attitude and the approach of some American politicians that ruins things. They want to return Iran to what it was before the revolution, under the shah, when it was really a puppet for the United States. That's history. It will never come back. The Iranian nation is a free and independent nation with an elected government, a parliament and a constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0068537

How can you come to this country and tell our president to change his behavior?

We're just defending our honor.

Ahmadinejad's Gauntlet (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

The U.S. and Iran Need Each Other Too Much Not to Find Accommodation

NEW YORK -- The most telling moment in a conversation here last week with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad came when he was asked if America would attack Iran. He quickly answered "no," with a slight cock of his head as if he regarded the very idea of war between the two countries as preposterous.

Ahmadinejad's confidence was the overriding theme of his visit. He was like a picador, deftly sticking darts into a wounded bull. As he moved from event to event -- TV and print interviews, a chat with the august Council on Foreign Relations, his lecture to the U.N. General Assembly -- he displayed the same flinty composure. It sometimes seemed as if he owned New York, dispensing his radical bromides like a tidy, compact version of Fidel Castro. I sensed the same certainty that was expressed by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini back when this confrontation began in the late 1970s: "America cannot do a damn thing."

Over the course of a week's time, I had an unusual chance to sit with both President Bush and President Ahmadinejad and hear their thoughts about Iran. The contrasts were striking: Bush is groping for answers to the Iran problem; you sense him struggling for a viable strategy. When I asked what message he wanted to send the Iranian people, Bush seemed eager for more contact: He spoke of Iran's importance, of its great history and culture, of its legitimate rights. He made similar comments in his speech Tuesday to the U.N. General Assembly.

Ahmadinejad, meanwhile, is sitting back and enjoying the attention. He's not groping for anything; he's waiting for the world to come to him. When you boil down his comments, the message is similar to Bush's: Iran wants a diplomatic solution to the nuclear impasse; Iran wants dialogue; Iran wants more cultural exchanges. At one point, Ahmadinejad even said that "under fair conditions," he would favor a resumption of diplomatic relations with the United States.

But if the words of accommodation are there, the music is not. Instead of sending a message to the administration that he is serious about negotiations, Ahmadinejad spent the week playing to the gallery of Third World activists and Muslim revolutionaries with his comments about Israel and the Holocaust. This audience hears the defiant message between the lines: America cannot do a damn thing.

Ahmadinejad is the calmest revolutionary I've ever seen. Sitting in a plush easy chair in his suite at the InterContinental hotel, he barely moves a muscle as he makes the most radical statements. His feet don't jiggle, his hands don't make gestures, his facial expression barely changes. His eyes are the most expressive part of his body -- sparkling one moment, glowering the next, focusing down to dark points when he is angry.

An interview with Ahmadinejad is an intellectual ping-pong match. He bounces back each question with one of his own: Ask about Hezbollah's attacks, and he asks about Israel's attacks. Question his defiance of the United Nations, and he shifts to America's defiance of the world body. In more than an hour of conversation with me and Lally Weymouth of Newsweek, he didn't deviate from his script. Indeed, some of his comments in the interview were repeated almost word for word when he addressed the General Assembly a few hours later. This is a man adept at message control.

The common strand I take away from this week of Iranian-American conversation is that the two countries agree on one central fact: Iran is a powerful nation that should play an important role in the international system. Bush put it to me this way: "I would say to the Iranian people: We respect your history. We respect your culture. . . . I recognize the importance of your sovereignty." Here was Ahmadinejad's formulation, when I asked how Iran could help stabilize Iraq: "A powerful Iran will benefit the region because Iran is a country with a deep culture and has always been a peaceful country."

That's the challenge: Can America and Iran find a formula that will meet each side's security interests, and thereby allow Iran to return fully to the community of nations after 27 years? Iran can't achieve its ambitions as a rising power without an accommodation with America. America can't achieve its interest in stabilizing the Middle East without help from Iran. The potential for war is there, but so is the bedrock of mutual self-interest. The simple fact is that these two countries need each other.

David Ignatius co-hosts with Fareed Zakaria of Newsweek an ongoing discussion of international issues called PostGlobal, athttp://www.washingtonpost.com. David Ignatius can be reached atdavidignatius@washpost.com.

U.S., Libyan Diplomats Celebrate Ties (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0068538

By Anne Gearan

AP, September 24, 2006

Top diplomats from the United States and Libya celebrated their newfound friendship Saturday, but disputes remain from more than two decades of hostility.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice points to Libya as a model for other nations after its historic decision to renounce weapons of mass destruction and engage the world, but she has repeatedly put off a splashy trip to Tripoli to inaugurate a U.S. Embassy. The United States quietly upgraded its small diplomatic office in Tripoli to an embassy this summer, but has held no formal ceremony to mark the occasion.

Rice saw her Libyan counterpart here instead, on the sidelines of the U.N. opening session.

Rice and Libyan Foreign Minister Abdurahman Shalgam discussed cooperation in fighting terrorism, a turnabout for the North African nation that the United States long called a terror sponsor.

A U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the meeting was private, said Rice also emphasized what the United States sees as a need to resolve outstanding legal issues related to the 1988 bombing of Pam Am flight 103.

The Pan Am issue is one of two major sticking points between Washington and Tripoli four months after the United States announced it would establish full diplomatic ties with Libya and remove it from the State Department's list of state terror sponsors.

It was not clear whether Rice and Shalgam aired the other outstanding issue: Libya's treatment of five Bulgarian nurses and a Palestinian doctor accused of infecting Libyan children with the virus that causes AIDS.

Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi surprised the world in late 2003 when he swore off terrorism and announced plans to dismantle his country's weapons of mass destruction programs. Libya was eager to end the international isolation and economic hardships from United Nations and U.S. sanctions in the Pan Am case, and Gadhafi concluded the weapons programs were best used as a bargaining chip.

The diplomatic thaw began almost immediately, with the opening of a small U.S. diplomatic office in Libya in 2004.

The U.S. had not had formal diplomatic relations with Libya since 1980.

Although Gadhafi is apparently eager to demonstrate his new status as a U.S. friend, Rice is not expected to pay a visit until the case of the medics is resolved.

The United States says the six should be freed and allowed to go home; Libya says they remain under charge.

The Bush administration went ahead with plans to establish normal diplomatic relations with Libya despite pressure to slow the process from families of Americans killed in the Pan Am bombing.

Libya was held responsible for the airliner bombing, which claimed 270 lives, most of them American.

Families of victims say they are still owed $2 million apiece as part of a settlement that Libya made with the United States. The families have already received $8 million each.

Rice Presses Libyan FM On Terror Compensation (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, September 24, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pressed her Libyan counterpart to finalize compensation payments to US victims of Libyan terrorist attacks, one of the last remaining disputes between the former enemy states, a senior US official said.

Rice also urged Foreign Minister Abdurahman Shalgam to release "on humanitarian grounds" five Bulgarian nurses and a Palestinian doctor convicted of injecting Libyan children with the AIDS virus, the official said.

Their meeting, on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly, was the first between Rice and Shalgam since the United States and Libya established full diplomatic relations in May following a 25-year rupture.

US-Libyan relations have warmed dramatically since the regime of Moamer Kadhafi renounced terrorism and abandoned efforts to develop weapons of mass destruction in late 2003.

A key to the rapprochement was Libyan acknowledgement of responsibility for two terrorist attacks that took US lives: the 1986 bombing of the La Belle disco in Berlin, where two US servicemen were among the victims, and the 1988 destruction of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, that killed 270.

Libya agreed to pay 10 million US dollars in compensation to the families of each of the Lockerbie victims, but has so far only paid out eight million dollars each.

While Tripoli also reached a compensation agreement for non-US victims of the La Belle bombing, a similar demand by the US victims is still in federal courts.

During Saturday's meeting with Shalgam, Rice "emphasized the need to resolve the outstanding issues related to Pan Am 103 and the La Belle claims," the senior official said on condition of anonymity.

DOJ_NMG_0068539

She also "urged a rapid resolution on humanitarian grounds" of the case involving the six foreign medical workers, the official said.

The six have been jailed since 1999 and were sentenced to death by firing squad in May 2004 for "knowingly" injecting over 400 Libyan children with AIDS-tainted blood in a Benghazi hospital. Some 50 of the children have died.

The Libyan Supreme Court quashed the conviction, but a retrial is currently underway in Tripoli and prosecutors have again demanded the death penalty.

Foreign health experts have testified in defense of the six that the AIDS infections were caused by poor hygiene at the hospital long before the arrival of the foreign personnel.

The US State Department has called repeatedly for the release of the six, as well as progress on a number of human rights issues in Libya.

Since the reestablishment of diplomatic relations, which were cut in 1981, a number of senior State Department diplomats have visited Tripoli.

But Rice herself has yet to seal the renewal of ties with a visit of her own, conditioning the trip on the release of the foreign medical workers.

She brushed aside a reporter's question at the start of Saturday's meeting about whether she could visit Libya soon if the issue was resolved.

"We'll let you know our travel plans when we have them," she said.

The senior official said Rice and Shalgam also discussed counter-terrorism cooperation and efforts to convince the government in neighboring Sudan to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers to halt violence in its Darfur region.

'Empower Women,' Rice Tells Female Politicians (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice gathered other influential female political leaders to promote the empowerment of their gender.

"We all have experiences we would like to share," she told about 20 female political figures, including Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, Africa's first elected woman head of state. "We have to promote and empower women," Rice added. "We are going to champion the empowerment of women because it is only right."

Islamists Calm Somali Capital With Restraint (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Sept. 23 — As the sun begins to sink over this broken city, work crews swing their axes over their shoulders and head home.

Young couples take to the waterfront, mingling openly in the salty breeze. Thousands of children flock to soccer fields in the city center, with a backdrop of beautifully crumbled ruins from battles now over.

It is hard to imagine that this is Mogadishu, the same Mogadishu of “Black Hawk Down,” and clan against clan and 15 years of anarchy. But over the past three months, the Islamists in control here have defied international expectations — in many ways. Not only have they pacified one of the most dangerous cities in the world, they also seem to have moderated their message.

Instead of acting like the Taliban and ruthlessly imposing a harsh religious orthodoxy, as many feared, the Islamists seem to be trying to increase public support by softening their views, at least officially, delivering social services and pushing for democratic elections.

Islamic leaders are operating almost in campaign mode, organizing street cleanups, visiting hospitals, overseeing a mini building boom and recruiting elderly policemen to don faded uniforms they have not worn for years and return to work. Beyond that, they sent a letter this week to the United Nations Security Council pledging to support democratic rule.

Maybe this is just smooth talk. Or premature signs that could prove misleading. Hard-core elements still operate here, including militiamen who drive around with black scarves and black flags and shoot people for watching Hollywood movies. Young men like them were believed to have killed an Italian nun at a Mogadishu hospital last Sunday, apparently in retaliation for Pope Benedict XVI’s remarks on Islam.

But the Islamist leaders say they are rogue elements who will be punished, and they have reopened some movie theaters and issued decrees emphasizing tolerance. Whether they live up to those promises seems to hinge on whether they can, or even want to, rein in the militant groups that helped propel them to power.

DOJ_NMG_0068540

"The world was so quick to label us," said Ibrahim Hassan Addou, the foreign minister for the Islamic administration in Mogadishu. "All we are asking is to be judged on our deeds."

The United States continues to assert that the Islamists are sheltering Al Qaeda terrorists. The suicide attack against the United Nations-backed transitional government in Baidoa on Monday only reinforced that suspicion, though the Islamists deny any involvement.

But the darkest fears of a draconian Islam on Africa's east coast have not come true, at least not yet. Boys are allowed to play soccer, and girls are allowed to go to school, despite rumors to the contrary. And businesses are not forced to close during prayer time, as has been widely reported outside of Mogadishu.

In fact, people were selling bread, biscuits and watermelon right in front of the Islamic forces' headquarters during the noon prayer earlier this week. The teenage militia members standing guard regressed to the boys that they were, giggling over giant slices of watermelon and spitting seeds at each other, the juice running down their chins and dripping onto their guns.

"Nobody knows where we're headed," said Ahmed Mohammed Ali, chairman of a Mogadishu human rights organization. But, he added, the Islamists "pacified this place and brought the clans together."

"Whatever you think about them," he said, "you can't overlook that."

There is a famous story that says much about Somalia. It sounds like a fable, but according to several Somali businessmen, it is sad but true.

There were two close friends who owned a fishery north of Mogadishu. They were like brothers and vowed that if anything ever happened to either of them, the other would take care of the his family. They were from the same clan but from different branches of it, the Saad and the Saleeban. One day the Saad man was caught in a cross-fire and killed accidentally by a Saleeban militia. Within hours, the Saad took their revenge and without consulting the dead man's family shot to death his best friend.

"Anarchy is bad, man," said Adam Daley, a Somali-American businessman living in Mogadishu. "Can you imagine New York City without any police? Or light?"

This is how Mogadishu, the capital of Somalia, was since 1991, when clan-based warlords brought down the central government. United States marines and United Nations peacekeepers tried to restore order, but the people rallied behind the warlords and helped drive the foreigners out.

The fighting razed the city's famed Italian architecture and left a leadership vacuum. Gradually, clan elders set up small courts to resolve disputes, using Islamic law to guide them.

Before the war, that might have seemed strange. Somalia used to be a secular place, where women wore skirts and men drank beer.

But in the period of anarchy, the culture changed. After Western aid organizations pulled out, Arab charities rushed in, bringing Koranic schools and more religion.

Militant Islamic groups opened camps in Somalia's deserts. According to terrorism analysts, American intelligence officers began hiring warlords to kidnap terrorism suspects and take them to bases outside Somalia. Often the suspects were innocent imams or businessmen who were soon set free.

By 2004, the Islamist groups teamed up with clan courts and businessmen to protect themselves from the warlords, calling their alliance the Union for Islamic Courts.

Last winter, the warlords announced that they, too, had formed an alliance, the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counterterrorism. It was a well-known fact, buttressed by the annoying aerial drone that buzzed over Mogadishu at night, that they had American support.

That played straight into the hands of the Islamists, who quickly built an army called the Shabab, or youth, made up of young, devout fighters, to overthrow the warlords. The Shabab wore green skull caps and little beards. They did not smoke cigarettes or chew qat, the popular narcotic leaf that had spurred so much of Mogadishu's madness.

People were impressed.

"Every day at noon women were driving to the front lines to bring these guys food," recalled Ali Iman Sharmarke, one of the founders of the HornAfrik television and radio station.

The warlords were steadily pushed back and soon could not trust anyone, including phone operators, whom they suspected of tapping their calls.

"We had no communication or leadership," said Col. Ali Warsame, whose warlord commander ended up fleeing Mogadishu on the back of a donkey and wearing a veil. By the first week of June, all the warlords had been defeated.

The courts' first move was a thank you to their patrons. Within weeks, Mogadishu's port and airport, which had been essentially closed for more than a decade, were open for business.

The courts then took many of the warlords' militiamen to an old army base outside the city.

DOJ_NMG_0068541

There, under a searing sun, 700 young men march in circles, chanting, “God is great!” and doing a funny elbow-swinging goose step.

“It’s Russian,” Col. Muhidin Haji, the camp commander, explained.

The courts are now focusing on civil administration, with committees on sanitation, reconstruction, education and justice. Investment money is already flowing back in. The streets around Mogadishu’s main market are clogged with trucks hauling logs and cement. To oversee all this, the Islamists have appointed university professors, including many educated abroad, to crucial posts.

The Islamists are meeting with leaders from the transitional government based in Baidoa, 150 miles inland, to discuss sharing power. Despite being recognized by the United Nations, the transitional government has very little support among Somalis.

Under a United Nations-backed framework, Somalia is supposed to have elections by 2009. The Islamists say the sooner the better. They know they are the most popular force in the country.

One morning this week, hundreds of men volunteered for an Islamist-organized clean up. With the clap of his hands, the work leader sent them plunging into overgrown thickets to clear brush. “It’s an exchange,” said Abdul Aziz Issah, one of the workers. “They brought us peace, we give them work.”

There is so much of it to do. Huge swaths of the capital have been reduced to ruins, with an arch left here, half a crumbling wall left there. In many places, Mogadishu looks like an ancient city that has been deserted for centuries, just riddled with holes.

Somalian Militia Looks To Take Over Port (AP)

By Mohamed Sheikh Nor

AP, September 24, 2006

Hundreds of Islamic militiamen in heavily armed trucks headed Saturday to the strategic town of Kismayo in what appeared to be an imminent takeover attempt of one of the last seaports outside their control in Somalia, witnesses said.

Key leaders of the Islamic militia — which controls the capital, Mogadishu, along with much of southern Somalia — have been in Kismayo for several days in direct challenge to the warlords who are in control there.

Fearful residents of the town, some 260 miles southwest of Mogadishu, have been fleeing across the border to Kenya in case fighting breaks out.

"I saw 50 trucks from the Islamic courts and more than 300 militiamen who were heading to Kismayo," Quasim Munye told The Associated Press from the coastal town of Brava, which is on the only road that leads to Kismayo. "The trucks were huge and the militias well-prepared."

Somalia has not had an effective national government since 1991, when warlords overthrew dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on one another, throwing the country into anarchy.

An official government was formed in 2004 with U.N. help in hopes of restoring order after years of lawlessness. But the Islamic movement seized Mogadishu in June and now controls much of the country's south.

The government controls just one town, Baidoa, 150 miles from the capital, but it has a strong ally in Kismayo. The government's defense minister, Col. Barre "Hirale" Aden Shire, is a member of the Juba Valley Alliance that rules the town.

The United States has accused the Islamic group of sheltering suspects in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Al-Qaida chief Osama bin Laden has portrayed Somalia as a battleground in his war on the U.S.

The group's strict and often severe interpretation of Islam raises memories of Afghanistan's Taliban, which was ousted by a U.S.-led campaign for harboring bin Laden and al-Qaida fighters. Still, many residents credit the courts with bringing a semblance of order.

Also this week, Islamic leaders in the capital banned the sale of a leafy stimulant called qat, which is wildly popular among Somalis, during daytime in the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which begins this weekend. Islamic officials in Balad, about 18 miles from the capital, banned qat altogether during Ramadan.

Islamists consider qat un-Islamic but have generally tolerated it since they came to power. Users chew qat like loose tobacco and experience a mild buzz that lasts for anywhere between 90 minutes to a few hours. It can also cause an elevated heart rate and create a feeling of euphoria.

Kurdish Rebels Suspected In Turkey Blast (AP)

By Selcan Hacaoglu

AP, September 24, 2006

Suspected Kurdish guerrillas set off an explosive-laden minibus across from a police guest house in eastern Turkey Saturday, injuring 17 people, the governor's office said.

DOJ_NMG_0068542

The Ford minibus parked across from the police guest house, went off in eastern city of Igdir on the Armenian border. The blast shattered the windows of the police guest house and other buildings in the area.

Two of the injured were in serious condition, the governor's office said. The injured included five police officers and officials of a small soccer club who traveled from Ankara to Igdir for a match, private Dogan news agency said.

The explosion coincided with complaints by imprisoned rebel chief Abdullah Ocalan about his prison conditions, which were relayed by his lawyers, the pro-Kurdish news agency Firat reported on its Web site on Saturday.

The attack also comes after recent declaration of cooperation between Turkey, the United States and Iraq in fighting the guerrillas, who are based in northern Iraq.

The conflict has claimed the lives of more than 37,000 people since the guerrillas took up arms for autonomy in 1984.

The rebels have recently intensified attacks across the country and have so far ignored a recent call by the pro-Kurdish Democratic Society Party to declare a unilateral cease-fire in the hopes of establishing dialogue with the state.

Earlier Saturday, autonomy-seeking Kurdish rebels detonated a remote-controlled bomb, derailing a freight train in southeastern Turkey, officials said. No injuries were reported in that attack which occurred in the province of Elazig.

In late August, the rebels have also carried out bomb attack in Mediterranean resorts, killing at least three people and wounding dozens, including 10 Britons in a minibus bombing in the popular resort town of Marmaris.

Ocalan has been in prison on the prison island of Imrali, off Istanbul, since his capture on Feb. 15, 1999 in Kenya. His guerrilla group has long demanded that Ocalan be moved out of solitary confinement and expressed concern about his health.

A delegation from the Council of Europe's committee for the prevention of torture, which visited Ocalan on the island in 1999, said the rebel leader's cell was well lit and suitably equipped.

Turkey also maintains that doctors closely monitor Ocalan's health.

Venezuela: U.S. Held Foreign Minister (AP)

By Ian James

AP, September 24, 2006

Venezuela's foreign minister said he was illegally detained for 90 minutes at a New York airport Saturday by U.S. authorities whom he accused of treating him abusively and attempting to frisk him.

U.S. and U.N. officials called the incident regrettable but said Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro had been identified for "secondary screening" — an added security check that can kick in for a variety of reasons.

"We were the object of an illegal detention by the U.S. government," Maduro told reporters at Venezuela's mission to the U.N. "We were detained during an hour and a half, threatened by police of being beaten."

Maduro said the authorities at John F. Kennedy International Airport at one point ordered him and other officials to spread their arms and legs and be frisked, but he said they forcefully refused.

He said his passport and ticket were retained for a time, and finally given back to him. But he said the incident prevented him from traveling home Saturday.

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke denied that Maduro was mistreated. "There's no evidence to substantiate any sort of abnormality in the screening process."

The incident comes as tensions between the two countries — strained for several years — took a particularly confrontational turn. Both Maduro and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez were in New York the past week attending the yearly U.N. General Assembly, where Chavez called President Bush "the devil" during his speech and criticized him during a stop in Harlem.

Knocke said in Washington that Maduro was referred for further screening but never reached that section of the airport.

"He began to articulate his frustration with secondary screening right after he went through the magnetometer," he said, referring to the walk-through metal detector. "Port Authority officials confronted him when the situation became a ruckus." Knocke did not elaborate.

Airlines check passengers names against watch lists and apply certain criteria — such as paying for a ticket with cash — to direct passengers to a more intensive, or "secondary," screening process.

A U.N. diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly, said that Maduro's trip was delayed because he had showed up late without a ticket, prompting the screening.

"We can confirm that a regrettable incident occurred at John F. Kennedy airport for which the U.S. government has apologized to Foreign Minister Maduro and the government of Venezuela," U.S. State Department spokesman Tom Casey said.

Maduro told the reporters that his government has been in touch with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan about the incident and was gathering a team of lawyers to challenge a detention that he said violated international law.

DOJ_NMG_0068543

Earlier, Chavez said on Venezuelan television that U.S. officials had detained Maduro after linking him to a failed coup that Chavez led in Venezuela in 1992.

"They have held him accusing him of participating in terrorist acts here," Chavez said in Venezuela. "He didn't even participate in that patriotic rebellion," he said, referring to the uprising he led while still an army officer.

Chavez has previously called Bush a "devil," "donkey" and "madman." While two countries are tied by oil — Venezuela is among the top five suppliers of crude to the U.S. — relations soured sharply in 2002 after the Bush administration swiftly recognized leaders who briefly ousted Chavez in a coup, before the Venezuelan returned to power amid street protests.

Bush's political foes and friends alike have condemned the remarks, newspapers have sharply criticized the Venezuelan leader, while a call has emerged for businesses to boycott Venezuela-owned Citgo Petroleum Corp. One U.S. governor said his state is no longer interested in buying discounted heating oil from Venezuela this winter.

Earlier Saturday, Chavez said Bush may be seeking to kill him for calling him "the devil" at the United Nations.

"Some worried friends over there have called me (to say) that because I called him the devil they have condemned me to death," Chavez said without elaborating further on his sources.

___

AP U.N. correspondent Edith M. Lederer contributed to this report.

US Apologizes After Venezuelan FM Detained At Airport (AFP)

By Alfons Luna

AFP, September 24, 2006

Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro said he was temporarily detained, threatened and stripped of his travel documents at a New York airport, prompting an apology from the US government.

"I was detained in a room ... for an an hour and 40 minutes" at John F. Kennedy International Airport, Maduro told CNN television in remarks broadcast on Venezuelan television. "Then they handed me to a delegation headed by our UN ambassador (Francisco Arias Cardenas)."

"I denounce before the world the US government. I ask UN Secretary General Kofi Annan that he speak about this case, that investigations be opened. I demand that the US government respect international rights."

Maduro, who attended the United Nations General Assembly in New York this week, said "the situation got worse" when he identified himself to the security officiers as Venezuela's chief diplomat.

"I told the on-duty officials that I was the foreign minister, and the situation got worse because they started insulting, yelling and brought a police officer ... and they started threatening us," Maduro said.

"Now I have no documents and cannot travel," he said.

At a later news conference, Maduro said: "We were threatened with being beaten."

"They took my passport and plane ticket and only gave them back to me at the end, after I had made a public denouncement" of the incident.

He said he received a phone call from Thomas Shannon, the US top diplomat for Latin America, who expressed surprise at the incident.

When US State Department officials arrived on the scene, and Maduro said he thought the situation would be resolved, "we were told to spread our feet and stretch out our arms so the police could search us."

Maduro said UN chief Annan "had designated a team of lawyers that will immediately start work on the case."

He called the incident "a complex, shameful situation and an attack against international law," and linked it to a speech by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez at the UN General Assembly this week in which the anti-US leader called his American counterpart George W. Bush the "devil."

The US Homeland Security Department denied Maduro's claims.

"There's no evidence to support any of this," US Homeland Security Department spokesman Russ Knocke told AFP by telephone.

"There's no evidence to support the claim that his travel documents were taken away, there's no evidence to support the claim that he was assaulted, there's no evidence to support the claim that he was somehow arrested or taken into custody," he said.

Knocke said Maduro was simply asked to go through a routine, secondary security screening.

The US State Department later confirmed the incident and apologized.

"The State Department can confirm there was an incident with Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro at JFK airport in New York," department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos said.

DOJ_NMG_0068544

"The State Department regrets this incident. The United States government apologized to Foreign Minister Maduro and the Venezuelan government."

According to a State Department official, the airport security services "questioned" the foreign minister and asked the State Department to confirm his diplomatic identity.

"Diplomatic security was sent out to the airport. We understand he was able to board the plane before it took off but he refused and returned to New York City," the official said on condition of anonymity.

Earlier, Chavez accused Bush of ordering his assassination for his "devil" remark Wednesday at the UN General Assembly.

"The devil appears very sulphurous, and a few people say that he has given the order to kill me," Chavez said during a speech before scientists in western Venezuela.

"Many concerned friends have called me, (saying) that because I said 'devil' over there (at the UN), they have sentenced me to die. They will not kill me, I have much faith in life," Chavez added.

Chavez said Maduro had been detained for allegedly taking part in a failed coup attempt in Venezuela on February 4, 1992, that Chavez had led against then-president Carlos Andres Perez.

"Apparently he is on a list for February 4," Chavez said on Venezuelan television. "But he was not in the rebellion."

A Speech That Khrushchev Or Arafat Or Che Would Admire (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

UNITED NATIONS

WHEN President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela used his General Assembly appearance to call President Bush a devil who had left a telltale scent of sulfur on the speaker's podium, he was acting in an old, if not grand, tradition.The General Assembly hall with its green marble rostrum and giant golden screen bearing the United Nations seal was meant to sound with high-minded calls for international understanding. But on more than a few occasions, the cathedral-like space has rung instead with barbs and insults. And American presidents — from Harry Truman to Bill Clinton to George H.W. Bush — have been the favored targets.

In 1950, Wu Xiuquan, a Chinese representative, denounced the Truman administration effort to promote Taiwan, saying, "This is a preposterous farce, unworthy of refutation, in which Truman makes a mockery of Truman himself."

President Reagan came in for a Hollywood-specific scolding in 1987 from Daniel Ortega, the president of Nicaragua. Denouncing Mr. Reagan's decision to continue financing contras fighting his Sandinista regime, Mr. Ortega said, "Rambo only exists in the movies."

Cuban foreign minister Roberto Robaina in 1996 took after President Clinton, saying, "We are facing a King Kong escaped from its cage, destroying and smashing without orientation or control."

Why has the United States come in for such tongue lashings?

Edward C. Luck, a professor of international affairs at Columbia who has followed the United Nations for more than three decades, said the General Assembly was a particularly alluring place for demagogues.

"If you want your 15 minutes of fame, what better place to get it than the rostrum of the General Assembly?" he said. "I think very often they are playing for the domestic audience and trying to build up their persona as a tough guy not afraid to take on the Yankee superpower."

But what might work at home doesn't necessarily play well on the world stage. "I think in the end they all come off as rejectionists," he said. "They're good at saying what they don't like, but they don't have any positive thoughts."

In that sense, the Chávez rant with its claim that "the U.S. is the greatest threat looking over the planet" harks back to speeches by Fidel Castro and Nikita Khrushchev during the chilliest days of the cold war. That's when the true art of America-bashing reached its pinnacle, even as it tended to follow a boilerplate script of "isms" — colonialism, imperialism, racism.

Che Guevara told the General Assembly in 1964 that "the United States is not the champion of freedom, but rather the perpetuator of exploitation and oppression against the peoples of the world and against a large part of its own population."

Castro, in 1960 managed to insult two future American presidents at the same time. He described John F. Kennedy as "a millionaire, illiterate and ignorant" and warned delegates against construing the comment as favoring Richard M. Nixon. "As far as we're concerned," he said, "the two of them lack, should I say, political brains."

While these rhetorical taunts don't necessarily influence the real course of world affairs, the threat of mobilized public opinion on a global scale against American policy can't be ignored and has at time spurred pointed responses.

In 1975, after a particularly harsh run-in with African countries, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, then the American UN ambassador, said: "For too long, we have been given private assurances that public obscenities were not meant. That currency is no longer acceptable."

DOJ_NMG_0068545

President Ronald Reagan took the strongest stance against the Washington-baiting when he appointed Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, an outspoken conservative, as ambassador to the United Nations. She said that countries attacking the United States covered up their own misdeeds by using the “Big Lie” — accusing the United States of committing crimes that they in fact had perpetrated.

Finally, in 1987, when Daniel Ortega, the Marxist leader of Nicaragua, compared Reagan to Rambo, Vernon Walters, the American envoy, called the speech “typical revolutionary babble.” And he and the rest of the American delegation walked out.

But perhaps the most effective retort was the less demonstrative one delivered by the British. In 1960 Nikita S. Khrushchev, the Soviet premier, had interrupted a General Assembly address by the prime minister, Harold Macmillan, by waving his arms in the air and shouting in Russian. In response, Mr. Macmillan stopped speaking and imperturbably sipped a glass of water. He murmured over his shoulder to Frederick H. Boland of Ireland, the assembly president, that if Mr. Khrushchev wished to continue, he would insist on a translation.

The Soviet leader went silent.

Hurricane ChÃ¡vez (WP)

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

What's worse for energy security: a natural disaster or a petro-bully?

HUGO CHAVEZ got the attention that he craves by comparing President Bush to Satan last week. But the Venezuelan leader's absurd talk may be less threatening than his equally absurd incompetence. Since Mr. ChÃ¡vez took power seven years ago, Venezuela has mismanaged its oil so disastrously that production may have fallen by almost half, according to the estimates of outsiders, reducing global oil supply by a bit more than 1 percent. Along with natural disasters and Nigerian rebels, Mr. ChÃ¡vez's ineptitude has contributed to high energy prices.

It takes sustained determination to reduce output by that much, and Mr. ChÃ¡vez has provided it. He inherited a competent national oil company that produced three times more per worker than its Mexican counterpart. He immediately starved it of investment capital and dispatched ignorant political cronies to oversee it. When this abuse provoked a strike, Mr. ChÃ¡vez fired the staff en masse, getting rid of two-thirds of the skilled employees and managers.

Mr. ChÃ¡vez imagines that he can damage the United States by rerouting Venezuelan oil to other markets. He fails to understand that oil is fungible: If Venezuela's crude is sold to the Chinese, the Chinese will buy less of it elsewhere, freeing up supplies for U.S. consumers. But Mr. ChÃ¡vez also appears oblivious to the technical difficulties in sending oil halfway round the world rather than selling it in his own hemisphere. Oil tankers do not come cheap, and China will have to build special refineries to process the heavy brand of crude that Venezuela produces. Despite Mr. ChÃ¡vez's bluster about tripling exports to China in three years, Venezuela will depend on Yanqui consumers for the foreseeable future.

To the extent that Mr. ChÃ¡vez's wild talk stirs up anti-American feeling, he must be regarded as an irritant. If he secures a temporary seat on the U.N. Security Council, as he hopes to do next month, he will doubtless render U.N. diplomacy even more challenging than it is already. Yet it is not the United States but rather Mr. ChÃ¡vez's own countrymen who should most fear his intentions. Venezuela's courts, media organizations and civil society groups have been bullied into submission, and Mr. ChÃ¡vez is talking about a constitutional change that would allow him to remain in power indefinitely. "The people should not be stripped of their right if they wish to reelect a compatriot whoever it may be three, four, five, six times," he said recently.

Thai Coup Highlights Struggles Over Democracy (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

BANGKOK -- Inside the teeming Khlong Toei slum in the shadow of this city's modern skyscrapers, 60-year-old street vendor Chalaem Tiensiri is still proudly displaying campaign stickers from deposed prime minister Thaksin Shinawatra's party on the walls of her shack. Asked about the bloodless military coup last week that abruptly ousted Thaksin from power, she looked down at her empty hands and quietly cried.

Echoing the feelings of many on the warren-like streets of Khlong Toei, Chalaem said the poor in Thailand were largely ignored before Thaksin was elected in a landslide in 2001. A billionaire tycoon who became the hero of the underclass, Thaksin ushered in universal health care that allowed Chalaem's cancer-stricken daughter to receive chemotherapy for less than $1 per treatment. His war on drugs, she said, drove the methamphetamine dealers from the neighborhood's tough streets. Local leaders from Thaksin's party provided free milk for her young grandson and brought the struggling widow gifts of rice several times a year.

DOJ_NMG_0068546

"I don't care what they say about Thaksin, he was the first one who ever cared about us," she said, kneeling next to her ill daughter who rested languidly on a cot. "He gave me a chance to keep my daughter alive. He gave us food when we were in need. Now that he's been chased out, the poor have lost their closest friend."

Chalaem's lingering respect for Thaksin -- still widely shared among the urban poor and rural farmers across the country's north and northeast -- underscores the core problems confronting Thailand and a host of other emerging nations as they try, and sometimes fail, to cultivate healthy democracies.

Thaksin followed the path of other democratically elected leaders, like Venezuela's Hugo ChÃ¡vez, who are accused of using their posts to enhance their power at the expense of democratic institutions. Thaksin, following that pattern, gained popular support by pushing through policies aimed at easing the plight of the poor while using handouts of food and even cash to ensure votes at election time.

Experts say such populist-driven politics has exacerbated class divisions and created a significant hurdle to maintaining the rule of law for some developing countries. Well-educated middle- or upper-class Thais have generally embraced the coup as a regrettable but necessary step toward ending Thaksin's grip on power and ushering in a new constitution. The provisional military government, headed by the soft-spoken Royal Thai Army chief, Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratkalin, has promised to name a civilian as caretaker prime minister in the coming days and hold elections within one year.

Foreign advocates for democracy and some domestic observers in Thailand have seen a clear conflict in such support for the coup. While the ousted prime minister infuriated his opponents by clinging to power, he simultaneously enjoyed unparalleled popularity among the nation's largest block of voters -- the poor. Some anti-Thaksin forces have even indirectly blamed the unquestioning support by poor Thais of the ousted prime minister for Thailand's current crisis.

"We understand that to some extent we have failed to address the problems of the poor, and we need to do a better job," said Surin Pitsuwan, a former foreign minister and leading member of the opposition Democrat Party. "The problem is that in Thailand, Thaksin created a class of people dependent on state handouts. We need to teach these people that there are no such things as free gifts in a real democracy and that it does them more harm than good to live off the largess of corrupt leaders."

Democracy advocates abroad, meanwhile, are viewing the case of Thailand -- an important regional ally of the United States and one of Southeast Asia's largest economies -- as particularly demoralizing.

In the 15 years since the last military takeover here, Thailand had emerged as the region's model for democratic reform. Already, the jailed leaders of a February coup attempt against Philippine President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo have made comments to the foreign press hailing the successful military men of Bangkok as exemplary patriots.

Analysts fear the Thai coup will also embolden existing military juntas, such as the one in neighboring Burma, to resist mounting international pressure to enact democratic reforms.

"The comeback from other nations in the region when they are told to make democratic reforms will be, 'Hey, look at Thailand. They couldn't make it work and the military had to take charge again,' " said Panitan Wattanayagorn, a political analyst at Bangkok's Chulalongkorn University. "Their argument will be that the people are just not eager for democracy and that the military men still know best."

The coup has brought swift international condemnation. The Bush administration is now in the process of reviewing military and other aid to Thailand and has said a pending free trade agreement with Bangkok cannot go forward without a restoration of democracy.

Thaksin, who was in New York preparing to address the United Nations at the time of the coup, is now in London, where he told reporters he was taking a "holiday" for the time being. In a statement, Thaksin appeared resigned to his ouster, saying he would remain in Europe for the time being to promote Thai unity.

But foreign investors remained jittery, with the Thai currency, the baht, and the stock market going on wild rides as rumors of a counter-move by officers still loyal to Thaksin have raged through Bangkok. So far, there have been no serious indications of violent resistance to the provisional military authority.

Anti-Thaksin forces here insist the coup is being misrepresented outside Thailand. They describe it as the result of Thaksin's attempt to usurp the constitution and set himself up as a "democratic dictator" in a nation where King Bhumibol Adulyadej remains the beloved head of state. Public protests against Thaksin, they said, had grown in the aftermath of a corruption scandal in which his family sold its controlling stake in a major telecommunications company to a Singapore state investment firm for $1.9 billion without paying a cent of taxes. But those protest rallies were confined to Bangkok.

Still, the spark that finally ignited the coup appeared to be Thaksin's recent interference in the military promotion system to elevate his allies to top positions.

In a signal that the royal household had effectively endorsed the coup, the king officially named Sonthi the head of an interim council.

DOJ_NMG_0068547

On Friday, Sonthi again promised to swiftly name a civilian caretaker, with foreign observers calling for the appointment of a well-known and respected figure to prevent the impression of a puppet government. Attention has focused on former World Trade Organization chief Supachai Panitchpakdi and Thailand's central bank head, Pridiyathorn Devakula. But on Friday, speculation also turned to a less renowned figure, Ackaratorn Chularat, president of Thailand's Supreme Administrative Court.

Analysts note that Thaksin's adversaries had yet to exhaust all legal means of opposing him, and they said the checks and balances of Thailand's constitutional monarchy had recently begun to function.

With a nod from the king, Thaksin loyalists on an election commission were purged by the still largely independent Supreme Court -- opening the way for a more level playing field in elections that were set to be held in the coming months. Thaksin's critics say his party was already gearing up for a cash-for-votes campaign that would have kept him in power.

Instead, with the military now in charge, Thailand has reverted to martial law. At least four of Thaksin's top aides have been detained by military authorities, who have also outlawed political meetings of five or more people. TV and radio stations have been warned to prevent criticism of the new military government, with armed soldiers stationed inside or near major domestic networks as a reminder. The military authority on Friday also named an official body to probe allegations of corruption under Thaksin.

Resistance to military control has already begun to fester. A group of about 100 university students staged an ingenious protest on Friday near an upscale shopping mall. To avoid violating the new military rules against political gatherings, they clustered themselves in groups of twos or threes across a broad public area.

"This coup is not what we wanted," said a 19-year-old university protester who declined to give his name, but held a sign saying: "No to Thaksin, No to the Coup."

"Thailand needs real democracy," he said, "and we don't feel this was the right way to achieve it."

Coup May Allow Thais To Take New Tack On Insurgency (NYT)

By Seth Mydans, International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

By SETH MYDANS

BANGKOK, Sept. 23 — Jesse Lee Daniel had just called for mustard for his chicken burger when the first bomb went off with a thud strong enough to shake the Swan Bar, where he was sitting in the southern city of Hat Yai.

After the second bomb last Saturday evening, 100 yards away at the Odeon department store, he hurried out with other foreign teachers who had been eating at the bar to take a look.

He was standing in front of the New Cherry Ancient Massage parlor, in a crowd of onlookers and masseuses, when the third bomb exploded on a motorbike parked at the curb beside them.

Mr. Daniel, a Canadian, died instantly, apparently the first Western victim of the almost daily violence that has taken more than 1,700 lives since the start of 2004 in Thailand's largely Muslim south.

The attack that killed him and five others was part of a new escalation in a separatist insurgency that has been aggravated, according to experts, by the militarized, give-no-quarter approach of former Prime Minster Thaksin Shinawatra.

Mr. Thaksin's ouster in a coup this week offers the chance for a new approach, though not a quick end, to an insurgency that has become nastier and more entrenched and that experts say may be receiving guidance and training from foreign Islamic insurgents.

"We are seeing that the insurgency is escalating at a very significant pace and very likely we will soon see an attack in Bangkok," said Rohan Gunaratna, a Singapore-based expert on terrorism. "They have created a movement."

The general who led the coup, Sonthi Boonyaratglin, is a Muslim who had clashed with Mr. Thaksin over the government's southern policy. Days before the coup, General Sonthi proposed negotiations with the insurgents, only to be brushed off by Mr. Thaksin.

But starting negotiations will not be easy. The only separatist group to respond to his offer has little control over insurgent activity, and General Sonthi himself conceded that "right now, the military does not know who their real leader is."

Another limit to negotiations is the complicated nature of the violence, which appears to include not only the Muslim insurgency but also political and business rivalries, drug running, banditry and feuds involving the military and the police.

But experts expect General Sonthi at least to begin to carry out the recommendations of a National Reconciliation Committee, led by the former prime minister, Anand Panyarachun. It proposed in May the creation of a regional administrative body to mediate.

Although the committee was created by Mr. Thaksin, he ignored its recommendations and proceeded with a policy of confrontation.

DOJ_NMG_0068548

"If implemented, all those alone would go a long way to improving the trust of the local community," said Zachary Abuza, an expert on terrorism who is studying the violence in southern Thailand.

The recommendations amount to a turnaround in dismissive and discriminatory attitudes of the central government in this largely Buddhist nation toward the Muslims who make up 5 percent of the population of 64 million people.

They would start with the lifting of a martial law decree that the commission found had aroused fear and resentment in the three Muslim-dominated southern provinces — Yala, Narathiwat and Pattani.

They also urge greater attention to local conditions and culture, including public school education in the local Malay language, and an end to a culture of impunity that has allowed hundreds of killings and kidnappings by security forces.

In addition, Mr. Abuza said, Mr. Thaksin's ouster is likely to end a constant, destabilizing rotation of military commanders in the region.

But for now, the momentum seems to be with the insurgents, who carry out killings and kidnappings, the assassination of local government officials and teachers and the burning of schoolhouses, as well as attacks on the military and local volunteers.

The latest bombings have frightened residents of Bangkok as they have seen the violence spreading from the core of the Muslim south into the capital of a neighboring province, Songkhla. Muslims here make up a smaller proportion of the population and most of them speak Thai rather than Malay.

"People here are afraid," said Thaveesak Khaotemdee, 29, a truck driver who lives in Hat Yai. "Wherever we go, we hurry out and hurry back. Nobody goes out at night. Just dead silence. Even at a restaurant we look at each other's faces. We never thought it would happen here in Hat Yai."

A year ago a bomb was planted at the Hat Yai airport. But the latest bombings — six altogether, within minutes of one another — brought the violence into the heart of the city.

It seems clear that the attacks were aimed at foreigners in the entertainment district of Hat Yai, which depends on tourism for much of its income, said Chaiwat Satta-anan, a professor at Chulalongkorn University who was a member of the reconciliation commission.

"There is no record of foreigners or tourists as victims in the southern violence," he said. "So the meaning of this particular incident is that another taboo of violence in the south as been broken."

Previous escalations included the killings of Buddhist monks, attacks in Buddhist temples and the killing of a Muslim preacher, he said.

The attack in Hat Yai occurred three weeks after the bombings of 22 banks simultaneously nearby in Yala Province in which one person was killed and 29 wounded. Experts said these bombings showed the degree of coordination of a movement whose leadership, General Sonthi said, remained unknown.

The bombings in Hat Yai killed five people in front of the massage parlor, including three of the young women who were standing near Mr. Daniel and a man on a motorbike.

Officials said 14 foreigners were among the 72 people who were wounded that evening, including 6 Malaysians, 3 Singaporeans, 3 Britons, an Indian and an American.

The next morning, when Boonmi Ngoeichai, 27, returned to the Swan Bar, where she works as a waitress, she discovered that the manager had saved Mr. Daniel's chicken burger, still unsure why he had not returned to eat it.

When he learned that Mr. Daniel had been killed, the manager threw it away. But he immediately regretted what he had done, she said.

"Oh, I wish I hadn't done that," the manager said. "I wish I'd saved it, and I could have taken it out to feed his spirit."

Tanks Roll In Thailand (WP)

By Joshua Kurlantzick

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

W hen I arrived in Thailand in the summer of 2003, Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra seemed to be presiding over a bona fide success story. Thailand's economy, battered by the Asian financial crisis in the late 1990s, was roaring back to life, with foreign investors returning to the country, the stock market blossoming and consumer spending soaring. At the chic restaurants along Bangkok's Sukhumvit Road, upper-middle class Thais in slick suits tossed back plates of expensive tapas and bottles of wine. Boasting the region's fastest growth rates, Thaksin had proudly toured Southeast Asia, promoting his "Thaksinomics" brand of economic stimulus as an example for other countries.

Thailand's politics also seemed to be operating on cruise control. With nearly 15 years of civilian rule, the country had built a vibrant democracy, and in 1997 created a reform-minded constitution hailed as one of the most progressive in the region.

It didn't last. By earlier this year, thousands of Thais had gathered in the streets to call for Thaksin's head, Thailand's political system had broken down, a rumbling insurgency in the country's south had exploded into open warfare and the economy had begun to nosedive. The situation came to a head last week, with a decidedly retro action: a military coup, not seen in Thailand since the early 1990s. Indeed, the sight of armed troops in camouflage patrolling the streets of Bangkok seemed jarring -- a sight more appropriate for Mauritania or Burma than a city full of malls lined with Chanel and Louis Vuitton boutiques.

DOJ_NMG_0068549

But the decline of such a promising nation was not as rapid as it seems. Since he was first elected in 2001, Thaksin had slowly undermined Thailand's democratic institutions, and his economic policies, though initially successful, mortgaged Thailand's future. As a result, when Thaksin needed to rally support from the country's democrats last week, he found few still standing in his corner.

Entering politics as the head of one of Thailand's biggest telecommunications companies, Thaksin had promoted himself as a CEO-type leader, a man who made quick, firm decisions. This image of Thailand's richest man proved appealing, especially in a country accustomed to fragmented, slow-moving political coalitions, and along with massive, populist handouts of state money to rural areas, it helped him win large majorities in the 2001 and 2005 elections.

But Thaksin never seemed to understand that, unlike in a corporation, he could not simply order results in a democracy and stifle opposition. In the deep south, home to a Muslim minority with longstanding grievances against majority-Buddhist Thailand, Thaksin eliminated an institution designed to hear residents' complaints and then amassed near-total control over the situation.

In Bangkok, Thaksin's family company bought up Thailand's most independent television station, fired critical journalists and then used the government's Anti-Money Laundering Office to intimidate other reporters. The prime minister also cashiered civil servants who questioned his policies, including the governor of the Bank of Thailand and the reform-minded head of the armed forces. He helped install people close to him in key positions at the supposedly independent government watchdog agencies created by the 1997 constitution. He launched sedition charges against critics, and he openly undermined the authority of Thailand's judges.

The prime minister's economic policies, meanwhile, often seemed designed more to benefit his telecommunications empire. Though the Thaksinomics fiscal stimulus jump-started the economy, it left Thailand saddled with deep debts, and it failed to produce high-value industries that could compete with China and other Asian economies. In January, his family sold shares in its telecommunications company to a Singaporean firm, netting $1.9 billion without paying any taxes. A 2003 study by Vanderbilt University found that eight of the 10 largest conglomerates in Thailand had people in Thaksin's cabinet linked to their company.

As he amassed more power, Thaksin's attacks on his perceived enemies increased. He lashed out at the few independent media organizations still remaining. He refused to heed calls for reconciliation in southern Thailand, where anger had spiraled into widespread violence. Instead, he may have tacitly allowed death squads to rampage in the south, "disappearing" human rights advocates. More than 1,200 people have died in the region, at the hands of militants and the authorities, in the past two years alone.

But the government's crackdown there only made the problem worse. On most evenings, Thailand's deep south feels more like Iraq than a part of a modern democracy. At major intersections some troops manning heavy machine guns sit surrounded by sandbags, while others stop vehicles and search passengers. On back roads, insurgents gun down police and fire-bomb government buildings.

Eventually Thaksin went too far. Army officials and political elites chafed at his perceived corruption, and complained to me that the military was sacrificing soldiers in southern Thailand with no plan. Worse, when Thailand's revered monarch, King Bhumibol Adulyadej, obliquely criticized Thaksin in a speech last December, the prime minister did not listen.

Thaksin should have bowed before the king, honored like a god in Thailand for steering the country through decades of political crises. But he seemed not to heed the monarch, and though the poor still loved Thaksin, street protests erupted in February and March. These were not violent affairs. At one demonstration, thousands of urbane Bangkokians gathered on a central green to swap T-shirts mocking Thaksin, groove to anti-Thaksin funk music, chant slogans -- and snack on reams of Thai sweets.

Still, the street protests may have given the military the confidence to intervene, especially after Thaksin won another disputed election in April; the coup was led by Gen. Sonthi Boonyaratglin, army commander in chief and an ally of the royal palace. The coup-makers wore the monarchy's traditional colors, and the king later endorsed Sonthi's transitional government.

After the coup, the response from many of Thailand's leading liberals was decidedly lukewarm, though Thaksin had won three elections and international organizations such as Human Rights Watch condemned Sonthi's actions. Former prime minister Chuan Leekpai announced, "As politicians, we do not support any kind of coup but . . . Thaksin has caused the crisis."

Thailand now stands on a precipice. The military government has promised to appoint a civilian caretaker as prime minister and outline a path to elections next year, but it also has declared martial law and arrested activists who tried to protest the coup. By removing Thaksin, the military may have taken out a leader with anti-democratic tendencies, but it also shredded Thailand's

DOJ_NMG_0068550

1997 constitution, which was supposed to offer a bulwark against the army playing a role in politics. "Political troubles should be solved by politicians," Sonthi himself had said last year.

And if Thailand holds another election, Thaksin, who remains popular among the poor, could legitimately win again, setting the stage for the kind of ongoing political turmoil that has doomed Southeast Asian nations such as the Philippines. For a country full of promise, that would be the saddest fate of all.

jkurlantzick@ceip.org

Joshua Kurlantzick is a visiting scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and a special correspondent for the New Republic.

Putin Rejects Europe's Fears On Company (NYT)

By Ariane Bernard

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

COMPIÈGNE, France, Sept. 23 — President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia dismissed concerns over his country's growing interest in the European Aeronautic Defense and Space Company at a meeting here Saturday with his French and German counterparts.

"As far as the acquisition of a 5 percent stake is concerned, it is not at all evidence of aggressive behavior on the part of the Russian side," Mr. Putin told reporters after discussions with President Jacques Chirac of France and Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany at Compiègne, north of Paris, that ranged from Russia's handling of its energy resources to such diplomatic issues as Lebanon and Iran. "We will not use this stake to change in any way the institutional situation of EADS."

This month, a Russian state-controlled bank bought a 5.02 percent stake in EADS, the parent company of Airbus, and Russian officials indicated then that the government hoped to increase its stake. But EADS and Thierry Breton, the French finance minister, subsequently rebuffed speculation that Russia might gain a position on the board of the European consortium.

Mr. Putin also said that Russia was ready to send "a small deployment of Russian military engineers" to Lebanon, as part of a bilateral agreement outside the United Nations-backed force. Mr. Putin said Russia wanted to be sure its contribution was welcome by all Lebanese parties before proceeding.

The three leaders said they had discussed energy, and Mr. Putin tried to reassure Western countries that Russia was a reliable partner that appreciated the mutual dependence of producers and consumers.

President Putin also announced he signed on Friday two memorandums of understanding for potential contracts representing more than $10 billion in transactions. One, between the Russian transportation ministry and the French construction giant Vinci, concerns plans for a highway between Moscow and St. Petersburg. The other, between the Russian and French Transportation Ministries, provides for possible cooperation on transportation and infrastructure in Russia.

Rebels Ready To Defend Breakaway Enclave (WT)

By Michael Mainville, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, September 24, 2006

SUKHUMI, Georgia -- Under mounting pressure from Tbilisi, separatist leaders in Georgia's breakaway region of Abkhazia are warning that their armed forces, backed by Russia, are prepared to defend their territory.

"We are ready to fight them, even if they have the support of the Americans," Abkhazia's de facto president, Sergei Bagapsh, said in an interview in the capital, Sukhumi. "We have enough weapons, enough soldiers and enough friends to defend our nation."

Abkhazia, a sliver of land nestled between the Black Sea and the Caucasus Mountains, broke away from Georgia amid fierce fighting in 1992 and now has de facto independence.

Since coming to power after the 2003 "Rose Revolution," Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili has stepped up efforts to reassert control over Abkhazia and Georgia's other separatist enclave, South Ossetia.

Mr. Bagapsh spoke with The Washington Times before the U.N. General Assembly, where Mr. Saakashvili accused Russia of waging a "gangster occupation" with its peacekeeping troops.

Tensions have soared in the region in recent months and particularly since Georgian forces in late July seized the contentious Kodori Gorge, the only part of Abkhazia not under separatist control, from a local warlord.

Georgia is establishing a local government in the gorge made up of members of the Abkhazian "government-in-exile," which supports reunification.

Mr. Saakashvili has promised only "peaceful means" will be used to restore Abkhazia to Georgian control, but Abkhazians fear otherwise.

DOJ_NMG_0068551

"We fear that the operation in Kodori was only designed to establish a bridgehead for a wider invasion," said Sergei Shamba, Abkhazia's de facto foreign minister.

Renewed conflict in the region would stoke tensions between Washington, which has backed Mr. Saakashvili's drive to restore Georgia's territorial integrity, and Russia, which funds the separatist government and has provided passports to more than 90 percent of Abkhazians.

The United States has deployed a small contingent of troops in Georgia to provide military training, and Russia has hundreds of soldiers in Abkhazia as peacekeepers.

Analysts expect tensions could reach critical levels later this year if U.N.-led negotiations on the status of Kosovo result in some form of independence for the Serbian province.

The United States and some other Western governments support autonomy for Kosovo, which has been a U.N. protectorate since mid-1999.

"If the international community recognizes Kosovo, it must do the same for Abkhazia," Mr. Shamba said. "There are stronger grounds for granting us independence. We fought for our statehood, have survived through sanctions and created democratic state institutions."

A sun-drenched paradise of palm trees, mandarin groves and sweeping beaches, Abkhazia once drew thousands ofvacationers from across the Soviet Union, but today is largely in ruins.

Along the waterfront in Sukhumi, its once-exclusive hotels lie derelict as the occasional Russian tourists who still venture here sunbathe beside the rusted hulk of a marooned ferry. In the countryside, whole villages have been abandoned.

"In a way, our problem is that we live in such a beautiful place," Mr. Bagapsh said. "That is why there are those who want to take it away from us."

Exit Koizumi, Japan's Relentless Jedi Knight (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

TOKYO

In Japan, the wa surrounds you. You can feel it in the priciest sushi bars and lowliest noodle parlors. Call it the particular Japanese way of looking at the world; of harmony, of collectiveness with a do-not-rock-the-boat spirit. In the mythology of "Star Wars" movies, the wa is like the Force. To mess with the wa is a cardinal sin.

Junichiro Koizumi messed with the wa .

But perhaps the most surprising thing about the man who will exit the political stage next week as Japan's most important postwar prime minister is that when he messed with the wa , most Japanese discovered a shocking truth: Maybe the wa needed to be messed with.

In his 5 1/2 years in office, Japan's modern samurai took his light saber to practically every national taboo. He cut through the country's notorious bureaucratic fat, forcing passage of legislation to reduce government payrolls and curb the wasteful spending that had left post-bubble Japan saddled with bridges to nowhere and highways dead-ending in unpopulated grasslands. Where his predecessors had used pork-barrel spending in vain attempts to drag the nation out of its decade-long recession, Koizumi instead turned to market forces -- delivering what is now on track to become Japan's longest period of economic growth since the end of World War II.

When China's looming emergence as a superpower began to cast a long shadow over Japan -- a country many Asia experts dismissed a few years ago as rising only in its irrelevance -- Koizumi charted a new course for a bolder nation. He dispatched non-combat troops to Iraq in Japan's largest military-related operation in six decades, launched Tokyo's first independent spy satellites and fortified the U.S.-Japan alliance to counter Beijing's spreading influence.

He did so with a flair that the Japanese had never before seen in a politician. Yukio Okamoto, Koizumi's former senior adviser on the Middle East, recalled the prime minister's 2003 address to the nation announcing what was then an unpopular decision to dispatch Japan's Self Defense Forces to Iraq. Foreign Ministry bureaucrats had prepared a defensive, almost apologetic speech for Koizumi. But the prime minister tossed it aside and went on live with an impromptu, highly personal discourse of his own.

"Those of us standing around Mr. Koizumi just smiled; it wasn't his words as much as his self-assured body language that convinced the Japanese public," Okamoto told me. "In that sense, Koizumi was able to do more than past prime ministers who just followed public opinion. He influenced it. In other words, he was a leader."

In a country long governed by consensus politics and glacial change, Koizumi's most significant achievement was smashing the body politic itself. He took aim at his own ruling Liberal Democratic Party -- a misnomer for a group of conservative dinosaurs who have ruled Japan for most of the past six decades through backroom agreements and a yakuza-like devotion to a few party bosses. Though Koizumi, 64, sometimes looked like a goof on the world stage -- especially while serenading President Bush with Elvis songs and traipsing around Graceland like a wide-eyed groupie -- he was a ruthless political strategist at home. He slew the reform-resistant LDP bosses like so many Darth Vaders by unceremoniously ejecting them from the party. In the process, he cleared a path for change.

DOJ_NMG_0068552

"Koizumi was almost cruel in his political style," said Ichita Yamamoto, part of a new generation of younger LDP legislators. "But that's what we needed -- an unyielding leader beholden to no one."

But mixed in with the new sense of optimism Koizumi brought to the country was a precarious reinvention of Japanese nationalism. He flirted with the Dark Side of the wa , creating a new Japan unfettered by war guilt. His administration backed the new history textbooks' whitewashing of imperial atrocities, and repeatedly did not condemn political statements casting past aggressions in the light of national self-preservation. Koizumi's annual visits to Tokyo's Yasukuni Shrine honoring military dead -- including World War II criminals -- sparked outcries in the countries that suffered most from Japan's wartime actions. The repeat visits created a schism in Tokyo's diplomatic ties with Beijing and Seoul that has left Japan largely friendless in its own neighborhood.

For years, the Chinese, North Koreans and, more recently, South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun, have unabashedly used anti-Japanese rhetoric for political gain, to stoke their own flames of domestic nationalism and to distract from their own failings. But Koizumi's actions gave Japan's critics a credibility they had long lacked.

He tried to cloak his worship of military spirits, including Gen. Hideki Tojo, as a mystical rite of Shinto -- the main Japanese religion -- that foreigners could never hope to understand. He sought to separate his visits to the shrine from Yasukuni's shocking war museum -- which still defines Pearl Harbor as an act of self defense and blames the 1937 Rape of Nanking on the "cowardice" of Chinese rulers who fled the city. Yet those arguments have seemed artificial, arrogant and even dangerous.

Koizumi's handpicked successor -- Shinzo Abe, who is set to take over the prime minister's post next week -- is viewed as even more hawkish. Abe has vowed to rewrite Japan's pacifist constitution, drafted by the conquering Americans after World War II, within five years. That Japan deserves global clout commensurate with its wealth and a military capable of deterring new threats such as a nuclear-armed North Korea is not in doubt. But to move toward that new future with stubborn indignation will doubtlessly create more problems than it solves for Japan.

"I see Koizumi's actions today, his disrespect for the countries in Asia touched by the war, and I wonder if he is the same man I once knew," said Takayoshi Miyagawa, the prime minister's political consultant during his first parliamentary campaigns in the 1970s. "Both Koizumi and Abe have appealed to the people through nationalism, and that is a tactic that I had hoped Japan had grown out of."

On the domestic front, the pivotal question for Japan is whether Koizumi's reforms will be continued by Abe, who holds a far deeper respect for the old guard and has hinted at a more traditional approach toward public spending that could easily undo Koizumi's work. More important, Abe lacks the charisma of Koizumi, whose celebrity style of politics somehow managed to blunt even his worse offenses. For Americans, Koizumi became the first Japanese leader they could pick out of a lineup. Abe, on the other hand, is likely to fade into the background of G-8 photo ops in the same way that staid, dark-suited Japanese prime ministers have for a generation.

If Koizumi's mark on politics is to fade quickly, it will be Japan's loss. A self-described "weirdo" in a world of well-scripted politicians, Koizumi remained popular at home precisely because he broke the rules. In a nation where a famous saying lectures "The nail that sticks out gets hammered," he defied public conventions from the beginning, eschewing the cookie-cutter image of past PMs by rising to power on the back of pop-star good looks, blunt talk and grass-roots support for bold reform. The biggest surprise for Japan was that Koizumi -- the scion of a political family whose father's deathbed wish to him was "Junichiro Koizumi, be victorious" -- did more than win elections. Though the scope of his reforms never quite reached his own grandiose vision, he delivered on far more of his promises than almost anyone -- except Koizumi himself -- had ever expected.

He began almost immediately, beginning a debate within a year to revamp Japan's overfed entity in charge of building highways and roads; a notorious fount of political graft and excessive spending that LDP bigwigs tried desperately to preserve. Koizumi's battle with his own party would dramatically escalate in the following years, coming to a head in the last 18 months of his premiership. The one constant was his uncanny popularity.

Many of Koizumi's peers saw in him a reckless disregard for consensus -- the coda by which virtually all Japanese prime ministers have survived in the decades after World War II. They cited his display of kamikaze politics last September after reform-resistant LDP legislators rebelled against his plan to privatize Japan's gargantuan postal service. Fulfilling his pledge either to change the LDP or destroy it, he shocked the party hierarchy by ejecting the stonewallers from the party, calling snap elections and offering his own head if the people's will did not vindicate his reform crusade at the ballot box.

As the sun was setting on the outskirts of Tokyo last September, Yuriko Saito, a 57-year-old white-gloved wife of an accountant, joined a throng of thousands who braved sheets of rain to watch a hoarse Koizumi take his argument directly to the people. Convinced voters such as Saito went on to deliver Koizumi one of the biggest landslide victories in democratic-era Japan.

DOJ_NMG_0068553

Why? Because Koizumi fought with the wa -- and the wa lost.

"Koizumi is the only prime minister we have ever had who has actually done something," Saito said that day. "Frankly, he surprised me."

faiolaa@washpost.com

Anthony Faiola is the Northeast Asia bureau chief for The Washington Post.

New Clashes In An Old Border Feud (LAT)

By Shankhadeep Choudhury, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

Since India began fencing off parts of its ill-defined frontier with Bangladesh, skirmishes have killed scores of villagers, officials say.

HARINAGAR, India — The last time Lokesh Chandra Dey heard bullets whizzing past and mortar fire pounding his neighborhood was 35 years ago, when India and archrival Pakistan fought a war that witnessed the creation of Bangladesh.

But on Aug. 9, Dey's village in the Indian border state of Assam found itself caught in the crossfire again, under a deadly barrage from across the frontier.

"The mortar shells came flying through the ceiling," Dey said, pointing to the gaping hole in the tin roof of his house, now covered by a black tarp. "Seven people were holed up in that room…. Pieces of brick were strewn all around…. Everything was damaged."

The attack killed Dey's daughter-in-law and niece. Three family members were injured.

Skirmishes have erupted lately between India's Border Security Force and its counterpart across the divide, the Bangladesh Rifles. The two countries share a 2,500-mile border, parts of which are not properly demarcated or are marked by rivers that occasionally shift course, sparking territorial disputes.

Although relations generally have been stable in recent years, tensions along the border have increased since India began fencing off the boundary to keep out what it describes as illegal immigrants and "cross-border insurgents."

At the same time, some observers fear that political parties in Bangladesh may be fomenting border violence in hopes of capitalizing on anti-India sentiment in upcoming national elections, due by the end of January.

Each country accuses the other of provoking the skirmishes.

Shivajee Singh, inspector general of India's Border Security Force, said that from Jan. 1, 2005, through last month, more than 30 incidents of "unprovoked firing" by the Bangladesh Rifles led to seven deaths on the Indian side, five of them civilians.

New Delhi alleges that the confrontations are part of an attempt at "infiltration and encroachment" by Bangladesh. The government in Dhaka dismisses the charge, instead blaming "trigger-happy" Indian security forces for outbreaks of violence that it says killed more than 50 Bangladeshi civilians from November to May.

On the Indian side, the remote districts of Cachar and Karimganj in Assam, a poor state that shares a 170-mile land border and about 56 miles of river with Bangladesh, have been hit hard. Local officials say 60 villages and a population of more than 60,000 have been affected.

In the Aug. 9 skirmish, which continued into early the next morning, Indian officials allege that more than 70 Bangladeshi shells were fired at Indian posts, but many of them landed in Harinagar. They also say that the Bangladesh Rifles opened fire with machine guns. Bangladesh contends that its men returned fire only after Indian forces launched about 50 mortar shells at their side.

The shell that hit Dey's home filled the concrete-and-mud structure with smoke. Dey was not home. By the time he arrived, his daughter-in-law, Sabita, was dead. His 20-year-old niece, Shanta, died minutes later.

Harinagar, a village of about 1,000 people, is scarred by about two dozen craters, some in paddy fields, others in the courtyards of homes. Fear and panic have gripped many residents.

"Many people, especially womenfolk, have moved out of the village and are staying with relatives elsewhere," said Ranjana Dey, 23, who, like many villagers, has the same last name as Lokesh Chandra but is not related. "Inside most houses, trenches have been dug for shelter."

At least 1,500 people from Harinagar and three nearby hamlets have abandoned their homes for makeshift relief camps set up by the Assam government. More shooting broke out two days this month, but no casualties were reported.

"Why are they doing this?" asked Benimadhab Dey, a worker in a local cooperative. "Just to grab our land? I don't buy that…. There must be a deeper conspiracy."

DOJ_NMG_0068554

Indian border police say the skirmishes are partly attempts by local Bangladeshi officials to encroach on vacant land for growing crops and grazing cattle.

But beyond that, they allege that local Bangladeshi politicians are encouraging hostilities in a bid to increase support for the central government, led by the Bangladesh Nationalist Party. The ruling coalition in Dhaka is wary of New Delhi, which it suspects of covertly supporting opposition parties.

Indian border officials are worried that outbreaks of violence will persist until Bangladesh goes to the polls.

Singh, of the Indian border force, expressed hope that the tension could be eased through regular meetings with his Bangladeshi counterparts. Senior commanders from both forces met for four days last month in the Indian city of Shillong to discuss how to restore calm.

As they were meeting, however, a brief gun battle erupted near Harinagar.

In spite of the violence, many villagers say they have no plans of leaving their homes.

"We have inhabited this village for over 200 years now," Lokesh Chandra Dey said, "so there is no question of us vacating this place and moving elsewhere."

A Crisis Of Trust Takes A Toll On Chinese Society (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, September 24, 2006

Officials steal from the people, friends lie to friends and uncles bilk nephews in a land where many are forced to cheat to survive, analysts say.

BEIJING — Talk about swimming with sharks.

Zhang Xingshui, an attorney with the Beijing Kingdom law firm, knows that like people everywhere else in the world, the Chinese don't always trust lawyers, who often promise things they can't deliver. But in China, he says, lawyers don't trust their clients, who like to skip out without paying. And neither trusts judges, who routinely disregard the law in favor of politics when rendering decisions.

"Living in such a society is tiring for everyone," Zhang said. "You're forced to be vigilant so you don't fall into pits, which are everywhere. Everybody is a victim and at the same time an offender."

Even as China surges onto the world stage as if powered by rocket fuel, Earth's most populous country is beset by trust issues that would test anyone.

Rules aren't clear and must be navigated on the fly. The food supply is full of life- and health-threatening fakes. Factories spew chemicals into the air and water at alarming rates. Power and connections far outweigh justice, and social tension is growing.

Meanwhile, corrupt local officials pay lip service to Communist Party ideals as they line their pockets at the expense of the general population. Land that farmers have tilled for generations can be seized on a moment's notice in a system that doesn't recognize private property. Friends cheat friends and uncles bilk nephews for short-term gain.

Though the widespread insecurity is difficult to quantify, analysts say it is taking an economic and psychological toll, and making governing more difficult.

"China is in a very serious trust crisis," said Zheng Yefu, a sociologist at Peking University and author of the book "On Trust." "I'd say we're looking at a minimum of a generation, maybe 20 or 30 years, to recover, but it could take two or three times that long."

Experts cite several reasons for the dearth of trust. Some point to the 1966-76 Cultural Revolution and other wrenching political campaigns in the first decades of communist rule that ended centuries-old traditions and forced family members and friends to denounce one another, severing basic human bonds.

"Mutual trust among people because of various political movements has deteriorated to the lowest level that any society can possibly hit," said Hung Huang, chief executive of China Interactive Media Group and star of the recent film "Perpetual Motion," about a woman out to determine which of her friends is having an affair with her husband. "There's also a very different starting point: In America, you're innocent until proven guilty. In China, you're guilty until proven innocent."

Others cite the influence of a market economy on a society without a well-developed legal or regulatory system. Some say a lack of religion or meaningful belief system under communism leaves people morally adrift.

The government has tried to address the problem with a recent morality campaign — "Eight Virtues and Eight Shames," a list of do's and don'ts, including "Be honest and trusting" and "Avoid being immoral for personal profit" — but some question Beijing's commitment.

"Right now they're more concerned with building hardware, big buildings and dams than with morality and other software," said Zheng of Peking University. "And anyway, the government shares much of the blame for the present trust crisis."

DOJ_NMG_0068555

Zhou Xiaozheng, a sociologist at People's University in Beijing, agreed, citing the example of wildly inaccurate government statistics released for political purposes, a general lack of accountability and systemic corruption in the party ranks.

"If the beam above is crooked, the beam below won't be straight, either," Zhou said. "Officials cheat the common people and the common people cheat those above them. It's a vicious cycle."

Systemic problems and outdated or intentionally skewed laws and regulations encourage companies and individuals to cut corners.

For example, a driver who kills a pedestrian faces a maximum liability of about $4,100 in rural Shaanxi province but upward of $37,000 in Shanghai. But when pedestrians are merely injured, there's in effect no cap on liability.

This can create some twisted incentives. When driver Ma Yinghao hit a pedestrian in December, he deliberately backed over the injured person in an attempt to kill him, hoping to avoid high hospital and compensatory fees.

Rather than fixing a flawed system, the state often responds by trying to prevent similar abuses through intimidation, which the Intermediate People's Court in Shijiazhuang did by sentencing Ma to death.

The problems affect some of China's most visible professions, including medicine, the media, education, accounting and manufacturing.

The advertising industry, for instance, which is a font of fake claims, is regulated by the Advertising Industry Assn. and a unit of China's State Administration of Industry and Commerce. Both are government-run, have their own agendas and, insiders say, don't even make a pretense of keeping up with industry practices, a function of an unresponsive one-party state that doesn't face political opposition or citizens who vote.

A flawed structure all but forces advertising account representatives to take kickbacks, given wage levels that won't support them, said Zhang Li, general manager of Beijing's Mid-South SeaSky Advertising Co.

"Mistrust in China is less a problem of individual morality than the system," which often makes it difficult to do the right thing, Zhang said. "Even someone so moral they'd jump into the water to save a drowning person might still cheat to survive."

In other parts of the economy, a relentless drive to make easy money has led to a spate of pyramid and other get-rich-quick schemes, with government regulators often uninterested in preventing abuse unless it becomes a political problem that jeopardizes their own careers, analysts say.

Distrust can roil marriages as well. The rapid spread of affairs has shocked many in China, especially in light of the not-too-distant past when employers approved all marriages, divorces, births, travel and job changes, putting a chill on most infidelity.

Chinese society's obsession with marital distrust was epitomized in the 2004 hit "Cellphone," in which a husband spends much of the movie giving excuses over his phone to hide his affairs. His most famous excuse, "Wo zai kaihui," or "I'm in a meeting," became a running joke.

"If you look at the news, watch television, go on the Internet, all you see is a lack of trust," said Wang Huifen, 39, a government worker. "Even within marriage there's no trust."

Does she trust her husband? "I don't want to talk about it," she said. "That's personal."

Cheating on your spouse and cheating the public are closely related, according to the state-run New China News Agency, which reported last year that 95% of Chinese officials convicted of corruption had mistresses.

In the marketplace, unscrupulous hucksters take advantage of the most basic of human needs and insecurities — from food, housing and medical care to welfare and education for treasured only children — to cheat their customers.

In Daoxianghu, an area of lakes, fields and "pay as you catch" fishing operations on the outskirts of Beijing, Shi Yingzhao fingers his bean and cucumber plants. A year ago, fed up with city life and tired of worrying about the poisons and additives in his food supply, the book editor moved into a courtyard home where he grows his own organic vegetables.

"I try not to eat anything from the market," he said. "You just don't know what you're eating. I don't use any chemicals or synthetic fertilizers. Of course you can't ever be 100% sure, because the bigger environment is already polluted."

It's no wonder he's worried. Purveyors of fake baby formula continue to victimize the poorest and least educated people more than a year after a 2004 scandal left 12 infants dead and hundreds of children malnourished or brain-damaged after they were fed white powder with no nutritional value.

There are scandals involving carcinogenic noodles, poisoned melon seeds, waste-filled pancakes, substandard wine and water-injected pork, among others.

According to the New China News Agency, 500 people suffer from sickening or deadly food poisoning a day, and a study released in June by the Chinese Academy of Preventive Medical Sciences found that one-third of foods labeled "nutritious for children" were completely lacking in nutritional value.

Often at the root of the problem are retailers with an extremely short-term outlook, limited accountability and little downside if they fleece their customers. Steven Qiu, 23, said he recently called a computer company in Beijing to make sure it had a particular Sony model he wanted. When he arrived, the company had no Sony products, let alone the item he wanted.

DOJ_NMG_0068556

"They lied just to get me to come," he said. "I was furious — it cost me a lot of time and money. And in typical fashion, their attitude was terrible. They weren't in the least bit concerned who I complained to."

Shenanigans in the job market have given rise to a new profession: specialists hired to check the credentials of newly recruited staff. One government crackdown a few years ago revealed that 15,000 civil servant party members had used fake university degrees and other bogus certificates to get their jobs.

The very basis of trade, China's currency, is frequently counterfeited, and even the smallest retail outlets are equipped with special machines to check the authenticity of bills.

Yet Chinese have a high tolerance for uncertainty, some say, allowing them to cope with and even thrive under these conditions, as uncomfortable as they may be.

"After a while, it becomes quite normal," said Shi, the book editor. "While life for ordinary people is very hard, it also makes them strong and determined to survive."

mark.magnier@latimes.com

*

Yin Lijin in The Times' Beijing Bureau contributed to this report.

Top Democrat In Hong Kong Will Not Run (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

HONG KONG, Sept. 23 — The most popular and influential democracy advocate here, Anson Chan, announced Saturday that she would not run for chief executive this winter, clearing the way for the re-election of Beijing's favorite for the job and underlining the limits to popular representation nine years after Britain returned Hong Kong to China.

Mrs. Chan, who had been Hong Kong's chief secretary and second-highest official before and after the return to Chinese rule, criticized the restrictive rules that Beijing has chosen for the selection of chief executives in this semiautonomous territory. "The present rules of the game really discourage eligible people from running," she said.

Under the Basic Law, the constitution that Beijing drafted in the late 1980's and early 1990's with some consultation here, an election committee of 800 prominent citizens chooses the chief executive. Many of those prominent citizens have substantial investments on the mainland or other ties to Beijing, and stay in close touch with China's leaders.

Beijing officials have put considerable pressure on election committee members to support another term for Donald Tsang, who has run the territory since the resignation of Tung Chee-hwa as chief executive in March 2005. Tsang Yok-sing, the vice chairman of the Democratic Alliance for the Betterment and Progress of Hong Kong, a pro-Beijing party that has more seats in the legislature than any other political party, said he planned to support Donald Tsang, who is not related, "because Beijing supports him."

Mrs. Chan, 66, has scrupulously avoided visiting Taiwan and taken other steps since retiring from the government in 2001 in the hope of preserving some political credibility with Beijing. But she said Saturday that she had tried and failed to find even one of the city's many influential business leaders who might be willing to join a new, seven-member group that will study ways to promote democracy here.

Mrs. Chan's decision not to run leaves democracy advocates in disarray, with no clear candidate. Election rules here require a candidate to be nominated by at least 100 members of the election committee.

Argentine Land Fight Divides Environmentalists, Rights Advocates (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, September 24, 2006

CONCEPCIÃ"N, Argentina -- From a flat patch of tree-studded savannah, the gaze stretches for miles: across a small pond where a marsh deer stops to drink, and over swampy wetlands where herons gingerly high-step.

Above it all, a small airplane drones. At the controls is Douglas Tompkins, an American who owns everything underneath him, paid for from the millions he earned as the founder of the North Face and Esprit clothing lines.

"It's an amazing piece of land," Tompkins said shortly after landing. "Extremely rich with biological diversity."

Now, many Argentine officials and social activists want to confiscate the property he says he bought to create an ecological preserve. They think that he and other wealthy foreigners who have bought enormous swaths of the Argentine and Chilean countryside are trying to wrest control of a continent under the guise of environmental preservation.

"We believe this is a new way of trying to dominate the South American countries," said Araceli Mendez, a congresswoman who represents this region and sponsored legislation last month that would expropriate Tompkins's land. "It is dangerous for the defense of our national security to have the concentration of so much land in the hands of foreigners."

DOJ_NMG_0068557

Since the 1990s, the relatively cheap and expansive acreage of Argentina has attracted millionaires in search of unspoiled estates, including household names such as Ted Turner and Sylvester Stallone. But last month, Argentina's undersecretary for land and social habitat declared war on such land purchases with one highly symbolic act: He marched onto Tompkins's land, cut down a fence and called for the expropriation of the property.

Days later, he stood alongside the ambassadors of Venezuela and Bolivia -- two countries that recently have implemented measures to redistribute land from wealthy estate owners to the poor -- and made his intentions even clearer.

"We want to tell everyone: We're going to continue cutting down fences," said Luis D'Elia, the government secretary. "What is more important, the private property of a few, or the sovereignty of everyone?"

D'Elia, a former protest leader who recently joined President Nestor Kirchner's government, this month identified another target he plans to go after: Italy's Luciano Benetton, a clothing magnate who owns more Argentine land than any other single private landowner and who also espouses strict environmental stewardship.

Not only do these battles pit South American nationalism against foreign investors, they are drawing a bold line between two activist movements -- environmentalists and social justice advocates -- that are often grouped together under the same "progressive" label.

When Mendez presented to the National Congress the legislation to expropriate Tompkins's land, she was backed by some of the country's best-known human rights advocates, including the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo and other groups that famously fought against Argentina's dictatorship in the 1970s and 1980s.

The Catholic Church joined the chorus this month, issuing a 128-page document that warned against the "foreign-ization" of Argentine territory. Environmental groups, such as the Argentina Wildlife Foundation, have generally backed Tompkins.

"The social justice movements have been extremely poor at understanding ecological effects of their actions -- they're not green movements," said Tompkins, 67. "Concern about things like topsoil, which is the most valuable part of the land and often suffers under agrarian reform, is not being heard through the din of the need for the social redistribution of land. But that redistribution, for those who are not capable of handling it, will be a terrible blow to the future."

Since 1990, Tompkins and his wife -- Kristine McDivitt, the former chief executive of the Patagonia outdoor clothing company -- have bought about 4.7 million acres in Chile and Argentina. Their strategy is to identify properties in danger of ecologically damaging development, buy them, then create private parks that they eventually turn over to the local governments.

In Chile, they bought a large swath of land on the southern coast, creating a private park that they eventually turned over to the Chilean government to create the Parque Pumalin, which is roughly the size of Yosemite National Park. They did the same thing with the Monte Leon National Park on Argentina's side of Patagonia. Last year, they donated about 210,000 acres to Chile to form part of the Corcovado National Park.

Tompkins said he eventually hopes to do the same thing with his 741,000 acres in this species-rich wetland region. So when he hears D'Elia and others calling for his land, he sees an irony so thick that it appears nonsensical to him.

"They're shooting at the guy -- the only guy, practically, from the private sector -- who is buying land and then nationalizing it!" said a fired-up Tompkins, eating a bowl of granola for breakfast in the living room of the ranch house he keeps on the property.

Argentines, he said, don't understand his style of philanthropy. When he talks about eventually donating the land to the government, they suspect a catch. D'Elia has publicly hinted that he believes Tompkins is an agent of the U.S. government. That his property sits near the GuaranÃ- aquifer -- the third largest source of fresh water in the world -- has raised suspicions that he is trying to gain control of South America's water supply. Some say that a U.S. military base about 450 miles away in Paraguay is indirect evidence that Tompkins and the U.S. government might be working together.

The Benetton expropriation effort, meanwhile, centers on two families of Mapuche Indians who say that parts of his vast land holdings are ancestral property that belongs to them. Though Benetton offered to donate a portion of land to the Mapuche groups, the offer was rejected.

"The Benettons can't donate land that isn't theirs," Rosa Chiquichano, a representative of the Chubut province government, told ClarÃ-n newspaper.

A spokeswoman for the Benetton family, which owns 2.2 million acres in various provinces of Argentina, said a judge had previously ruled that the Mapuche groups have no legal rights to the land.

Such hectoring points to cultural differences that separate the American and European landowners from the residents who have lived in the region for centuries and want to hold on to traditional practices -- not legal rulings and fine print.

Tompkins traces the beginnings of the discontent to an American style of land management that is resented here -- specifically, his efforts to hold his neighboring landowners to environmental standards.

DOJ_NMG_0068558

He recently financed a legal case against a local forestry company trying to build a dike through wetlands. It was the kind of environmental complaint that is made every day in the United States, but not in a region of Argentina where private ranch owners -- or estancieros -- have held most of the political power for centuries.

"Suddenly they see someone come in and say, 'Hey, what about the rules?' " Tompkins said. "That sort of galvanized people into action against me."

Kirchner's position on the issue remains cloudy. Though Mendez is the local representative of Kirchner's wing of the Peronist party and D'Elia is a longtime ally, Kirchner and other high-level government officials have tried to distance themselves from the controversy.

They label it a local dispute requiring a local solution. Kirchner hasn't publicly supported D'Elia's actions, but he hasn't condemned them, either. Last week, Kirchner was in New York for the U.N. General Assembly, where he was trying to woo foreign investment; on Wednesday, he rang the opening bell at the New York Stock Exchange.

Tompkins, meanwhile, continued working on his property, overseeing projects such as the clearing of eucalyptus trees -- a non-native species that he is trying to replace with vegetation naturally found in the area.

"The Argentine government should look very carefully not at what passport someone carries," Tompkins said, "but at how they behave economically and ecologically."

Prudence's Struggle Ends (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, September 24, 2006

YOKADOUMA, Cameroon

As Prudence Lemokouno lay on a hospital bed here, spitting blood, her breath coming in terrible rattles, it was obvious that what was killing her wasn't so much complications in pregnancy as the casual disregard for women like her across much of the developing world.

Neither Western donor countries like the U.S. nor poor recipients like Cameroon care much about Africans who are poor, rural and female, and so half a million such women die each year around the world in pregnancy. It's not biology that kills them so much as neglect.

I began Prudence's story in my column last Sunday, and for a while I thought I would have a happy ending.

Prudence, 24, was from a small village and already had three small children. As she was in labor to deliver her fourth, an untrained midwife didn't realize she had a cervical blockage and sat on Prudence's stomach to force the baby out — but instead her uterus ruptured and the fetus died.

Prudence's family carried her to the hospital on a motorcycle, but once she was there the doctor, Pascal Pipi, demanded $100 for a Caesarian to remove the fetus. The fetus was decomposing inside her, and an infection was raging in her abdomen — but her family had total savings of only $20, so she lay down in the maternity ward and began to die.

I arrived the next day, interviewed Dr. Pipi about maternal mortality — and found Prudence fading away in the next room. Dr. Pipi said she needed a blood transfusion before the operation could begin, so a Times colleague, Naka Nathaniel, and I donated blood (yes, the needles were sterile) and cash.

The transfusion helped Prudence, and she grew strong enough to reach out her hand and respond to people around her. Dr. Pipi said the operation would begin promptly, and Prudence's family was ecstatic. But as we waited in the hospital lobby, Dr. Pipi sneaked out the back door of the hospital and went home for the night.

It wasn't just the doctor who failed Prudence, but the entire system. He did operate the next morning, but by then the infection had spread further — and the hospital had no powerful antibiotics. Prudence's breathing grew strained, as her stomach ballooned with the infection and the bag of urine from her catheter overflowed. The nurses couldn't be bothered with a poor villager like her.

That night she began vomiting and spitting blood. She slipped into a coma, and a towel beside her head grew soggy with blood and vomit. On Tuesday afternoon, she finally passed away.

Intellectually, I knew that women in Africa had a 1-in-20 lifetime risk of dying in childbirth. But it was wrenching to see this young mother of three fade and die so needlessly.

There's no doubt that if men were dying at this rate, poor and rich countries alike would make the issue a priority, but the problem seems invisible, like the victims.

The U.N. Population Fund has a maternal health program in some Cameroon hospitals that might have saved Prudence's life, but it doesn't operate in this region. And it's difficult to expand, because President Bush has cut U.S. funding for the population fund — even for African programs — because of false allegations that it supports abortions in China.

DOJ_NMG_0068559

That's shameful. Two women have tried to recoup American honor by starting a group, 34 Million Friends of U.N.F.P.A., to make up the shortfall with private donations.

(I discuss some of the groups active in this area at nytimes.com/ontheground, and I'll also have a link to video of Prudence.)

Neither left nor right has focused adequately on maternal health. And abortion politics have distracted all sides from what is really essential: a major aid campaign to improve midwifery, prenatal care and emergency obstetric services in poor countries. We know exactly how to save the lives of women like Prudence, partly because a few countries like Sri Lanka and Honduras have led the way in slashing maternal mortality.

Lynn Freedman, head of the Averting Maternal Death and Disability program at the Mailman School of Public Health at Columbia University (www.amdd.hs.columbia.edu), notes that we could provide all effective interventions for maternal and newborn health to 95 percent of the world's population for an additional $9 billion per year.

Sure, that's a lot. But think of Prudence and women like her dying in childbirth at a rate of one a minute — and after all, the world spends $40 billion a year on pet food.

DOJ_NMG_0068560

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, September 25, 2006 8:04 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Monday, September 25, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060925.pdf; dojclips060925.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

White House Takes Issue With Intelligence Assessment (LAT) 3
Negroponte Highlights U.S. Successes (WP) 4
Study Of Iraq War And Terror Stirs Strong Political Response (NYT) 4
Democrats Use Intelligence Report To Attack GOP On Iraq (USAT/AP) 5
Leaked Intelligence Report Rocks Bush Election Stance (AFP-Y) 6
Intelligence Findings Present Political Obstacle For Republicans (MCT) 7
White House Blamed On Terror Bill (RC) 8
Do Unto Your Enemy... (NYT) 9
Firing Potent Words, From A Tank (NYT) 10
McCain Names Practices Detainee Bill Would Bar (WP) 11
McConnell: Democrats AWOL In Terror War (WT) 13
Specter Decries Detainee Bill Provision (AP-Y) 14
Specter Criticizes Deal Reached On Detainee Treatment (WT) 14
Habeas Corpus Not Needed (USAT) 15
Scepticism Over Bin Laden 'death' (FT) 16
World Leaders Skeptical Of Bin Laden Death Report (USAT) 16
Karzai Says Bin Laden Not In Afghanistan (AP-Y) 17
Experts See Lower Threat From Al-Qaida (AP-Y) 18
Chris Wallace, Caught Off Balance? (WP) 19
Clinton Defends How He Handled Al-Qaeda Threat (USAT) 21
Clinton Defends Pre-9/11 Actions (WT) 22
Torture Victim Had No Terror Link, Canada Told U.S. (NYT) 23
CIA: Probe Into Renditions (NSWK) 25
Inquiry Slows Giving To Islamic Charity (AP-Y) 25

Homeland Response:

Chemical-Security Legislation Nears Approval (WSJ) 26
Chemical Plants, Still Unprotected (NYT) 27
TSA To Lower Registered Traveler Fee (USAT) 28
TSA Backtracks, Projects $30 Fee For Airport Pass (WSJ) 29
FBI Is Casting A Wider Net In Anthrax Attacks (WP) 29
A Year Later, Rita's Wrath Lingers (USAT) 31

War News:

For Bush, War Anguish Expressed Privately (WP) 32
Army Considers More Combat Units For Iraq (WT) 35
'Iraq Is Not In Chaos' (WP) 36
U.S. Soldiers See Inept Output By Iraqi Troops (WT/AP) 37
Dangerous Neighborhood (NSWK) 38
My Right Hand (TIME) 40
The Men Of Ward 57 (TIME) 45
Iraqi Parties Reach Deal Postponing Federalism (WP) 46
Iraqis Break 2-week Deadlock On Federalism (USAT/AP) 47
Iraqis To Debate Bill On Creating Autonomous States (NYT) 48
Iraq Puts Autonomy Issue On Hold, Heading Off Crisis (LAT) 49
As Iraqi Lights Flicker, 'Generator Man' Feels Heat (NYT) 51
Unit Makes Do As Army Strives To Plug Gaps (NYT) 52
British Soldiers Allegedly Traded Guns For Cocaine (WP) 54
Due Process, Bulldozed (NYT) 55
The Rise Of Jihadistan (NSWK) 56
NATO Details Airstrikes In Afghanistan (AP) 59
Losing Afghanistan (WSJ) 59
Two Deaths Were A 'Clue That Something's Wrong' (LAT) 60
Army Explores Issue Of Living Wills As More Return From War In Comas (USAT) 68
Families Bear Catastrophic War Wounds (USAT) 69
Backstory: Enlisting Churches To Help Soldiers (CSM) 71

DOJ:

Wainstein Confirmed For New DOJ Post (LAW) 73

Corporate Scandals:

HP Chief Tackles Boardroom Scandal Head-on (USAT) 73
Dunn's, H-P's Accounts Differ In Leak Probe (WSJ) 75
At Hewlett-Packard, A Chief Wounded By Divided Attention (NYT) 77

The Changing Rules Of Corporate Spy Games (CSM) 79
HP Moves Leave Legal Issues Open (LAW) 80
The HP Virus (LAT) 82
Regulators Scrutinize Amaranth (WSJ) 82
Telos In Turmoil Over Shares (WP) 83
Cook The Books, Get Life In Prison: Is Justice Served? (WP) 84

Criminal Law:

String Of Heists Raises Fears Bank Jobs Are On Rise (USAT) 86
Death Penalty Sought Against D.C. Man (WT) 87
1st MS-13 Trial To Reveal Hierarchy (WP) 88
Potential For Danger At MySpace.com (NSDY) 90
Regulating Love: Lawmakers Cracking Down On Web Dating Industry (LAW) 91
DA Sez Feds Won't Hand Over Data (NYDN) 92
In Tiny Courts Of New York, Abuses Of Law And Power (NYT) 92
Credit Firms Push To Thwart Fraud (WSJ) 100
93,754,333 Examples Of Data Nonchalance (NYT) 101
Perjury Trial Of Ex-SBC Worker Goes To Jury (LAT) 102

Civil Law:

US Judge To Rule On 'light' Cigarettes Action (FT) 103

Civil Rights:

Disputing Citizenship's Role For Hispanics In Government Service (WP) 104
Minority Program At WSSC In Limbo (WP) 105
No On Proposition 85 (LAT) 106

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Source Of Outbreak No Easily Solved Mystery (USAT) 107
Center Of E. Coli Outbreak Is Also Center Of Anxiety (NYT) . 108
System Set Up After '93 Outbreak Pointed To Spinach In E. Coli Cases (WSJ) 109
Voters Get A Say On Land Rights (USAT) 110
Seeking Expansion In Urban Areas, Wal-Mart Stores Gets Cold Shoulder (WSJ) 111
Wal-Mart Grows 'green' Strategies (USAT) 114
Texas-Size Hunger For Power Worries State's Grid Boss (WSJ) 117
2 Years Later, What Has Changed? (USAT) 118
The Roadless Rule Takes A New Turn (NYT) 120
Green Virgin (WSJ) 120

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Letter To Bush Culminates In Major Pontiac Drug Raid (FREEP) 121
Bush Letter Cited In Michigan Drug Sweep (WT/UPI) 122

Immigration:

Frist Expects Dems Will Fight Border Bill (USAT) 122
Border Bills Come Down To Last Minute (LAT) 123
Immigration Work Force Fights Corruption (WP/AP) 124

Congress-Administration:

House-Senate Disagreement Could Halt Defense Bill (WP) 127
Army's Top Officer Signals Pentagon Budget Revolt (LAT) .. 128
Congress Is Winding Down, But Much Is Left Undone (NYT) 130
Hopes Sag At Prospects For Lame Duck (RC) 132
Round 2 For Rumsfeld: In For The Long Haul (USAT) 133
McCain Wants Bolton Confirmed Quickly (AP-Y) 136
Millions Of Seniors Facing Medicare 'Doughnut Hole' (WP) 136
Medicare Refund Mixup Part Of Larger Tangle (NYT) 138
New Coalition Urges More Money For FDA (USAT) 140
Public Service Academy (WP) 140
Constitution 101 A Federal Mandate (WT) 141
Familiar Battles (USNEWS) 141
All Laptops Present And Accounted For? Um, We'll Get Back To You On That . . . (WP) 142
Inside The Beltway (WT) 143
Progress On Judicial Ethics (WP) 144
Routine Testing For The AIDS Virus (NYT) 145

Other News:

Construction Job Market's Still Robust (USAT) 145
This Winter, Cost Of Heating Homes Is Forecast To Drop (CSM) 146
Falwell Acknowledges Clinton Comment (AP-Y) 147
Christian Conservatives Look To Re-energize Base (NYT) .. 148
Free Trade At The Fore Of Races (LAT) 149
Don't Make Me Say I Told You So: It's A Bump, Not A Surge (RC) 150
Hawaii Senator Wins Tough Primary Battle (WP/AP) 152
A Senator Bets On Party's Clout In Pennsylvania (NYT) 152
Antiwar Democrat In Connecticut Adds Planks To Platform (NYT) 154
Allen Struggles To Alter Message (WT) 155
Everyone's Jewish (WP) 157
Why The Democratic Wave Could Be A Washout (TIME) 158
Washington Whispers (USNEWS) 158
In Rove's Footsteps (NSWK) 159
Liberal 527s Find Shortfall (RC) 160
Blasé Guardians At The Money Trough (NYT) 162
'Battleground' Gets Late Push (RC) 163

DOJ_NMG_0068563

In Kentucky's 4th, Democrats Are Banking On A Familiar Face (WP)....164
Tight Race In Georgia Highlights Dems' Battle (USAT)....165
Contender May Become First Muslim In US Congress (CSM)....167
Swift Boat Veterans 2.0 (TIME)....168
10 Questions For Elizabeth Edwards (TIME)....169
Anti-Immigration Movement Finds An Articulate Voice (WP) 170
Your Vote Counts (LAT)....172
Corporate America Takes On Spitzerism (WSJ)....173
Producer Accuses Clintons Of 'Looting' (WT)....174
New Premium When Employees Pay For Health Care, The Boss Pays Too (WSJ)....175
Widespread Outage Spurs Coup Rumors In Pakistan (WP) 178
Hamas Says It's Serious About Coalition (AP)....180
War Turns The Tide For Israeli Settlers (WP)....180
International Investors See More Opportunities Than Risk In Postwar Israel (WSJ)....182
U.N. Force Is Treading Lightly On Lebanese Soil (NYT)....184
Lebanese Christians Protest Hezbollah (AP)....186
Iran Unplugged (USNEWS)....187
Iranian Clerics' Angling Stirs Worry On Absolute Rule (NYT) 187
For Iran, A Policy Of Patience (WP)....189
North Korea To Challenge U.S. On Nuclear Fuel (NYT)....190
Nuclear Engagement (WSJ)....191
Affirmative Action In India Flips Caste Roles (WT)....193
Somalia's Islamists Seize Seaport (AP)....194
U.S. Envoy Says Sudan One Of His Toughest Tasks (USAT) 194
A NATO Solution For Sudan's Genocide (WSJ)....196
Official Claims Abuse At N.Y. Airport (WT/AP)....197
Crazy Like A Fox (TIME)....198
The Sound & The Fury (TIME)....199
Chávez's Inferno (WSJ)....201
As Brazil Prepares To Vote, Scandal's Taint Seems To Fade (NYT)....202
Zimbabwe's Leaders Want To Delay Presidential Vote Until 2010 (NYT)....204
Now What? (USAT)....204
Play By The Rules (WSJ)....206
Corruption? Ho-Hum (WSJ)....207
Japan's Future -- And Past (WP)....208
Europe V. Microsoft (WSJ)....208

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Takes Issue With Intelligence Assessment (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON --The White House on Sunday sharply disagreed with a new U.S. intelligence assessment that the war in Iraq is encouraging global terrorism, as Bush administration officials stressed that anti-American fervor in the Muslim world began long before the Sept. 11 attacks.

Peter Watkins, a White House spokesman, declined to talk specifically about the National Intelligence Estimate, a classified analysis that represents a consensus perspective of all 16 U.S. intelligence agencies.

The highly classified report, delivered to policymakers in April, is the first of its kind since the start of the Iraq war in March 2003. In it, the agencies concluded that the war has only worsened the U.S. effort to defeat global terrorism. They said that the war is spreading radicalism from Iraq throughout the Middle East and that the longer it continues, the more likely it is that it will provide fresh training grounds for future terrorist plots.

But the White House view, according to Watkins, is that much of the radical fundamentalists' deep anger at the U.S. and Israel goes back generations and cannot be linked to the U.S. invasion and occupation of Iraq.

"Their hatred for freedom and liberty did not develop overnight," Watkins said. "Those seeds were planted decades ago."

He said the administration has sought in Iraq to root out hotbeds of terrorism before they grow. "Instead of waiting while they plot and plan attacks to kill innocent Americans, the United States has taken the initiative to fight back," Watkins said.

President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney also have highlighted the war in Iraq as the main thrust in the fight against terrorism, contending that the world is safer overall without Saddam Hussein in power in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0068564

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee and a likely presidential candidate in 2008, agreed with the White House view that radicalism pre-dates the toppling of Saddam, and that fundamentalists are always looking for reasons to recruit new jihadists.

"If it wasn't Iraq, it'd be Afghanistan," he said on CBS's "Face the Nation." "If it wasn't Afghanistan, it would be others that they would use as a method of continuing their recruitment."

But McCain also cautioned that the longer the war continues, "the more likely they are to have more recruits."

He added, "It's obvious that the difficulties we've experienced in Iraq have certainly emboldened (terrorists). Lack of success always does that."

The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said he was "very concerned" by the reports on the NIE, which were published in the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times and The Washington Post.

"My feel is that the war in Iraq has intensified Islam fundamentalism and radicalism," he told CNN's "Late Edition."

On the other political side, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he agreed with the intelligence assessment that the war is breeding more terrorists.

"President Bush's repeated missteps in Iraq and his stubborn refusal to change course have made America less safe," Reid said in a statement issued by his office Sunday. "No election-year White House PR campaign can hide this truth.

"It is crystal clear," he added, "that America's security demands we change course in Iraq."

And Rep. Jane Harman, the top Democrat on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, said on "Late Edition" that "every intelligence analyst I speak to confirms" that Iraq has made matters worse.

The war in Iraq is "a failed policy," she said.

Negroponte Highlights U.S. Successes (WP)

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

The conclusion of U.S. intelligence analysts that the Iraq war has increased the threat from terrorism is only "a fraction of judgments" in a newly disclosed National Intelligence Estimate, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said yesterday.

The NIE, completed in April, reflects the consensus view of 16 government intelligence services, including the CIA. The Washington Post, New York Times and Los Angeles Times reported yesterday that the classified document concludes that the invasion and occupation of Iraq has fueled Islamic extremism and contributed to the spread of terrorist cells.

"What we have said, time and again, is that while there is much that remains to be done in the war on terror, we have achieved some notable successes against the global jihadist threat," Negroponte said in a statement. "The conclusions of the intelligence community are designed to be comprehensive, and viewing them through the narrow prism of a fraction of judgments distorts the broad framework they create."

Democrats yesterday seized on the intelligence community's assessment.

The document, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) said in a statement, "should be the final nail in the coffin for President Bush's phony argument about the Iraq war."

Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said on CNN's "Late Edition": "Even capturing the remaining top al-Qaeda leadership isn't going to prevent copycat cells, and it isn't going to change a failed policy in Iraq."

But leading Senate Republicans said that the intelligence finding shouldn't cause the United States to abandon military operations in Iraq.

"We need to prevail in Iraq and . . . if we fail, then our problems will be much more complicated," Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

Study Of Iraq War And Terror Stirs Strong Political Response (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068565

WASHINGTON, Sept. 24 — Democratic lawmakers, responding to an intelligence report that found that the Iraq war has invigorated Islamic radicalism and worsened the global terrorist threat, said the assessment by American spy agencies demonstrated that the Bush administration needed to devise a new strategy for its handling of the war.

Representative Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said that while she could not discuss details of the classified National Intelligence Estimate, "Every intelligence analyst I speak to confirms that" the Iraq war had contributed to the increased terrorist threat.

"Even capturing the remaining top Al Qaeda leadership isn't going to prevent copycat cells, and it isn't going to change a failed policy in Iraq," Ms. Harman said on CNN's "Late Edition." "This administration is trying to change the subject. I don't think voters are going to buy that."

In public comments on Sunday, Republican Congressional leaders did not dispute the accuracy of the reports about the intelligence estimate, although they continued to defend the American presence in Iraq.

"I think it's obvious that the difficulties we've experienced in Iraq have certainly emboldened" terrorist groups, Senator John McCain, an Arizona Republican, said on the CBS News program "Face the Nation."

"But I would also argue that these people didn't need any motivation to attack us on Sept. 11," he said.

The intelligence estimate, an assessment by America's 16 intelligence agencies, found that the war in Iraq, rather than stemming the growth of terrorism, had helped fuel its spread across the globe.

The estimate was completed in April, and is the first formal review of global terrorism by the United States since the Iraq war began. More than a dozen government officials and terrorism experts described the estimate to The New York Times, but spoke on condition of anonymity because its contents are classified.

Several of the lawmakers who appeared on Sunday talk shows said they had not seen the classified document, whose disclosure comes weeks before the Nov. 7 elections. Intelligence reports from American spy agencies are not circulated widely on Capitol Hill, and Congressional officials said neither the House nor the Senate intelligence committees had been formally briefed on the report.

In a statement released Sunday, the White House said the characterization of the report in The New York Times "is not representative of the complete document." The White House did not release any specifics about the report, citing the fact that it was classified.

John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, said in a statement on Sunday that conclusions about the Iraq war are only a part of the overall intelligence assessment, and that viewing the reports conclusions "through the narrow prism of a fraction of judgments distorts the broad framework they create."

"While there is much that remains to be done in the war on terror, we have achieved some notable successes against the global jihadist threat," he said.

The White House also issued three pages of excerpts from recent speeches by President Bush, including remarks about the continuing threats from terrorist groups inspired by Al Qaeda.

The House Democratic leader, Nancy Pelosi of California, said in a statement that news reports about the intelligence estimate were "further proof that the war in Iraq is making it harder for America to fight and win the war on terror."

Her Senate Democratic counterpart, Harry Reid of Nevada, said that "no election-year White House P.R. campaign can hide this truth — it is crystal clear that America's security demands we change course in Iraq."

Democrats Use Intelligence Report To Attack GOP On Iraq (USAT/AP)

By Nedra Pickler

USA Today, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats on Sunday seized on an intelligence assessment that said the Iraq war has increased the terrorist threat. They said it was further evidence that Americans should choose new leadership in the November elections.

The Democrats hoped the report would undermine the GOP's image as the party more capable of handing terrorism as the campaign enters its final six-week stretch.

DOJ_NMG_0068566

Their criticisms came in a collection of statements sent to reporters Sunday after the disclosure of a National Intelligence Estimate that concluded the war has helped create a new generation of Islamic radicalism and that the overall terrorist threat has grown since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The report was completed in April and represented a consensus view of the 16 disparate spy services inside government, according to an intelligence official. The official, confirming accounts first published in Sunday's New York Times and Washington Post, spoke on condition of anonymity on Sunday because the report is classified.

"Unfortunately this report is just confirmation that the Bush administration's stay-the-course approach to the Iraq war has not just made the war more difficult and more deadly for our troops but has also made the war on terror more dangerous for every American," said Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, head of the Democratic effort to take control of the House.

A White House spokesman, Blair Jones, said, "We don't comment on classified documents." But he said the published accounts' "characterization of the (National Intelligence Estimate) is not representative of the complete document."

The White House issued a written rebuttal that argued administration officials have been making some of the same arguments as in the intelligence estimate. A White House strategy booklet released this month described the terrorists as more dispersed and still a threat to the United States.

President Bush said on Sept. 5 that "terrorist danger remains" and the broader terrorist movement is becoming more self-directed. The president also has said the United States is safer since the Sept. 11 attacks and that fighting the terrorists in Iraq keeps them from attacking America. He has said leaving Iraq would make the world less safe.

Democrats said Bush had misled people about Iraq's contribution to the terrorist threat. California Rep. Jane Harman, the leading Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee and one of a few lawmakers to have read the report, said she agrees with the findings. "Even capturing the remaining top al-Qaeda leadership isn't going to prevent copycat cells, and it isn't going to change a failed policy in Iraq," she said.

In congressional races across the country, Democratic candidates used the report to attack their opponents and tie them to Bush's faltering strategy. In New York, for example, Democratic challenger Kirsten Gillibrand pointed to the report and said GOP Rep. John Sweeney "has supported President Bush 100% of the time on Iraq, refusing to ask tough questions or push for honest answers."

"Now is the time for a new direction, and real accountability and oversight," she said. Gillibrand called for U.S. forces to be moved out of Iraq within six months to a year.

Three leading Republicans — Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky — said it is vital that U.S. troops stay in Iraq. None of them had seen the classified report, but they were responding to media coverage of it.

Frist said Americans understand the nation must continue to fight terrorists in Iraq and elsewhere. "Either we are going to be fighting this battle, this war overseas, or it's going to be right here in this country," he said on ABC's This Week.

McCain told CBS' Face the Nation that if the United States failed, "then our problems will be much more complicated."

At least one Republican — Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — said he was very concerned about the intelligence report and agreed that the war had intensified Islamic fundamentalism. "I think there is a much more fundamental issue as to how we respond," he said on CNN's Late Edition. "And that is what we do with the Iraq war itself. That's the focal point for inspiring more radical Islam fundamentalism, and that's a problem that nobody seems to have an answer to."

Leaked Intelligence Report Rocks Bush Election Stance (AFP-Y)

By David Millikin

AFP, September 25, 2006

US spy agencies dropped a political bombshell six weeks before national elections, with the leak of a classified report concluding that the war in Iraq has spawned a new wave of Islamic radicalism and increased the global threat of terrorism.

The intelligence document rocked a central pillar of the Republican Party's campaign platform ahead of November elections: that the 2003 invasion of Iraq and the ouster of Saddam Hussein made America safer, not weaker.

DOJ_NMG_0068567

With opinion polls showing President George W. Bush's party possibly losing control of both houses of Congress in the the mid-term polls, in large part due to unhappiness over the war in Iraq, the report stating categorically the opposite will make for painful reading at the White House.

Bush has argued repeatedly in pre-election speeches that Iraq is the central front in the war on terrorism and that demands for a US troop withdrawal from the country by the opposition Democrats underscores why the center-left party should not be trusted with the nation's security.

"The security of the civilized world depends on victory in the war on terror, and that depends on victory in Iraq," Bush said in one speech on August 31.

Such assertions were looking decidedly shaky Sunday after The New York Times and The Washington Post released details of the classified National Intelligence Estimate, the most comprehensive assessment yet of the war, based on analyses of all 16 of America's intelligence agencies.

The report, Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States, says "the Iraq war has made the overall terrorism problem worse," an official familiar with the document told The Times.

The Washington Post said the report described the Iraq conflict as the primary recruiting vehicle for violent Islamic extremists.

While the US has seriously damaged Al-Qaeda and disrupted its ability to carry out major operations since the September 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington, it noted, radical Islamic networks have spread and decentralized.

Democratic leaders were quick to jump on the report's conclusions as clear evidence of the failure of Bush's policies.

"This intelligence document should put the final nail in the coffin for president Bush's phony argument about the Iraq war," Senator Edward Kennedy said in a statement Sunday.

"The fact that we need a new direction in Iraq to really win the war on terror and make Americans safer could not be clearer or more urgent -- yet this administration stubbornly clings to a failed 'stay-the-course' strategy," he said.

The White House, while reiterating its traditional stance of not commenting on classified reports, said The New York Times story "isn't representative of the complete document."

"We've always said that the terrorists are determined. Keeping the pressure on and staying on the offense is the best way to win the war on terror," a White House spokesman added.

But the leaked intelligence report is hardly good news for Bush and the Republicans, coming on top of a messy revolt by top Republican senators against a Bush plan for legitimizing how the US interrogates and prosecutes terrorist suspects.

The Senate rebels, who included possible candidates to succeed Bush in 2008, reached a compromise agreement with the White House late this week.

But the unseemly row already diverted attention from Republican efforts to present a unified front on the issue of national security during the final stretch of the election campaign.

Republican leaders tried to brush aside the intelligence document, which they said they had not yet seen.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist expressed confidence US voters would not be swayed by the intelligence report.

"I think the American people, when they read an article like that ... say, 'Listen, just keep me safe -- I just want to be safe in Nashville, Tennessee, I want to be safe in Memphis, New York City, Washington, DC,' that's what they want."

However, one moderate Republican, Arlen Specter, told CNN, "The war in Iraq has intensified Islam fundamentalism and radicalism."

"There is a much more fundamental issue as to how we respond. And that is, what we do with the Iraq war itself," he said.

"That's the focal point for inspiring more radical Islam fundamentalism, and that's a problem that nobody seems to have an answer to," Specter said.

Intelligence Findings Present Political Obstacle For Republicans (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068568

WASHINGTON - A newly disclosed intelligence assessment that contradicts President Bush's claim that the war in Iraq has made America safer also casts doubt on the Republican campaign strategy for the November elections.

Democrats seized on the intelligence findings Sunday to challenge Republican assertions that Bush and his congressional allies offer the best protection against terrorists. The assessment, the consensus opinion of the entire federal intelligence network, concluded that the Iraq war has fueled Islamic extremism and contributed to the spread of terror cells.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said in a prepared statement that the intelligence analysis "should be the final nail in the coffin for President Bush's phony argument about the Iraq war."

"Despite what President Bush says," Kennedy said, "the intelligence community has reported the plain truth - the misguided war in Iraq has metastasized and spread terrorism like cancer around the world."

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said the analysis is "further proof that the war in Iraq is making it harder for America to fight and win the war on terror." She said Bush "should read the intelligence carefully before giving another misleading speech about progress in the war on terrorism."

White House officials declined to discuss the classified intelligence findings, which were disclosed in Sunday editions of The New York Times and The Washington Post. The assessment came in a report known as a National Intelligence Estimate, which reflects the consensus view of 16 government intelligence services, including the CIA.

The newspapers did not offer direct quotations from the report, relying instead on characterizations of the document by unnamed government officials. White House spokesman Peter Watkins suggested that the newspaper accounts did not provide the full story, but he declined to elaborate because the report remains classified.

The classified report was completed in April, but disclosed just six weeks before congressional elections that are likely to hinge on national security issues.

Republican strategists are hoping that voter confidence in Bush's handling of terrorism will help their party retain control of Congress.

"The Bush administration lives or dies, in terms of national security, on the claim that they have indeed made America safer," said Dennis Goldford, a political science professor at Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa. "This is at the heart of the Republican rationale for continued control of government." He called the report "kryptonite for Superman," referring to the substance that disabled the comic book hero.

But Goldford said the political impact depends on "how skillful the Democrats are in exploiting" the newly disclosed intelligence findings.

"Never underestimate the Republicans' ability to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear, and never underestimate the Democrats' ability to make a sow's ear out of a silk purse," he said.

Polls indicate that Bush's handling of the war on terrorism remains a strong point for Republicans, despite widespread discontent with the war in Iraq. A recent Gallup Poll found that 57 percent of Americans think the war on terrorism is going well.

Bush has played up his strength with a series of recent speeches linking Iraq to the broader war on terrorism and defending his national security record. Watkins, the White House spokesman, echoed the president's previous remarks when asked Sunday to respond to the intelligence assessment.

"Terrorists are determined, and we're taking the fight to them," Watkins said. "We're keeping the pressure on and staying on the offensive, and that's the best way to win the war on terror."

But even some Republicans acknowledged that the intelligence report undermines Bush's claims that his decision to invade Iraq has made America safer. Appearing on CNN, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, agreed that the Iraq war has become "a focal point for inspiring more radical Islam fundamentalism."

The Gallup Poll was based on phone interviews with 1,003 adults on Sept 15-17. The range of accuracy is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

White House Blamed On Terror Bill (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068569

While much of the attention on last week's intraparty Republican dispute over the interrogation of terror suspects focused on a standoff between the White House and moderate Senate Republicans, Congressional Republicans and Democrats say the Bush administration's continued misreading of Capitol Hill had at least as much to do with the scuffle.

Although a full-scale political disaster was avoided late last week when moderates, led by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), agreed to a modified version of President Bush's tribunal system and rules governing interrogation techniques, the skirmish also resulted in the squandering of several legislative days, which makes it more difficult — if not impossible — for Congress to pass a number of big-ticket items, including a package of lobbying and ethics reforms that Members might have been able to tout when they hit the campaign trail back home.

In late July, sources said, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) pressed the White House to propose legislation before lawmakers left for the August recess, so that talks could begin during the break and allow the worst of the infighting to occur while the public wasn't focused on Congress.

Frist had hoped to engineer a floor schedule that allowed for passage of the terrorism tribunal bill as well as a handful of appropriations bills and any other measures he could squeeze in.

"Sending the bill up before the August recess would have likely locked in the three Senators who ultimately decided to head their own way," a senior GOP aide said. Those three were McCain, Armed Services Chairman John Warner (R-Va.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

The aide added that the bill Frist and Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) drafted "was based on representations from those three Members on some of the critical issues that got into play. Additionally, any fights kicked off during the sleepy days of summer would have been ignored by the general public and given us extra time to set the fight up, because the complaints would have come from Democrats and liberal interest groups —great opponents in a debate like this."

The White House rejected that timeline. A White House spokeswoman said the timing of the bill was strictly a matter of the issue's complexity.

"This is something that's never been done before," the spokeswoman said, adding that at the time of the August recess, the White House was still in the process of consulting with Members of Congress and other legal experts. "At the beginning of August the cake hadn't been fully baked," the spokeswoman said.

However, "people [on Capitol Hill] felt as though they were being gamed at the time, and in retrospect, some argue that the administration clearly stalled on the bill to help set up the play on moving the 14 terrorists and demanding a bill so they could go to trial," a GOP source close to the issue said.

Personality conflicts that have plagued Bush's relations with the Senate also played a role in delaying the talks, aides said.

During most of Bush's tenure as president, his relations with Congress, especially with the Senate, have been marked by what many Members and aides of both parties characterize as indifference on the part of the president to the role of Congress as an independent branch of government.

"Unfortunately, it seemed to get a little too personal at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue for a while, which also contributed to a real slow down and needless confrontation," one aide said, adding that "folks got a little too invested in specific legislative language, rather than keeping their eye on the big picture and looking at different ways to skin the cat to keep the program open and classified information protected."

Do Unto Your Enemy... (NYT)

By Paul Rieckhoff

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

IN 2002, I attended the Infantry Officer Basic Course at Fort Benning, Ga. At "the Schoolhouse," every new Army infantry officer spent six months studying the basics of his craft, including the rules of war.

I remember a seasoned senior officer explaining the importance of the Geneva Conventions. He said, "When an enemy fighter knows he'll be treated well by United States forces if he is captured, he is more likely to give up."

A year later on the streets of Baghdad, I saw countless insurgents surrender when faced with the prospect of a hot meal, a pack of cigarettes and air-conditioning. America's moral integrity was the single most important weapon my platoon had on the streets of Iraq. It saved innumerable lives, encouraged cooperation with our allies and deterred Iraqis from joining the growing insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0068570

But those days are over. America's moral standing has eroded, thanks to its flawed rationale for war and scandals like Abu Ghraib, Guantánamo and Haditha. The last thing we can afford now is to leave Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions open to reinterpretation, as President Bush proposed to do and can still do under the compromise bill that emerged last week.

Blurring the lines on the letter of Article 3 — it governs the treatment of prisoners of war, prohibiting "violence to life and person, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture" and "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment" — will only make our troops' tough fight even tougher. It will undermine the power of all the Geneva Conventions, immediately endanger American troops captured by the enemy and create a powerful recruiting tool for Al Qaeda.

But the fight over Article 3 concerns not only Al Qaeda and the war in Iraq. It also affects future wars, because when we lower the bar for the treatment of our prisoners, other countries feel justified in doing the same. Four years ago in Liberia, in an attempt to preserve his corrupt authority, President Charles Taylor adopted the Bush administration's phrase "unlawful combatants" to describe prisoners he wished to try outside of civilian courts. Today Mr. Taylor stands before The Hague accused of war crimes.

It is not hard to imagine that one of our Special Forces soldiers might one day be captured by Iranian forces while investigating a potential nuclear weapons program. What is to stop that soldier from being water-boarded, locked in a cold room for days without sleep as Iranian pop music blares all around him — and finally sentenced to die without a fair trial or the right to see the evidence against him?

If America continues to erode the meaning of the Geneva Conventions, we will cede the ground upon which to prosecute dictators and warlords. We will also become unable to protect our troops if they are perceived as being no more bound by the rule of law than dictators and warlords themselves.

The question facing America is not whether to continue fighting our enemies in Iraq and beyond but how to do it best. My soldiers and I learned the hard way that policy at the point of a gun cannot, by itself, create democracy. The success of America's fight against terrorism depends more on the strength of its moral integrity than on troop numbers in Iraq or the flexibility of interrogation options.

Several Republican combat veterans, including former Secretary of State Colin Powell and Senators Lindsay Graham, John McCain and John Warner, have recognized that the president's stance on Article 3 is a threat to our troops and to our interests. It would be insulting for the president to assume he knows more about war than they do.

But the compromise the president struck with the senators last week leaves the most significant questions unresolved. The veterans must hold their ground — and the White House must recognize that our troops need all the moral authority they can get.

Firing Potent Words, From A Tank (NYT)

By Arthur T. Hadley

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

I'M pleased that President Bush has said he will enforce the letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions. I hope he stays true to his word.

My great respect for the conventions developed not from afar, but from the ground, in the Second World War, at the dirty-boot level, where the bullet meets the soldier.

As a young Army lieutenant, I had the job of making clear to the enemy, via loud speaker or leaflet-filled artillery shells, that the accords would be honored. Over and over, from Normandy to the Elbe, in tanks and in foxholes, my sergeants and I would say in German, "You will be well handled according to the Geneva Conventions."

How did I find myself in this line of work? I started out with the Tank Destroyer Forces. But in one of Gen. George Marshall's few mistakes, the destroyers were disbanded. Noting that I spoke some German, the Army then placed me as a second lieutenant in a German-speaking unit. Some of us made broadcasts; others interviewed captured German soldiers to discover ways to damage their morale.

DOJ_NMG_0068571

This work was new to us and the Army, and we made up our rules as we went along. Through interviews with prisoners, we soon discovered that reminding Germans that they would be treated according to the Geneva Conventions was one of the most effective ways to persuade them to surrender.

Our broadcasts, then, took on the following structure: first, we'd outline what we knew about the German position; second, we'd describe the weight of artillery and air power that was about to fall on them; finally, we'd end with assurances that those troops who surrendered would be well treated under the Geneva Conventions.

Loudspeaker missions were not popular, as the Germans most often tried to shut them up with heavy fire. Initially, we'd place our speakers near the front lines and then run cables to the relative safety of the foxhole from which we'd broadcast.

Having trained as a "tanker," I hoped to get loudspeakers off the ground and mounted on tanks, where they would be mobile and infinitely more effective during an attack. It was a wish that would not be fulfilled overnight: I was a young lieutenant in the position of having to persuade a tank general to give up a fighting vehicle for a loudspeaker.

Eventually, and somewhat to my surprise, I succeeded. After the Battle of the Bulge, I received the O.K. to mount a loudspeaker on a light tank of the Second Armored Division. At the same time an O.S.S. agent placed a loudspeaker on a Third Armored Division tank. He unfortunately was soon killed. This left my "talking tank," as the Second Armored Division tank became known, as a pioneer.

At last, we could broadcast our message during an attack. This was an advantage because the enemy was more likely to surrender during an attack than after the battle had quieted down.

The jury-rigged tank also worked remarkably well. The loudspeaker itself was mounted on the forward slope of the turret and partly covered by a metal casing that resisted light machine-gun fire. The generator was set over the engine in the rear, totally covered. All the tank's weapons could operate, though the wires attached to the speaker limited turret motion. Some of the ammunition racks inside the tank were removed and the amplifiers for the loudspeaker fastened to the steel insides.

We broadcasters lived in the turret, the tank driver was forward in the driver's compartment and the electrician who maintained the loudspeaker and electronic equipment occupied the assistant driver's seat.

Having trained as a tanker, I was familiar with tank combat. I could work the radios and fire the guns. I usually placed the tank as No. 3 in an attack column. There, it could broadcast immediately without interfering with the two point tanks as they checked right and left.

We were a success. In three weeks fighting beyond the Rhine in 1945, the Second Armored Division credited the talking tank for the surrender of 5,000 prisoners. The actions of the other tankers were also crucial. Their willingness to hold their fire gave surrenders a chance to happen. Germans had time to weigh the alternatives: an attack from our tanks versus imprisonment under the Geneva Conventions. In this way, American and German lives were saved.

The British had a similar strategy, though they did not use loudspeakers. They had a truck-drawn trailer with a radio broadcast studio and station inside. Led by Marius Goring (famous, later, as the hero of "The Red Shoes"), this unit would interview cooperative German prisoners and broadcast their reactions to their capture into Germany. In these broadcasts Goring would get prisoners to stress that while being a prisoner was no pleasure, they were treated fairly under the Geneva Conventions.

Yes, times have changed. Yes, we face a different enemy from the one we faced half a century ago. But I've seen firsthand the power of Geneva Conventions, both to compel surrenders and to broadcast, for the world, our determination to live up to our highest ideals.

McCain Names Practices Detainee Bill Would Bar (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

A Republican senator who played a leading role in drafting new rules for U.S. interrogations of terrorism suspects said yesterday that he believes a compromise bill embraced by party leaders and the White House will bar some of most extreme techniques said to have been used by the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0068572

Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) named three measures that he said would no longer be allowed under a provision barring techniques that cause serious mental or physical suffering by U.S. detainees: extreme sleep deprivation, forced hypothermia and "waterboarding," which simulates drowning. He also said other "extreme measures" would be banned.

McCain's remarks were unusual because public officials involved in the lengthy public debate about U.S. interrogation practices have rarely made specific references to the CIA's actions, choosing instead to make general claims about the need for rough interrogations or a desire to stop abusive behavior.

"It's clear we have to have the high moral ground," said McCain, a former POW tortured by prison guards in Vietnam, on CBS's "Face The Nation." "I am confident that some of the abuses that were reportedly committed in the past will be prohibited in the future."

McCain spoke after officials of Human Rights Watch and others pressed him to spell out ways in which the controversial draft legislation would constrain the CIA's actions. The bill, introduced in the Senate on Friday, does not mention specific interrogation methods, causing some experts to say it would leave room for abuses. President Bush endorsed the bill after CIA Director Michael V. Hayden said it meets his agency's needs.

McCain, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and their staffs were heavily involved in drafting the bill's language, so McCain's reading of it may carry weight in any future court battle over its meaning. Aides said he did not clear his remarks with the Bush administration in advance, and spokesmen for the CIA and the White House declined to say yesterday whether they accepted McCain's conclusions.

"We cannot and will not comment on specific interrogation measures," CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said, adding that the agency will act lawfully. The CIA has claimed unofficially that its most extreme measures were used on only a handful of detainees.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who wants to shepherd the detainee bill to congressional passage this week, also declined to give a specific reading of it yesterday. Asked repeatedly on ABC's "This Week" what the legislation would allow, Frist said, "I'm not going to comment on individual techniques," and he condemned doing so.

"No responsible person is going to come in and basically say, 'These are the 10 techniques we use and these are the 10 that are not used,' " said Frist, who is sometimes mentioned as a McCain rival for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. "It helps the terrorists."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) yesterday praised the bill as "a big improvement" over the administration's initial proposals. But he said on CNN's "Late Edition" that he opposes provisions in it that would bar terrorism suspects from challenging their detention or treatment in federal court. "That has to be changed," said Specter, who plans to hold a hearing on the issue this morning.

The proposed legislation does not say what interrogators can do. Instead, it states indirectly, in amendments to the 10-year-old War Crimes Act, that those who cause detainees "severe or serious physical or mental pain or suffering" can be charged with a felony. This includes, according to the bill's definitions, anyone who causes serious physical abuse, a substantial risk of death, extreme physical pain, burns or serious physical disfigurement, or a loss or impairment of "the function of a bodily member, organ, or mental faculty."

The bill would also replace an existing ban on interrogation practices that cause "prolonged" mental pain or suffering with a more sweeping ban on those that inflict "serious and non-transitory mental harm (which need not be prolonged)." This provision would be applicable only to interrogations that occur after the date the legislation is passed -- and thus it would effectively immunize from prosecution any CIA interrogators who have inflicted short-term but serious mental harm on detainees.

The White House had preferred to bar questioning that caused "severe" and "prolonged" harm, while McCain and his allies sought to obstruct interrogations that caused "almost instantaneous" mental harm. "If the detainee faints, that is not what we were trying to capture," said one of the congressional negotiators, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive negotiations. "But we wanted to prohibit anything that would cause a lasting effect, or anything that would go up to that line."

The CIA exposed some of the estimated 100 people held at various times in its foreign prison system to temperature extremes, lengthy sleep deprivation and stress positions such as prolonged forced standing, officials said. But the agency never fully briefed McCain, Graham or their staffs on the interrogations, a circumstance that handicapped the discussions last week.

DOJ_NMG_0068573

McCain was nonetheless particularly adamant that the CIA be permanently blocked from using waterboarding, which he regards as torture, even though intelligence officials have said privately that it has not been used for several years. McCain -- who has previously described being beaten and painfully bound by ropes in Vietnam -- said yesterday he recognized that stress positions could be "important" and that while it "was never our intent" to stop the CIA interrogation program, he wanted to stop the "extreme application" of such techniques.

As lawmakers and officials struggled to find compromise language, they consulted a dictionary Web site's entries for the words "momentary," "temporary," "transitory" and "fleeting," two congressional sources said.

The key to the deal, congressional sources said, was the Senate lawmakers' acceptance of national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley's demand that violations of the ban on serious, non-transitory and not necessarily prolonged mental harm could bring prosecution only for future interrogations. The demand grew out of CIA and Justice Department concerns that interrogators would be exposed to war-crimes charges for their past actions.

Alberto J. Mora -- who opposed the administration's interrogation policies while serving as the Navy's judge advocate general from 2001 until the end of last year -- said in May that "we know the treatment may have reached the level of torture in some instances." Mora's remarks referred to detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and elsewhere.

McConnell: Democrats AWOL In Terror War (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

As Republicans patch up their differences over how to handle the terrorism suspects held at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, they are turning their sights on Democrats in time for the November elections.

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell on Friday took issue with Minority Leader Harry Reid over his comments earlier in the week that Democrats were "on the sidelines watching the catfights" among Republicans on terrorism legislation.

"The minority leader indicated that they were sitting on the sidelines during our internal discussion about how best to craft this proposal," the Kentucky Republican told reporters gathered in his office. "I don't think sitting on the sidelines in the war on terror is a good idea. We have to have as much bipartisan cooperation as possible."

In the wake of last week's deal among Republicans on how to try terrorism suspects, Democrats also sought to gain a political foothold before the November elections.

"Democrats are united behind the need to work on a bipartisan basis to bring terrorists to justice and to do it in a manner consistent with our laws, our values and our national security," Mr. Reid said last week as news spread that a deal had been reached.

"Hopefully, today's press conference means that President Bush and the congressional Republican leadership have changed course and listened to numerous national security experts, such as General Colin Powell," he said. "Five years after 9/11, it is time to make the tough and smart decisions to give the American people the real security they deserve."

But in the sure-to-be hectic final week before Congress adjourns for the elections, fissures remain between the parties and also among Republicans.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert wants to include this week in the must-pass defense funding bill the Community Protection Act, aimed at deporting members of criminal alien gangs. In addition, the Illinois Republican wants to include bipartisan court-security measures passed in the wake of last year's retaliatory slaying of Chicago federal Judge Joan Lefkow's family.

"The speaker is not going to let the bill move until these critical security items get in," said Ron Bonjean, Mr. Hastert's spokesman.

But despite bipartisan support that includes Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the court-security provisions aren't going anywhere, a Republican leadership aide said. At the request of Democrats on the Armed Services Committee, Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, won't include the measure, the Republican said.

DOJ_NMG_0068574

"Senator Warner is kowtowing to liberal Democrats who are rolling over Durbin's ability to get it done," a House GOP leadership aide said. "It looks like Senator Durbin doesn't have the juice to control his own Democrats so we can protect our nation's judges."

Mr. Warner's spokesman declined to comment yesterday.

Regardless of what Republicans accomplish in this final week, Mr. McConnell dismissed Democrat charges that this has been a "do-nothing" Congress. This, he said Friday, is the "most accomplished Congress in the 22 years that I've been here." And he said he's not worried about November's contest.

"This election will not just be about us. It will be a choice -- a choice between us and them," Mr. McConnell said. "A lot of Americans have forgotten what Democrats do when they're in the majority. We're going to remind them. They'll retreat in the war on terror, they'll raise taxes, and they'll impeach the president."

Specter Decries Detainee Bill Provision (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, September 25, 2006

The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Sunday he has a problem with the Republican agreement on rules for the interrogation and trial of suspects in the war on terror.

President Bush is pushing Congress to put the agreement into law before adjourning for the midterm elections, but Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Sunday he "vigorously" disagrees with the habeas corpus provision of the bill.

The provision would allow legal counsel and a day in court to only those detainees selected by the Pentagon for prosecution. Other terror suspects could be held indefinitely without a hearing.

"The courts have traditionally been open to make sure that individual rights are protected, and that is fundamental," Specter said on CNN's "Late Edition. "And the Constitution says when you can suspend the writ of habeas corpus, in time of rebellion or invasion. And we don't have either. So that has to be changed, in my opinion."

Specter scheduled a hearing on the issue for Monday. Otherwise, he said, most of the legislation is a "big improvement" over what Bush originally proposed.

The White House was forced to make concessions by a group of Senate Republicans who objected to the harsh treatment that would be allowed against detainees. The Bush administration agreed to drop one provision narrowly interpreting international standards of prisoner treatment and another allowing defendants to be convicted on evidence they never see.

The bill lists acts that would constitute war crimes, including torture, rape, biological experiments and cruel and inhuman treatment. White House officials said these provisions would provide the CIA the clarity it needs to continue with the interrogation of its most valued suspects.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Sunday he expected the bill would pass before Congress adjourns.

"It's very important, because right now these detainees that we have down in Guantanamo Bay right now, we can't even try them now," Frist said on ABC's "This Week." "Right now, unless we pass this bill, we cannot have an interrogation program continue that we know has been lifesaving that has uncovered terrorist attacks against the United States."

Specter Criticizes Deal Reached On Detainee Treatment (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

The Republican chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee says the compromise deal on terrorism-detainee legislation reached last week "has to be changed," and that he will "vigorously oppose" a section of the bill that strips the detainees of their right to appeal to the federal courts.

Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania spoke for the first time yesterday about the compromise reached last week between the White House and three leading Republican senators on legislation that sets standards for interrogating and trying suspected terrorists held in U.S. military custody.

"Most of it is a big improvement," Mr. Specter told CNN of the bill, which was published Friday. "But there's one part that I vigorously disagree with, and that is taking away the jurisdiction of the federal courts on what we call habeas corpus."

DOJ_NMG_0068575

Habeas corpus is an ancient legal doctrine dating back to the origins of English common law in the Magna Carta of 1215, under which anyone held by the government can challenge his detention -- forcing the courts to rule on its legality.

The bill would effectively remove the right of those detained outside of the United States or those defined by U.S. authorities as "unlawful enemy combatants" to challenge their detention in court. It would also sweep away a number of cases already proceeding through the courts, according to the Morton Sklar, executive director of the World Organization for Human Rights.

"The absence of any reliable and objective means of challenging the U.S. government action in court makes a mockery of even the more limited protections set out in this proposed bill," Mr. Sklar said. Without habeas corpus, "there is no realistic way for a victim to bring problems to a court's attention and to seek redress."

In advance of hearings on the issue today, Mr. Specter pointed out that habeas petitions to the federal courts by detainees at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, had been the basis of the U.S. Supreme Court cases that forced the administration to revise the rules for their treatment and their trial by military commission.

Congress had punted on the issue, he said, calling the matter "too hot to handle."

"The federal courts just have to be open" to these cases, he said, noting that the Constitution allows the suspension of habeas corpus only "in time of rebellion or invasion."

"And we don't have either," Mr. Specter added, "So that has to be changed, in my opinion."

Last week, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, Carl Levin of Michigan, said he would work with Mr. Specter to eliminate the restrictions on habeas. Opposition to the habeas provisions of the detainee bill further complicates an already tricky legislative task for the Republican leadership in the Senate, which will wrap up for the election recess at the end of the week.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, brought the compromise detainee bill to the floor Friday, using a special procedure enabling him to bypass the committees of jurisdiction. But he also brought a bill to the floor combining that measure with one that authorizes President Bush's program of warrantless wiretaps of suspected terrorists.

One senior Democratic Senate staffer said that including the wiretapping provision could complicate the issue because a number of Republicans oppose parts of that bill.

"The question is, if someone objects [to parts of the bill], will he have the votes to make cloture?" the staffer asked, referring to the parliamentary procedure required to vote on the matter.

Habeas Corpus Not Needed (USAT)

By James S. Robbins

USA Today, September 25, 2006

Extending the rights of habeas corpus to individuals detained during the war on terrorism would be an unnecessary and dangerous step.

The foreign detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and elsewhere do not have the same status as criminals. These people are not being held for rehabilitation or as punishment. The detainees are precisely that, detained. Some are useful for purposes of intelligence exploitation. Others are held simply to keep them from returning to the battlefield to kill Americans.

According to the Geneva Conventions, prisoners (even legitimate POWs) may be held for the duration of hostilities without trials. We did not try prisoners during World War II, for example. The notion would have been thought absurd. Some have observed that the detainees potentially face lifetime detention if hostilities continue, but this is because their leaders refuse to end their jihad against the United States.

Furthermore, it is not as though all detainees are held for life. Approximately 315 of the 770 Guantanamo detainees have been determined by review boards not to be threats and have been released. Scores more are awaiting release to whatever countries that will accept them. There are few takers.

Note that our review process is not foolproof; for example, Maulvi Abdul Ghaffar, released from Guantanamo, renewed his career as a Taliban commander before being killed in 2004.

It is not true that the detainees have been held without due process. The debate over the McCain amendment to the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 was an attempt to define exactly what process was due. Congress chose not to include habeas corpus in this bundle of rights, leaving the question of detainee status to the Combatant Status Review Tribunals. The Constitution gives Congress the right to suspend the "privilege" of habeas corpus in the interest of public safety.

DOJ_NMG_0068576

Even if one assumes foreigners who have taken up arms against the United States enjoy the same rights as citizens, in the end Congress makes the call.

James S. Robbins is senior fellow on national security affairs at the American Foreign Policy Council and author of Last in Their Class: Custer, Pickett and the Goats of West Point.

Scepticism Over Bin Laden 'death' (FT)

By Martin Arnold And Farhan Bokhari

Financial Times, September 25, 2006

A leaked French intelligence report claiming Saudi Arabia's secret services had confirmed the death of Osama bin Laden, the leader of the al-Qaeda terrorist network, met with widespread scepticism on Sunday.

Saudi, Pakistani, US and western officials all said they were unable to confirm the death of the world's most wanted man.

The frantic speculation was sparked by publication of a leaked report from the DGSE (France's foreign intelligence agency) by the French regional newspaper L'Est Républicain on Saturday.

The report said: "The information gathered by the Saudis indicates that the head of al-Qaeda fell victim, while he was in Pakistan on August 23 2006, to a very serious case of typhoid that led to a partial paralysis of his lower limbs. They are waiting to get more details, notably the exact place of his burial, before officially announcing the news."

But a statement from the Saudi embassy in Washington said: "The kingdom of Saudi Arabia has no evidence to support recent media reports that Osama bin Laden is dead. Information that has been reported otherwise is purely speculative and cannot be independently verified."

A senior Pakistani security official said: "There was as yet no independent confirmation of this report. Basically, we don't know if bin Laden is alive or dead. Nobody knows for certain."

He said news of Mr bin Laden's death had circulated before, making it difficult to separate fact from fiction. "Right now, no one wants to confirm [bin Laden's death] unless there is hard physical evidence. But everyone is aware that bin Laden may be a dying man if his health is as bad as we have heard in the past."

The timing of the report's publication also raised eyebrows, as it coincided with an informal summit of the leaders of France, Germany and Russia on Saturday.

Jacques Chirac, France's president, ordered the defence ministry to open an investigation into the leaked report, which was sent to the president, prime minister, and defence, foreign and interior ministries.

World Leaders Skeptical Of Bin Laden Death Report (USAT)

USA Today, September 25, 2006

PARIS — France's foreign minister said Sunday that to his knowledge, Osama bin Laden is not dead.

Philippe Douste-Blazy was the latest official to cast doubt on a leaked French intelligence document suggesting the al-Qaeda leader died of typhoid in August.

"To my knowledge, Osama bin Laden is not dead," Douste-Blazy said in a television interview on the station LCI. "To my knowledge, we are absolutely not informed either of a health problem or of the death of bin Laden."

Questions about bin Laden's fate resurfaced with the publication Saturday in L'Est Republicain, a French regional newspaper, of a leaked document from France's DGSE secret service. It cited an uncorroborated report from a "usually reliable source" who said Saudi intelligence services were convinced that bin Laden had died of a severe case of typhoid contracted Aug. 23 in Pakistan.

France's Defense Ministry confirmed that the document, reportedly sent to French President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, was not false. However, French authorities stressed that the raw, unconfirmed information was questionable.

"This information is in no way whatsoever confirmed," Chirac said at a news conference Saturday.

Officials across the globe dismissed the report as speculation.

DOJ_NMG_0068577

•The Saudi Arabian Embassy in Washington said it had no evidence to support the report. “Information that has been reported otherwise is purely speculative and cannot be independently verified,” the embassy said in a statement on its website.

•“No comment, no knowledge,” Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said when asked about the French article by reporters in New York.

•British Prime Minister Tony Blair, asked in a BBC interview whether he could shed light on the report, said: “No, I can't. I haven't heard anything that indicates that might be the case.”

•When asked Sunday about the leaked French intelligence document, Afghan President Hamid Karzai told CNN's Late Edition that Afghanistan does not have “accurate information as to the precise location of Osama bin Laden.”

Bin Laden was based in Afghanistan until its Taliban government was overthrown in 2001 by U.S.-backed forces after the 9/11 attacks on the USA. Since then, U.S. and Pakistani officials have said they believe he is hiding somewhere on the Afghanistan-Pakistan border.

Bin Laden's last videotaped message was released in late 2004. Several low-quality audiotapes have been released this year.

Karzai Says Bin Laden Not In Afghanistan (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 25, 2006

Afghan's president asserted on Sunday that Osama bin Laden has not been in his country since being chased out after the Sept. 11 attacks five years ago. But Hamid Karzai acknowledged that the al-Qaida leader's exact location is unknown.

"He has never been in our country after Sept. 11, after the strikes against him, after we chased his organization out of Afghanistan," Karzai told CNN's "Late Edition." He suggested the al-Qaida leader was in Pakistan.

When asked about a leaked French intelligence document that raised the possibility bin Laden died in Pakistan of an illness last month, Karzai said Afghanistan does not have "accurate information as to the precise location" of Osama bin Laden."

Separately, Karzai told NBC's "Meet the Press," in an interview taped last week but broadcast Sunday, that his country would be "heaven in less than a year" if it got the $300 billion the United States has spent in Iraq.

Critics of President Bush say the United States has not been able to finish rebuilding Afghanistan because it is distracted by the increasingly expensive war in Iraq.

"Three hundred billion dollars: You give that to Afghanistan and we will be in heaven in less than a year," Karzai said when asked if the money spent on Iraq would have been better spent in Afghanistan. "We definitely need more money for reconstruction."

Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., said the war in Iraq had hurt the hunt for bin Laden. She said it was a "fair certainty" the al-Qaida chief was in Pakistan's tribal area, not Afghanistan.

"Resources were not focused on this problem as we got bogged down in Iraq," she told CNN. "We should have been able to capture him within the last five years."

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., warned against making the search for bin Laden a political issue with elections weeks away. "Everybody wants to capture Osama bin Laden, and one day we will," he said.

Specter said trying to find bin Laden is "like looking for a needle in a haystack. I don't think you can say that it's anybody's fault. It's a big world. There are lots of places for him to hide."

The issue has caused friction between Karzai and Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf. Last week, they spent much of the U.N. General Assembly meeting trading barbs and criticizing each other's efforts to fight terrorists along their long, remote, mountainous border.

The United States views the region as crucial to stopping terrorism. Bush will try to diffuse tensions when the three leaders meet this week.

Pakistan rejects the accusation that it is not doing enough to stop terrorists, pointing out that it has deployed 80,000 troops along the porous border. Musharraf said last week that "the problem lies in Afghanistan, and that is creating the problem in Pakistan."

DOJ_NMG_0068578

Experts See Lower Threat From Al-Qaida (AP-Y)

By Robert H. Reid And Sally Buzbee, Associated Press Writers

AP, September 25, 2006

The threats came in a blizzard around the anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks — a series of videos from al-Qaida's No. 2 warning of more strikes to come.

But U.S. intelligence agencies and many private security analysts doubt al-Qaida or its elusive leader, Osama bin Laden, still maintain much if any operational control over far-flung terror cells.

They see no sign of a direct al-Qaida hand in a flurry of recent attacks, such as the assault on the U.S. Embassy in Damascus, Syria, or the fatal shooting of a British tourist in Jordan. The French intelligence report that bin Laden may have died last month of typhoid merely highlights the uncertainty the West now has about any role he plays in the terror network.

All that means those frightening videos may have been just that — designed to frighten the West and inspire followers — with little real punch behind them.

Bin Laden and his top deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, are now "less like generals and more like talking heads, disseminating their violent ideology via satellite television in hopes of inspiring others to do their bidding," said Eben Kaplan of the Council on Foreign Relations think tank in New York.

Not everyone agrees. There are ominous signs in Afghanistan that al-Qaida is trying to make an operational comeback as attacks, especially suicide missions, against U.S. and coalition forces increase.

Some experts also fear the absence of a major, Sept. 11-style attack simply means al-Qaida is taking its time to plan a next spectacular strike.

Still, five years after the attack on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, many analysts believe the day-to-day threat from al-Qaida itself has dropped.

Paradoxically, however, the threat from Islamic extremists may have grown — and become broader, more diverse and more complex, and thus harder to combat.

"The absence of a formal, single organizational structure has contributed to making the fight against this brand of terrorism more elusive and difficult," the British think tank Chatham House said in a report this month as the videos were airing.

That view is also expressed in a classified U.S. intelligence report that says the Iraq war has increased the threat of terrorism by stirring up Islamic extremism around the globe. The report, which represented the consensus of 16 U.S. spy services, was completed in April and first reported in Sunday's New York Times and Washington Post.

After the U.S. and its allies ousted the Taliban in 2001, al-Qaida apparently transformed itself into an ideological movement of self-sustaining cells that operate with little or no central direction, many analysts and intelligence officials believe. That makes them difficult to track — until they strike or make a mistake that leads the authorities to them.

It also makes it difficult to determine whether any specific attack was actually directed by al-Qaida.

For example, British authorities insist there is no evidence al-Qaida directed the July 2005 suicide attacks on the London transit system that killed 52 commuters.

Nonetheless, one of the four British Muslim bombers appeared later on a videotape made before his death, declaring his allegiance to bin Laden. That tape bore the logo of al-Qaida's production company.

"Al-Qaida is crippled and is certainly not the organization it was. Al-Qaida, however, has placed extra emphasis on inspiring other groups and trying to mobilize other groups," the State Department's counterterrorism coordinator, Henry Crumpton, told the Council on Foreign Relations recently.

Al-Qaida's efforts to inspire appear to be focused on a worldwide wellspring of young, radicalized Muslims who share broad anger at the West, especially the United States.

But the goals, methods and targets of those far-flung radicals now vary widely. And not all extremist groups share al-Qaida's vision of global struggle against the West, preferring in some cases to fight instead for specific national political aims.

Across the world, that means the threat is fractured into many parts — with the need to tailor defenses accordingly.

In Britain, mostly homegrown militants of Pakistani descent seem intent on staging the kind of big, spectacular attack that bin Laden used on Sept. 11.

DOJ_NMG_0068579

Their efforts have focused again and again on jetliners — as during this summer's scare — and other big transportation systems such as subways.

Elsewhere, however, militants have diverged sharply from bin Laden. The assault this month on the U.S. Embassy in Damascus, Syria — which came just a day after al-Zawahri's warning tapes were aired — serves as a prime example.

In Syria, militants have focused on getting rid of President Bashar Assad and there is no sign they receive any operational direction from al-Qaida.

In Iraq, the fight has mostly morphed into a sectarian conflict between Sunnis and Shiites for control of Iraq's future, although some foreign fighters inspired by al-Qaida seem to still be involved.

Meanwhile, militants from Hamas and Hezbollah share the same hatred of the U.S. and Israel — but have sharply different ideologies and goals than al-Qaida.

Hamas is focused on gaining power among the Palestinian community at the expense of its rival Fatah. Hezbollah wants to carve a role for itself as the leader of Shiite Muslims in Lebanon and the dominant political force in that country.

In places like Sudan and Somalia, Muslim militants are fighting for local power and control. They may have links to bin Laden from the past — but their only real connection seems to be when they invoke his name to resist the West.

Chris Wallace, Caught Off Balance? (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Fox News anchor Chris Wallace said that he was stunned when Bill Clinton accused him of a "conservative hit job" after he challenged the former president on his record in fighting terrorism.

"I thought it was a fair, balanced and not especially inflammatory question," Wallace said yesterday in recounting his "Fox News Sunday" sit-down with Clinton. "I even said, 'I know hindsight is 20/20.' But he went off. And once he went off, there was no bringing him back. He wanted to talk about it in detail. He wanted to conjure up right-wingers and conservative hit jobs and a theory involving Rupert Murdoch that I still don't understand."

Fox had agreed in advance that half the interview would be about Clinton's Global Initiative forum and half about other subjects. Wallace began with a couple of questions about the initiative before citing the 1993 U.S. military withdrawal from Somalia and several bombings connected to al-Qaeda in asking, "Why didn't you do more, connect the dots and put them out of business?"

In an impassioned, finger-wagging answer, Clinton told Wallace, a former ABC News correspondent: "You did Fox's bidding on this show. You did your nice little conservative hit job on me. . . . You set this meeting up because you were going to get a lot of criticism from your viewers because Rupert Murdoch is supporting my work on climate change. And you came here under false pretenses and said that you'd spend half the time talking about . . . what we did out there to raise $7 billion-plus over three days from 215 different commitments. And you don't care."

Murdoch, the billionaire conservative who owns Fox, has recently mended fences with the Clinton family, even attending a fundraiser for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). Fox, which employs a number of high-profile conservative hosts, maintains that its reporting is straightforward but is viewed by many liberals and other critics as leaning to the right. Clinton's appearance was his first on "Fox News Sunday" in the program's 10-year history.

"We're fully aware of Fox News's and Chris Wallace's agenda, and President Clinton came in prepared to respond to any attack on his record," said Jay Carson, his spokesman. "When Wallace questioned his record on terrorism, he responded forcefully, as any Democrat would or should."

In the interview, in which Clinton also accused Wallace of having a "little smirk" on his face, the host said he had planned to spend half the allotted 15 minutes on the Global Initiative and that "I didn't think this was going to set you off on such a tear."

"It set me off on such a tear because you didn't formulate it in an honest way and you people ask me questions you don't ask the other side," Clinton said.

"Sir, that is not true," Wallace replied.

DOJ_NMG_0068580

Asked about Clinton's complaint, a Fox spokeswoman pointed to Wallace's interview two weeks ago with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Wallace pressed her about the lack of prewar ties between Osama bin Laden and Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, but he did not ask about U.S. efforts against bin Laden before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Carson noted that the 2000 bombing of the U.S.S. Cole was officially linked to al-Qaeda after Bush took office.

"I don't think I was fanning the flames here," Wallace said. "It was all generated from within him."

Clinton has on occasion scolded other interviewers, most notably in a 2004 sitdown with ABC's Peter Jennings, who drew this response after alluding to Clinton's personal misconduct: "You don't want to go here, Peter. . . . Not after what you people did and the way you, your network, what you did with Kenneth Starr. The way your people repeated every little sleazy thing he leaked."

Wallace said the surprise is not that he asked Clinton about terrorism but that no other television interviewer did during a round of appearances last week. Clinton, Wallace said, remained "upset" and "angry" after the interview.The 'Jewish' Question

How did having Jewish relatives turn into a gotcha question?

Virginia Sen. George Allen was clearly irritated last week when a WUSA-TV reporter, seemingly out of nowhere, asked at a televised debate whether his mother was Jewish. Allen dismissed the question as "irrelevant," but said a day later he had discovered that his grandfather was Jewish, and the following day that his mother had recently told him that she was raised Jewish as well.

Call it the oy vey factor: Was this yet another attempt by the media to catch a politician covering up some secret personal detail? Or was it the southerner in cowboy boots who invited scrutiny of his background by keeping the information under wraps?

It remains unclear why Channel 9's Peggy Fox posed the question to Allen during his debate with Democratic challenger James Webb. Was this a matter of pressing importance to the voters of Virginia?

Fox, who is described on WUSA's Web site as "a Fairfax County native who married her West Springfield High School sweetheart," declined to be interviewed. In an e-mail, she says: "I would love to talk to you to tell you why I asked the question. But I am not the story. Senator Allen is. I will tell you I asked the question because I wanted to find out if he was hiding a heritage he really should be proud of (like most Americans are) because he felt acknowledging his roots could cost him votes.

"The question had been asked before and not answered. To me, it doesn't matter what religion someone is, but not being genuine does. The voters have a right to know if the candidates are who they say they are."

In an e-mail response to viewers, Fox also says: "I regret the way I worded the question and the way Senator Allen turned the spotlight onto the question itself without addressing the bigger political issue which could be relevant to the campaign."

But what is the "bigger" issue? When Allen threw the question back at her, demanding to know why it was relevant, she replied, "Honesty." Was Fox essentially accusing the candidate of lying?

In a way, the Allen campaign opened the door to Fox's question by not providing answers to the Jewish newspaper the Forward, which reported late last month that Allen's mother, Henrietta, a French Tunisian, was "likely" Jewish by birth. A week earlier, the senator's staff told Time's Mike Allen that they were not familiar with any Jewish background. The reporter says he suggested that they ask Allen if his mother has Jewish roots, "and the response was that he didn't think she does."

The senator's mother got dragged into public discussion because of speculation that Allen had picked up the word "macaca" from her. As the civilized world knows by now, Allen has apologized for using the word -- a racial slur in some cultures -- to describe an Indian American volunteer for Webb's campaign.

The press may well have overplayed the macaca gaffe -- there was no comparable frenzy over Webb saying three decades ago that the U.S. Naval Academy was "a horny woman's dream" -- but it was a self-inflicted wound that was captured on video and downloaded thousands of times on YouTube.com.

The Post last week quoted Allen's mother as saying she didn't tell her son she was Jewish until he asked about the "rumor" late last month. Why the senator didn't inquire earlier, since he's talked about his grandfather having been imprisoned by the Nazis, is an interesting question.

While politicians understandably resent journalists turning into genealogical detectives, they are rarely shy when it comes to scoring ethnic points. Allen has spoken on the campaign trail about having his "grandfather's bloodlines," namely "French Italian" and "one-sixteenth Spanish." Nor are they above trading on family connections or showcasing their spouses and children. Allen, of course, is the son of the famed football coach whose name he bears.

DOJ_NMG_0068581

The list of prominent public figures who acknowledge their Jewish ancestry only after seeking or attaining public office -- John Kerry, Wesley Clark, Madeleine Albright -- is growing longer. Some appear to have made the cold calculation that it would not be a political asset.

And this goes beyond questions of Jewish heritage. When the Massachusetts senator, gearing up to run for president in 2003, said he had never claimed to be Irish, the Boston Globe reported that he had claimed Irish ancestry in a St. Patrick's Day message nearly two decades earlier.

Peggy Fox insists she is not the story. But journalists who appear on television and ask questions at televised debates -- particularly personal questions -- often become part of the story. By leaving out part of his biography for years, Allen gave her a big, fat opening. But for all the media furor, most Virginia voters probably care more about the Iraq war and the economy than the details of the senator's family tree.Liberal Media?

The "mainstream media presents itself as unbiased, when in fact there are built into it many biases, and they are overwhelmingly to the left."

The man who made that comment is not some rabid right-wing critic but Thomas Edsall, a Washington Post political reporter for a quarter-century who recently accepted an early retirement offer.

In an interview with conservative radio host Hugh Hewitt, Edsall said he is pro-choice on abortion and does not think he has ever voted for a Republican presidential candidate. He said he believes that reporters vote Democratic by somewhere between 15 to 1 and 25 to 1.

Edsall, who now writes for the New Republic and has just finished a book called "Building Red America," also said that journalists have an inherent "suspicion" of the military, and he agreed "to a certain degree" with the argument that Fox News and conservative radio became popular because many people, in Hewitt's words, "got sick and tired of being spoon-fed liberal dross" by the New York Times, Los Angeles Times and Washington Post.

In an interview, Edsall says the main problem is "an inability to empathize with the way many people in red states think and feel" but that it is "possible" for journalists to set aside their views and report fairly.

Clinton Defends How He Handled Al-Qaeda Threat (USAT)

USA Today, September 25, 2006

NEW YORK — In a combative interview on Fox News Sunday, former president Bill Clinton defended his handling of Osama bin Laden, saying he tried to have bin Laden killed and was attacked for his efforts by the same people who now criticize him for not doing enough.

“That's the difference in me and some, including all of the right-wingers who are attacking me now,” Clinton said. “They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try, they did not try.”

Clinton said he “worked hard” to try to kill bin Laden, who orchestrated the Sept. 11 attacks eight months into President Bush's presidency.

“We contracted with people to kill him. I got closer to killing him than anybody's gotten since,” he said.

Clinton accused host Chris Wallace of a “conservative hit job” and asked: “I want to know how many people in the Bush administration you asked, ‘Why didn't you do anything about the Cole?' I want to know how many people you asked, ‘Why did you fire Dick Clarke?' ”

He was referring to the USS Cole, bombed by terrorists in 2000, and former White House anti-terrorism chief Richard Clarke, who resigned in 2003.

Wallace said Sunday that he was surprised by Clinton's “conspiratorial view” of “a very non-confrontational question, ‘Did you do enough to connect the dots and go after al-Qaeda?'”

“All I did was ask him a question, and I think it was a legitimate news question,” Wallace said in a telephone interview.

White House spokesman Peter Watkins said Bush has always been focused on pressing the fight against terrorism. As for Clinton's remarks: “The record paints a different picture than what he is suggesting.”

DOJ_NMG_0068582

Terrorism analyst Steven Emerson said Clinton “obviously felt the rawness” of ABC's controversial miniseries, The Path to 9/11, which ran Sept. 7 and 8 and portrayed officials in his administration as failing to act on opportunities to kill or capture bin Laden. Emerson added that bin Laden “was not a high priority” with Bush until after 9/11.

Clinton Defends Pre-9/11 Actions (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton angrily defended his administration's record of combating terrorism and blamed the Bush White House for not taking Osama bin Laden seriously enough before the terrorist attacks of September 11.

"I think it's very interesting that all the conservative Republicans, who now say I didn't do enough, claimed that I was too obsessed with bin Laden" and the so-called "Wag the Dog" scenario, Mr. Clinton said yesterday during a taped interview with "Fox News Sunday."

"All of President Bush's neo-cons thought I was too obsessed with bin Laden. They had no meetings on bin Laden for nine months after I left office," he said in the contentious interview.

Mr. Clinton became so agitated that he could be seen wagging his right index finger at moderator Chris Wallace, as he did at the start of the Monica Lewinsky scandal, when he shook the same finger and told the American public that "I did not have sexual relations with that woman, Miss Lewinsky."

He later admitted an "inappropriate" relationship with the former White House intern after his DNA matched a stain on her blue dress.

In the heated exchange, he also accused Mr. Wallace of shifting his questions away from a promised discussion of the former president's Clinton Global Initiative project.

"You've got that little smirk on your face, and you think you're so clever," Mr. Clinton said. "You did your nice little conservative hit job on me."

In an interview yesterday with MediaBistro.com, Mr. Wallace noted that Mr. Clinton is "a very big man" and that he thought the former president was trying to intimidate him by getting angry.

"As he leaned forward -- wagging his finger in my face and then poking the notes I was holding -- I felt as if a mountain was coming down in front of me," Mr. Wallace said.

The interview was peppered with references to Mr. Clinton's legacy as viewed through the prism of popular culture. For instance, when defending his efforts to capture or kill bin Laden, Mr. Clinton alluded to the 1997 film "Wag the Dog."

"The people on my political right who say I didn't do enough spent the whole time I was president saying, 'Why is he so obsessed with bin Laden?'" Mr. Clinton said. "That was 'wag the dog' when he tried to kill him."

In the movie, a U.S. president creates a fake war with Albania through the media in order to distract the public from an emerging sex scandal.

Mr. Clinton also took aim at ABC's recent offering, "The Path to 9/11," which depicted his administration as lax in its response to the threat of terrorism.

"ABC just had a right-wing conservative run in their little 'Pathway to 9/11,'" Mr. Clinton said, saying the film was "falsely claiming it was based on the 9/11 commission report, with three things asserted against me directly contradicted by the 9/11 commission report."

During the past week, Mr. Clinton has given a number of other interviews, including stops with CNN's Wolf Blitzer and NBC's Tim Russert. Both segments focused on his recent philanthropic work.

Mr. Clinton protested the questions from Fox, saying that the interview agreement stipulated that half of the 15-minute segment be devoted to his philanthropic efforts. Mr. Wallace noted in MediaBistro that still left half the time for other subjects and cited the transcripts as showing that he asked the same number of questions -- five -- on philanthropy-related matters as on other issues.

The former president went on to harshly criticize the Bush administration for failing to stop bin Laden before and after September 11.

DOJ_NMG_0068583

"They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try. They did not try. I tried. So, I tried and failed," Mr. Clinton said. "Now, I've never criticized President Bush, and I don't think this is useful. But you know we do have a government that thinks Afghanistan is only one-seventh as important as Iraq."

Video excerpts of the interview first surfaced on the Internet on Friday.

The Drudge Report Web site, www.drudgereport.com, provided readers a link to part of the interview, headlined, "Purple Faced Rage."

Torture Victim Had No Terror Link, Canada Told U.S. (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 24 — When the United States sent Maher Arar to Syria, where he was tortured for months, the deportation order stated unequivocally that Mr. Arar, a Canadian software engineer, was a member of Al Qaeda. But a few days earlier, Canadian investigators had told the F.B.I. that they had not been able to link him to the terrorist group.

That is one of the disclosures in the 1,200-page report released last week after a two-year Canadian investigation of Mr. Arar's case found him to be innocent of any terrorist ties. The report urges the Canadian government to formally protest the American treatment of Mr. Arar, a recommendation Canadian officials are considering.

Mr. Arar, 37, who now lives in British Columbia, has a lawsuit against United States officials and agencies that is on appeal, and he has demanded an explanation for his treatment from the Bush administration.

A close reading of the Arar Commission report offers a rare window on American actions in the case, describing seemingly flimsy evidence behind the American decision in 2002 to send Mr. Arar to a country notorious for torture; a deliberate attempt by American officials to deceive Canada about where Mr. Arar was; and lingering confusion among top American officials about the two countries' roles in the case.

President Bush earlier this month acknowledged for the first time that high-level people suspected of being terrorists had been held in secret prisons overseas by the Central Intelligence Agency. But he and other officials have said nothing publicly about the American practice of rendition, in which dozens of suspects have been seized and turned over for interrogation to other countries, including several known to engage routinely in torture.

Cases like that of Mr. Arar would not be affected by the compromise legislation on detainee treatment worked out between the White House and Republican senators last week, since it would have no effect on interrogation methods used by other countries. In fact, the proposed bill would strip non-Americans held overseas under United States control of the right to challenge their detention in federal court.

"It's a huge hole in what Congress is doing," said Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York, which represents Mr. Arar in his lawsuit. "The government can still send people secretly to other countries where they'll be tortured."

For nearly four years, the United States government has refused to make public any information on the case of Mr. Arar, which has become an international symbol of American excesses in the campaign against terrorism. The Bush administration refused to cooperate with the Canadian commission, so many questions about American actions and motives remain unanswered.

But Mr. Arar's case is more public than other cases of rendition, because he was detained inside the United States and legally deported, creating a modest paper trail. The three-volume report describes Canadian contacts with American officials in meticulous detail, offering by far the fullest account of any rendition case to date.

The commission's report says inexperienced Canadian police officials originally passed inaccurate information to the United States linking Mr. Arar to terrorism, based largely on his acquaintance with other men under suspicion.

But in the days after Sept. 26, 2002, when Mr. Arar was detained while changing planes at Kennedy International Airport in New York City, a flurry of calls and faxes between the countries included more equivocal information.

DOJ_NMG_0068584

An Oct. 4 fax to the F.B.I. from Canadian counterterrorism officials said that they "had yet to complete either a detailed investigation of Mr. Arar or a link analysis on him," and that "while he has had contact with many individuals of interest to this project we are unable to indicate links to Al Qaeda."

That was particularly significant because the commission concludes that all, or virtually all, of the United States' knowledge of any threat posed by Mr. Arar came from the Canadians.

The next day, on Saturday, Oct. 5, a Royal Canadian Mounted Police official spoke by phone with an unidentified F.B.I. official. "During this conversation, the FBI official said that the Americans feared they did not have sufficient information to support charges against Mr. Arar," the report says.

The Canadian officer said that likewise, "There was insufficient evidence to charge Mr. Arar in Canada."

Canadian officials told the Americans that if they allowed Mr. Arar to travel home to Canada, he would be kept under surveillance. But by then the Americans were already secretly working on the Syrian option, a legal possibility because Mr. Arar retained his citizenship in Syria, where he was born.

"The American authorities appear to have intentionally kept Canadian officials in the dark about their plans to remove Mr. Arar to Syria," the report says.

Despite the uncertain report from Canada on Mr. Arar and terrorism, on Oct. 7, an Immigration and Naturalization Service official ruled that evidence "clearly and unequivocally reflects that Mr. Arar is a member of a foreign terrorist organization, to wit, Al Qaeda." At 4 a.m. the next day, Mr. Arar was bundled aboard a Gulfstream jet that flew him to Jordan, from which he was driven to a prison in neighboring Syria.

Paul J. J. Cavalluzzo, lead counsel to the Arar Commission, said he found the American actions inconsistent. "On Saturday," Mr. Cavalluzzo said, "you have the F.B.I. saying, 'We don't have enough to charge him.' On Monday, he's a member of Al Qaeda. Well, if he's a member of Al Qaeda, in your country he can be charged."

Even after Mr. Arar arrived in Syria, American officials did not tell their Canadian counterparts. Only two weeks later, on Oct. 21, did Canada get confirmation, when a Syrian military intelligence officer phoned the Canadian ambassador in Damascus to say he was in custody.

Mr. Arar spent 10 months in the custody of Syrian interrogators who beat him repeatedly with a heavy metal cable and held him in a dank cell scarcely larger than a coffin, according to the commission report. In October 2003, he was released and returned to his wife and children in Canada.

But some top American officials appear to have been misinformed about the deportation decision. After Jean Chrétien, then Canadian prime minister, said publicly that the United States had decided unilaterally to send Mr. Arar to Syria, the Canadian ambassador was summoned to the National Security Council and scolded by Frances Townsend, the deputy national security adviser, who said it had been a "joint decision," the report says.

Colin L. Powell, then the secretary of state, had also suggested publicly that the Canadians were complicit in the Syria deportation. But on Dec. 1, 2003, Mr. Powell called Bill Graham, the Canadian foreign minister, to say the United States had not consulted Canada about the decision.

"I was mistaken," Mr. Powell told Mr. Graham, the report says.

The Canadian judge who led the inquiry, Dennis R. O'Connor, urged a formal protest over the American conduct. Peter MacKay, the Canadian foreign affairs minister, said Thursday it was too early to decide on a protest but added that there was an "urgent need" for talks on the issues raised by the case.

A State Department spokeswoman, Janelle Hironimus, said Friday that she knew of no plans for such talks. She said the Bush administration had declined to cooperate with the Arar Commission because its "mandate was to investigate and report on the actions of Canadian officials, and Canadian authorities were therefore the most appropriate entities to respond."

A spokeswoman for the Department of Justice, Tasia Scolinos, said that she could not respond in detail to the commission's findings but that the United States government "removed Mr. Arar in full compliance with the law and all applicable international treaties and conventions." She also said the government "sought assurances with respect to Mr. Arar's treatment" in Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0068585

Mr. Cavalluzzo, the commission counsel, noted that the report held Canadian officials accountable for many lapses. But in an interview on Friday from Toronto, he said he remained "troubled" by American actions, chiefly the decision to turn Mr. Arar over to a government whose promises not to torture him had no credibility.

"Even at this time, when terrorism is a real danger," he said, "this case points out how important it is to preserve the democratic rights we have cherished for centuries."

CIA: Probe Into Renditions (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, September 25, 2006

As many as 20 CIA officials and contractors could face legal charges in Germany for their alleged role in the abduction of Khaled el-Masri, a German national once wrongly suspected of involvement with 9/11 conspirators, German officials say. Amid new disclosures last week by a German TV show, a Munich prosecutor confirmed to NEWSWEEK that he is conducting a probe into the people who carried out the abduction—an inquiry that could soon lead to arrest warrants.

The el-Masri case underscores continuing legal threats facing CIA officials overseas despite last week's deal on a bill that would authorize the agency to continue using aggressive interrogation techniques. The White House says the measure is needed to provide legal protection for CIA officials accused of violating the Geneva Conventions. But the bill may do little to protect officers involved in "extraordinary renditions"—a practice under which the agency has flown terror suspects to foreign countries where they have allegedly been harshly interrogated.

El-Masri is among the highest profile of these episodes. He claims he was kidnapped and flown to Afghanistan in 2004 by masked men with American accents. He says he was beaten and confined in a cold cell for four months before being released. A former top German counterterror official, who asked not to be named due to the sensitivity of the matter, told NEWSWEEK his detention was a case of mistaken identity, a "stupid mistake." Tensions escalated last week when the German TV show "Panorama" broadcast a report saying it discovered the true identities of CIA officers involved in the operation. The program aired records showing the officials had massages at a Majorca hotel after the alleged abduction. The former German official said local prosecutors now have little choice but to issue arrest warrants—just as Italian prosecutors have done in a separate rendition case. The cases have created anxiety in CIA ranks; officials hope the administration will quietly persuade foreign governments to drop any prosecutions. Asked about the el-Masri allegations last week, a CIA official declined to comment.

Inquiry Slows Giving To Islamic Charity (AP-Y)

By Sarah Karush

AP, September 25, 2006

Before last week, AbuSayed Mahfuz didn't hesitate to donate to Life for Relief and Development, an international Muslim humanitarian organization that is active in Iraq and Afghanistan and has partnered with the U.S. government.

But an FBI search of the organization's Southfield headquarters is making the Hamtramck resident think twice about future contributions.

Just as the holy month Ramadan, which began Saturday, has many Muslims thinking about their religious obligation to give alms, the investigation of the prominent Islamic aid group has prompted fears that giving to charity could bring scrutiny from the government.

FBI agents assigned to a terrorism task force last Monday searched Life's offices, taking computer servers, donor records and other financial documents. They have also searched the homes of the charity's chief executive, an ex-employee and two board members.

"After hearing this, I don't feel secure at all," said Mahfuz, a computer consultant and editor of a Bangladeshi community newspaper. He said he would still consider supporting the organization, but the investigation would force him to weigh that decision carefully.

No charges have been brought in the case, and Life has sought to reassure the community that it is perfectly legal to donate money to the organization, which was founded in 1992 by Iraqi immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0068586

It is not the first time a Muslim charity has come under investigation. In the months after the Sept. 11 attacks, the government froze the assets of the Texas-based Holy Land Foundation and Illinois-based Global Relief Foundation and Benevolence International, effectively shutting them down. The government has accused those groups of funding terrorists.

The search at Life's offices five days before the start of Ramadan, the month when Life gets about half of its donations, prompted anger among Muslim activists in the Detroit area. They questioned the timing and the involvement of the terrorism task force, which they said led media to draw unfair conclusions.

On Wednesday, Arab-American and Muslim leaders vented that anger at a previously scheduled meeting with federal and local law enforcement officials in Dearborn — home to the nation's largest concentration of Arab-Americans, many of whom are Muslim — as part of a dialogue that began after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Daniel Roberts, special agent in charge of the FBI's Detroit field office, said he could not comment on the case because the matter is sealed. But he said agents were acutely aware of the approaching holy month and would have preferred to conduct the search earlier.

"I would just ask that you give the government the benefit of the doubt," he said at the meeting.

Roberts declined a request by some in attendance to issue a statement reassuring Muslims that they could still donate to the organization.

Khalil Jassemm, the charity's chief executive, said FBI agents focused on three things: possible sanctions violations stemming from the group's work in Iraq before the overthrow of Saddam Hussein, improper involvement in Iraqi politics and use of funds for purposes other than those designated by donors.

Though he would not comment on the case directly, Roberts said cases that the terrorism task force gets involved in do not always end with terrorism-related charges being filed. In some instances, the government continues to believe terrorism is involved, but cannot prove it, he said.

Ihsan Alkhatib, Life's legal director, said the FBI has told the charity it can continue operating, at least for now. He said investigators returned two computer servers and have promised to return the remaining four in the coming days.

Alkhatib said the government scrutiny is ironic given that some Muslims criticize Life for perceived coziness with the U.S. and Israeli governments.

Life partnered with the Pentagon to distribute wheelchairs in Afghanistan in 2004 and opened an office in Israel to coordinate its efforts in the Palestinian territories, an unusual step for a Muslim group. But those actions don't indicate support for any particular government and were simply efficient ways to help those in need, Alkhatib said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chemical-Security Legislation Nears Approval (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- After years of stalemate, Congress is poised to give the Homeland Security Department power to regulate and even shut down high-risk chemical plants that fail to comply with antiterrorism standards.

The industry won major concessions in the final bargaining, and Democrats accused Republicans of a "backroom" pre-election deal favoring the majority's business contributors. But House-Senate negotiators, meeting Monday evening, are expected to approve the legislation as part of a $34.8 billion homeland security bill slated to go quickly to President Bush.

Eager to go home at the end of the week to campaign for midterm elections, Congress also will approve a larger companion bill, providing $447 billion for defense and intelligence agencies in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. Meanwhile, most domestic departments will be subject to a stopgap funding resolution until after the elections. And despite pressure from manufacturers, Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) said he expects no further House action before November on a set of expired tax benefits, including the research tax credit for businesses.

The chemical-security legislation mirrors an agreement reached last week between Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine), who chairs the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee, and her House counterpart, Homeland Security

DOJ_NMG_0068587

Chairman Peter King (R., N.Y.). Aides to House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton, an industry ally, said the Texas Republican will support the measure. However unhappy with elements of the deal, key Democrats look reluctant to kill what is still a first step toward their goal of addressing chemical-security hazards.

"I have mixed emotions, but it's clearly better than nothing," said Rep. Martin Sabo (D., Minn.), who has taken the lead in the Appropriations Committees in pressing for action on chemical-plant security.

Jack Gerard, president of the American Chemistry Council, the industry trade group, struck a similar tone. "It's not perfect, but under the circumstances it's acceptable and we need to move the ball forward. In the current political environment, we have to quit talking about it and get something done."

The draft legislation would require Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to issue regulations within six months of establishing risk-based performance standards for the security of facilities such as factories where potentially dangerous chemicals are made or used. The secretary may apply these rules to any plant he judges presents "high levels of security risk." If he later determines that a facility has failed to comply, he may, after an opportunity for consultation, order operations to cease until brought into compliance.

Reflecting divisions among lawmakers, this authority would run only three years, allowing Congress to revisit the issue. And the chemicals industry failed to win a clear federal pre-emption of state regulations, which in some cases like New Jersey already are stricter than what Washington may require.

But major concessions were made on several points. For example, the bill goes to great lengths to protect data provided to the government by chemical companies, even treating it as "classified material." And only the secretary may bring civil litigation to enforce the regulations.

The industry also won protection from being forced to change specific chemical processes or adopt potentially costly alternative technologies as long as security goals are met.

House Democrats led by Rep. Edward Markey (D., Mass) said the phrasing renders Mr. Chertoff "toothless." Mr. Gerard accused critics of often pursuing an environmental agenda unrelated to security standards. "They want to take chemicals out of the chemistry industry," he said.

The underlying homeland budget bill includes $1.82 billion in emergency funds to beef up border security and appease conservatives, angry with the Republican leadership over the course of the immigration debate this year. The defense bill is even heavier with emergency funds: $70 billion for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and including almost $23 billion to begin to rebuild Army and Marine units worn down by the overseas conflicts.

Working through the weekend, House Republicans were confident of resolving any differences with the Senate over compromise language governing the rules of evidence for military tribunals to try foreign combatants in the war against terror. Given time pressures, it is less likely that the House and Senate can reconcile differences over a terrorist-surveillance bill expanding the administration's authority to carry out warrantless wiretaps.

Chemical Plants, Still Unprotected (NYT)

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

Congress still has done nothing to protect Americans from a terrorist attack on chemical plants. Republican leaders want to give the impression that that has changed. But voters should not fall for the spin. If the leadership goes through with the strategy it seems to have adopted last week to secure these highly vulnerable targets, national security will be the loser.

The federal government is spending extraordinary amounts of money and time protecting air travel from terrorist attacks. But Congress has not yet passed a law to secure the nation's chemical plants, even though an attack on just one plant could kill or injure as many as 100,000 people. The sticking point has been the chemical industry, a heavy contributor to political campaigns, which does not want to pay the cost of reasonable safety measures.

The Senate and the House spent many months carefully developing bipartisan chemical plant security bills. Both measures were far too weak, but they would have finally imposed real safety requirements on the chemical industry. The Republican leadership in Congress blocked both bills from moving forward. Instead, whatever gets done about chemical plant security will apparently be decided behind closed doors, and inserted as a rider to a Department of Homeland Security appropriations bill.

DOJ_NMG_0068588

It is outrageous that something as important as chemical plant security is being decided in a back-room deal. It is regrettable that Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, the chairwoman of the committee that produced the Senate bill, does not carry enough influence with her own party's leadership to get a strong chemical plant security bill passed. The deal itself, the likely details of which have emerged in recent days, is a near-complete cave-in to industry, and yet more proof that when it comes to a choice between homeland security and the desires of corporate America, the Republican leadership always goes with big business.

Any federal chemical plant law should make it clear that states have the right to impose stricter requirements to protect their citizens from harm. The Senate and House bills said this, but the rider apparently will not. A reasonable law would make it clear that the secretary of homeland security can order chemical plants to adopt specific safety measures, like replacing highly dangerous chemicals with ones that pose less of a danger to people in the surrounding area. The House bill did this, but the rider apparently will not give the secretary this basic power.

It is likely that the backroom deal will also exempt water treatment and drinking water facilities from regulation, meaning that millions of Americans could needlessly be put at risk of an attack on a chlorine tank, and that it will make the rules about when and how chemical plants must submit safety plans hopelessly vague.

It is not too late to abandon this bad deal and pass a strong law. In a recent New York Times/CBS News poll, just 25 percent of those asked approved of the job Congress is doing. Its handling of the chemical plant security issue gives a good indication why.

TSA To Lower Registered Traveler Fee (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Transportation Security Administration is backing off its plan to require travelers who want a fast trip through airport security to pay nearly $200 a year.

The move comes days after representatives of companies seeking contracts to manage special security lines made their case for lower fees to TSA chief Kip Hawley at his offices in Arlington, Va.

The companies said a $200 annual charge could deter millions of people and some airports from signing up for the Registered Traveler program, which could begin in several airports this year.

In response, the TSA lowered to $30 from $100 the fee it plans to charge each person it approves to use Registered Traveler security lines. Travelers would pay an additional $80 or so a year to companies that enroll them, produce fingerprint-embedded ID cards and manage the lines at airports.

The total annual cost is now estimated at about $110. It could be $20 higher if the TSA requires a criminal background check in addition to the terrorism assessment it now plans for each Registered Traveler applicant.

TSA lowered the fee "based on further analysis and public feedback," spokeswoman Yolanda Clark said.

Tom Blank, head of a coalition of companies seeking to provide services for the Registered Traveler program, said the reduction opens the door to launching the program in 30 to 45 days.

"It should move very quickly," said Blank, a former top TSA official.

About 20 airports and airlines have applied to start Registered Traveler programs.

A company run by Court TV founder Steven Brill has started doing preliminary online registration for programs it wants to start at airports in Cincinnati, Indianapolis and San Jose, Calif., and at Terminal 7 at New York's Kennedy International Airport.

The TSA has not approved any airport to start the Registered Traveler program other than a pilot program at Orlando International Airport, in effect since July 2005.

Brill said it "really wasn't difficult to convince" the TSA to lower its fee during a meeting Wednesday with TSA chief Hawley that Brill said ran two hours. The TSA had wanted to charge $70 for personnel costs at Registered Traveler lines. Brill and others argued against any labor charge, saying Registered Traveler would not require any additional screeners.

DOJ_NMG_0068589

"It makes a big difference," Brill said of the lower fee.

The TSA says people in Registered Traveler lines will see no change in how they are screened unless airports add new security measures.

For example, Brill's company is testing machines that could scan shoes while people are wearing them and use a fingerprint sample to determine if they've had contact with explosives.

TSA Backtracks, Projects $30 Fee For Airport Pass (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal officials are backtracking on a plan to charge travelers $100 a year to take part in an expedited airport security screening program.

The Transportation Security Administration now projects that it will charge $30 a year for each person who wants to participate in the "registered traveler" program, the TSA said in a notice on its Web site over the weekend. That is in addition to any fees that private companies operating the programs charge.

Registered Traveler promises faster airport screening to customers who sign up in advance, undergo a background check and pay a fee. It is expected to be offered at about 20 interested airports and run by private companies under guidance issued by the TSA. One program, in Orlando, Fla., is operating.

Participants will get to use special security lines that may move more quickly than regular lines. At some point, TSA may approve technology that would allow for changes in screening procedures; for instance, use of an electronic shoe scanner could let travelers keep their shoes on. These technologies are being tested, with none approved yet.

TSA had created a stir by saying it would charge about $100, including background checks, administrative costs and the cost of paying screeners who run the special lines. Private companies interested in offering the program protested: They had expected to charge about $100 total, including their costs and profits. These companies argued that registered travelers shouldn't have to pay salaries of officers who would be screening them anyway.

On its Web site this weekend, TSA said it wouldn't seek reimbursement for these costs unless the program results in new TSA duties and increased costs.

TSA spokeswoman Amy Kudwa said the change was made "based on further analysis and public feedback."

That feedback included a meeting Wednesday between TSA chief Kip Hawley and the companies that want to provide the program at airports, who pressed TSA to roll back the fee, said Steven Brill, chief executive at Verified Identity Pass Inc., which has begun advanced registration of passengers in four airports. He said "a couple of thousand" people have signed up so far.

FBI Is Casting A Wider Net In Anthrax Attacks (WP)

By Allan Lengel And Joby Warrick

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Five years after the anthrax attacks that killed five people, the FBI is now convinced that the lethal powder sent to the Senate was far less sophisticated than originally believed, widening the pool of possible suspects in a frustratingly slow investigation.

The finding, which resulted from countless scientific tests at numerous laboratories, appears to undermine the widely held belief that the attack was carried out by a government scientist or someone with access to a U.S. biodefense lab.

What was initially described as a near-military-grade biological weapon was ultimately found to have had a more ordinary pedigree, containing no additives and no signs of special processing to make the anthrax bacteria more deadly, law enforcement officials confirmed. In addition, the strain of anthrax used in the attacks has turned out to be more common than was initially believed, the officials said.

As a result, after a very public focus on government scientists as the likely source of the attacks, the FBI is today casting a far wider net, as investigators face the daunting prospect of an almost endless list of possible suspects in scores of countries around the globe.

"There is no significant signature in the powder that points to a domestic source," said one scientist who has extensively studied the tan, talc-like material that paralyzed much of Washington in the deadliest bioterrorism attack in U.S. history.

DOJ_NMG_0068590

The FBI says it remains optimistic that it will find whoever killed five people -- two of them from the Washington area -- in a series of bioterrorism-by-mail attacks that rocked a nation still in shock from the Sept. 11 terrorist strikes. The bureau has assigned fresh leadership to the case -- Special Agent Ed Montooth -- and retains a full-time investigative force of 17 agents and 10 postal inspectors. "There is confidence the case will be solved," said Joseph Persichini Jr., acting assistant director in charge of the FBI's Washington field office.

The prevailing views about the anthrax powder, meanwhile, have been coalescing among a small group of scientists and FBI officials over several years but rarely have been discussed publicly. In interviews and a recently published scientific article, law enforcement authorities have acknowledged that much of the conventional wisdom about the attacks turned out to be wrong.

Specifically, law enforcement authorities have refuted the widely reported claim that the anthrax spores had been "weaponized" -- specially treated or processed to allow them to disperse more easily. They also have rejected reports that the powder was milled, or ground, to create finer particles that can penetrate deeply into the lungs. Such processing or additives might have suggested that the maker had access to the recipes of biological weapons made by the United States in the 1950s and 1960s.

In fact, the anthrax powder used in the 2001 attacks had no additives, writes Douglas J. Beecher, a scientist in the FBI laboratory's Hazardous Materials Response Unit, in an article in the science journal Applied and Environmental Microbiology.

"A widely circulated misconception is that the spores were produced using additives and sophisticated engineering supposedly akin to military weapons production," Beecher writes in the journal's August edition, in what is believed to be the most expansive public comment on the nature of the powder by any FBI official. "The idea is usually the basis for implying that the powders were inordinately dangerous compared to spores alone."

The FBI would not allow Beecher to be interviewed about his article. But other scientists familiar with the forensic investigation echoed his description. Whoever made the powder produced a deadly project of exceptional purity and quality -- up to a trillion spores per gram -- but used none of the tricks known to military bioweapons scientists to increase the lethality of the product. Officials stressed that the terrorist would have had to have considerable skills in microbiology and access to equipment.

"It wasn't weaponized. It was just nicely cleaned up," said one knowledgeable scientist who spoke on the condition he not be identified by name because the investigation is continuing. "Whoever did it was proud of their biology. They grew the spores, spun them down, cleaned up the debris. But there were no additives."

Moreover, scientists say, the particular strain of anthrax used in the attacks has turned to out to be a less significant clue than first believed. The highly virulent Ames strain was first isolated in the United States and was the basis for the anthrax weapons formerly created by the United States. The use of the Ames strain in the 2001 attack was initially seen as a strong clue linking the terrorist to the U.S. biodefense network.

But the more the FBI investigated, the more ubiquitous the Ames strain seemed, appearing in labs around the world including nations of the former Soviet Union.

"Ames was available in the Soviet Union," said former Soviet bioweapons scientist Sergei Popov, now a biodefense expert at George Mason University. "It could have come from anywhere in the world."

Many law enforcement officials believe that ever-improving technology eventually could lead to a break in the case. Ongoing tests could lead authorities to the lab where the anthrax originated -- something authorities have said for years could help close the case.

More traditional tactics are still being used: The FBI has conducted 9,100 interviews and issued 6,000 subpoenas in one of the most exhaustive and expensive investigations in the bureau's history. Authorities say investigators continue to have a number of specific individuals in their sights, describing the suspect list as "fluid."

One prevailing theory among investigators is that the attacks came from within the United States rather than from an overseas terrorist organization.

However, a law enforcement official said, "we have not closed the door on any possibilities. There's a discrete number of individuals who continue to be investigated, both internationally and domestically."

DOJ_NMG_0068591

Over the years, officials have publicly identified only one "person of interest," and that was more than four years ago. Steven J. Hatfill, a former Army scientist, has denied wrongdoing and has never been charged. He is suing the Justice Department, alleging that officials leaked false information about him that caused great harm.

Law enforcement officials won't talk about Hatfill.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, in a meeting this month with Washington Post reporters and editors, would not say whether any single individual continues to draw special attention as a "person of interest."

"I'm not telling you that right now the bureau is focused on someone or not focused on someone," Chertoff said. "There are in my experience a lot of instances where we might know or have a good reason to believe who committed a criminal act, but we may not be able to prove it. So when you say something is not solved, you should not assume from the fact that there is no criminal prosecution we don't have a good idea of what we think happened."

Persichini, of the FBI's Washington office, acknowledged frustrations but said that "no one in the FBI has for a moment stopped thinking about the innocent victims of these attacks, nor has the effort to solve this case in any way been slowed.

"While not well known to the public, the scientific advances gained from this investigation are unprecedented and have greatly strengthened the government's ability to prepare for -- and prevent -- biological attacks in the future," Persichini said.

Nonetheless, failure to solve the mystery has bred public skepticism.

"If the FBI's investigation has become a cold case, then it's time for [FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III] to acknowledge that and take steps to deal with it," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), a frequent critic of the FBI. "I'm concerned that the FBI may have spent too much time focusing [on] one theory of what happened and too little effort on the other possibilities."

Staff writer Spencer S. Hsu and staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

A Year Later, Rita's Wrath Lingers (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, September 25, 2006

CAMERON, La. — Some recall Hurricane Rita as the storm that just missed Houston. Others vaguely remember it as the one that came after Katrina.

The widespread anonymity of Rita has somehow reached the point where people along the Texas-Louisiana border — the ones whose towns and crops and neighbors were annihilated by Rita's 120-mph winds and 20-foot storm surge — have given Rita a new name: the Forgotten Hurricane.

“Nobody says anything about Rita. It's all Katrina, Katrina, Katrina,” said Paul Martin, 47, whose home in southwestern Louisiana was washed away along with the other 35 homes in his neighborhood. “Hey, we lost everything too.”

It was one year ago Sunday that Rita roared into the Texas-Louisiana border and devastated a swampy, brackish area dotted by wooden houses built long before hurricane building codes existed. About 100 people died either during the storm or trying to escape from it — including 23 seniors who died in a bus blaze during the chaotic evacuation of Houston.

Although Katrina cost more in lives and damage, Rita swamped a broad area. More than 600,000 homes across 85,000 square miles were damaged or destroyed, the Federal Emergency Management Agency estimates.

Rita forced what could be the largest evacuation in U.S. history. Three million people fled in two states. Only Hurricane Floyd, which struck near Cape Fear, N.C., in 1999, comes close with an estimated evacuation of about the same number of people.

And while Katrina's $40 billion price tag is the largest for any hurricane hitting the USA, Rita ranked as the seventh-costliest storm, according to the Insurance Information Institute. Damage estimates for Rita from the institute are over $5 billion.

The area hit by Rita is dotted with shoreline communities that depend on shrimping and fishing in the Gulf of Mexico.

“Venice still looks like a giant trash pile. Only the courthouse is still standing in Cameron,” Debra Segura, a central Louisiana truck driver, said. “Holly Beach is wiped out. Delcambre is ruined.”

Many of the hard-hit areas are on a slow track to recovery. People in those areas believe the storm's timing — hitting just four weeks after Katrina — is a big reason why that recovery has taken so long.

DOJ_NMG_0068592

Shelters and apartments around Houston and southwestern Louisiana were already filled by Katrina evacuees, leaving few residents there to find temporary housing of their own. FEMA and insurance companies were already deluged with Katrina-related cases when Rita hit.

Martin said FEMA officials told him in January he would get a trailer in seven to 10 days.

"How about seven to 10 months?" he said. Martin received his trailer nine days ago, after spending the past year in a friend's apartment.

Louis Arceneaux, a Lake Charles, La., high school chemistry teacher, said the damage to his home was about $10,000. He had no flood insurance, and he moved in with his mother after the storm so he did not receive housing money.

"Rita broke me," he said. "I can't afford to teach anymore."

Insurance companies acknowledge that the two hurricanes put a strain on the insurance adjusters who were working long hours in harsh conditions — many of them who were helping Katrina transplants had to evacuate when Rita came ashore.

Even so, they point back to the summer of 2004, when Florida was hit by four hurricanes, as proof that they've learned to react to multiple storms in short periods.

Robert Hartwig, chief economist for the Insurance Information Institute, said 95% of Katrina-related insurance claims are settled. He said that number is "as high if not higher" for Rita.

FEMA says it has provided more than 15,000 travel trailers and given housing assistance to more than 450,000 people.

The Small Business Administration has granted more than $500 million in loans, the National Flood Insurance Program has given out more than $370 million in Louisiana, and FEMA has provided $360 million for cleanup in Texas.

What Rita may be remembered for most is the evacuation. As it swelled to a Category 5 with a predicted path over Galveston and Houston more than 3 million people hit the roads almost simultaneously.

People were stopped in traffic for hours. Many ran out of gas waiting to get out. Some just returned home.

Joe Laud with the Houston Office of Emergency Management, whose wife and kids couldn't get out of Houston, said evacuating a major city is difficult. He conceded that government agencies along the evacuation routes need to work better to ease that traffic.

"Rita showed the dents in our armor," he said.

Laud said they've had several exercises to get traffic lanes moving away from Houston faster. Government officials are working with gas stations to ensure that some remain open during an evacuation. A task force created by Texas Gov. Rick Perry suggested consolidating more power into his office for better statewide coordination.

So far, the calm hurricane season has allowed residents along the Gulf Coast to focus instead on the task of rebuilding.

Richard and Nancy Burbank are the first Constance Beach family to rebuild their home, a lone structure surrounded by 20-foot wooden silts that once propped up dozens of homes.

"If you live on the coast and you don't think hurricanes are going to hit you, you're stupid," Nancy Burbank said. "When I came back, I accepted what I saw and immediately wanted to rebuild."

For others, the decision isn't so simple.

Paul England, a welder at a Port Arthur, Texas, oil refinery who skins alligators on weekends, decided not to rebuild and to move 20 miles inland.

"I won't move back down here," England said. "Rita scared the hell out of a lot of people."

WAR NEWS:

For Bush, War Anguish Expressed Privately (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

FALMOUTH, Maine -- They sat on two frayed chairs in a teacher's lounge, the president and the widow, just the two of them so close that their knees were almost touching.

DOJ_NMG_0068593

She was talking about her husband, the soldier who died in a far-off war zone. Tears rolled down her face as she mentioned two children left fatherless. His eyes welled up, too. He hugged her, held her face, kissed her cheek. "I am so sorry for your loss," he kept repeating.

She told him she considers him responsible for her husband's death and begged him to bring home the troops. "It's time to put our pride behind us and stop the bleeding, for all of us," she recalled saying. The president demurred, unwilling to debate a mourning woman. "We see things differently," he said.

But Hildi Halley, a self-described liberal antiwar activist who met with President Bush in Maine last month, said she believes he felt her grief. "It wasn't just a crocodile tear," she said in an interview at her home. "I felt like I moved him. I don't think he's going to wake up tomorrow and say, 'Oh my gosh, I've been wrong this whole time and I'm going to change all my policies because of my meeting with this woman.' I just hope that with each soldier, he remembers my pain."

He has a lot of pain to remember. Now more than five years after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Bush has served as a wartime president longer than any occupant of the White House since Lyndon B. Johnson. He has presided over more U.S. military casualties than any since Richard M. Nixon. While he travels the country defending his policy and arguing to stay the course in Iraq, he also confronts the human burdens of wartime leadership.

The two sides of Bush as commander in chief can be hard to reconcile. His public persona gives little sense that he dwells on the costs of war. He does not seem to agonize as Johnson did, or even as his father, George H.W. Bush, did before the Persian Gulf War. While he pays tribute to those who have fallen, the president strives to show resolve and avoid displays that might be seen as weak or doubting. His refusal to attend military funerals, while taking long Texas vacations and extended bicycle rides, strikes some critics as callous indifference.

Yet the private Bush comes across differently in the accounts of aides, friends, relatives and military family members who have met with him, including some who do not support him, such as Halley. The first question Bush usually asks national security briefers in the Oval Office each morning is about overnight casualties, aides say, and those who show up for the next round of meetings often find him still stewing about bad news from Iraq.

Bush seems to separate these aspects of war in his mind, advisers say. He expresses no regret even in private for his decision to invade Iraq, they say, while taking seriously the continuing consequences of doing so. "Removing Saddam, he never revisits that in his mind or his heart," said one adviser, who like others spoke on the condition of anonymity because Bush does not want them to discuss his feelings. "Sending troops into harm's way, that's something that weighs on him."

If he does not show that publicly, it's in keeping with a White House practice of not drawing attention to the mounting costs of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, which have killed more than 3,000 U.S. troops and tens of thousands of civilians. Advisers worry that sending the wrong signal would further sap public will and embolden the enemy and Bush's critics. Aides say that Bush does not attend military funerals because the presidential entourage would disrupt solemn events and that, out of respect, the media have been banned from photographing coffins arriving at Dover Air Force Base. But they also know it would draw unwelcome attention to the price of the president's policies.

Bush is less reticent about public displays of grief for victims of Sept. 11. During the recent events marking the fifth anniversary of the attacks, he teared up several times and at one point had to concentrate just to finish a speech. "Your heart breaks for somebody who suffered," he later told Charles Gibson of ABC News. "Tears can get contagious as far as I'm concerned."

For those who have suffered losses in the wars he initiated, Bush prefers to offer comfort in private. He writes letters to families of those killed, visits soldiers at military hospitals and meets with relatives of the dead. Altogether, according to the White House, Bush has met with 1,149 relatives of 336 dead service members. These sessions generate little attention because the White House bars journalists, but some relatives have described them.

"It's absolutely painful for him," said Beth Karlson, 63, a retired school food-service manager whose son died in Iraq and who met with Bush in Wisconsin last month. The president hugged her and held her hand. "He's a genuine person. He wants to reach out to the families and let them know how he feels."

Not everyone agrees. Cindy Sheehan, who would later launch antiwar protests near Bush's Texas ranch, met with him in 2004 and left alienated. She said he came across as overly casual and immune to her pain, referring to her as "Mom," yet uninterested in stories about her dead son, Casey, and calling him "your loved one" instead of by name. When she later sought another meeting, Bush refused.

DOJ_NMG_0068594

Said Missy Beattie, a fellow member of Gold Star Families for Peace whose nephew died in Iraq: "He only meets with people who support him. I don't know what I'd say to him. I almost feel like he's not worthy of time and thought because I don't think he cares. I don't think he has any human qualities. I don't think he would listen to me or anyone who's lost someone and feel any empathy."

Many presidents confront the burden of ordering troops into danger. Johnson was tormented by the Vietnam War, padding down to his war room in slippers and robe at night to check on casualty numbers. Taped telephone calls, published by historian Michael Beschloss, reveal the depth of anguish. "I want to be called every time somebody dies," Johnson declared. He took to bed, depressed. Aides consulted psychiatrists. "He suffered," biographer Robert Dallek said. "It certainly took a toll on him. You could see it in his face at the end of his term. He was so old and careworn."

George H.W. Bush wrote an angst-ridden letter to his children before the Gulf War: "I guess what I want you to know as a father is this: Every Human life is precious. When the question is asked 'How many lives are you willing to sacrifice' -- it tears at my heart. The answer, of course, is none -- none at all." He did not sleep well before the bombing began and prayed that an Iraqi child shown on television would not be hit. "There's no way to describe the pressure," he said in a diary entry, later published in a volume of personal correspondence. "I've been plagued with the image of body bags."

Warren Finch, director of the George Bush Presidential Library and Museum, said the former president's service as a pilot shot down over the Pacific shaped his outlook. "The fact that he had served in World War II and lost two crewmen meant he experienced it firsthand. That weighed heavily on him."

His son never served in combat and gives no public indication that he anguishes like his father. White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president, like his predecessors, "lies awake nights asking himself the question: How can I get this done and get our people home?" But Bush controls his feelings around associates. "He keeps a lot of that very, very locked up inside himself," said a longtime friend. "I don't raise it with him. I just don't feel comfortable doing that."

Bush is more open with confidants about his aggravation over events in Iraq. "He's unbelievably candid in person," said another person close to the president. "Of course it frustrates him. You can't not be frustrated by four car bombs a day and that sort of thing. But I think he's confident it's going to work out. I think he also thinks there's not much of an alternative." Does the president confide much in his father? "Nobody knows," the person said. "It's a steel wall."

Bush deals with stress through vigorous exercise, working out six days a week. When he goes for long bicycle rides, he often invites others to join him, but he asks them not to ride in front of him so he can have the illusion of solitude. "Riding helps clear my head, helps me deal with the stresses of the job," he told reporters last month after an 80-minute ride.

To those angry over the war, that can seem cavalier. "It's important for me to be thoughtful and sensitive to those who have got something to say," Bush said last year when Sheehan began her protest. "But it's also important for me to go on with my life, to keep a balanced life. . . . I'm mindful of what goes on around me. On the other hand, I'm also mindful that I've got a life to live and will do so."

Aides see the impact on Bush after meetings with "families of the fallen," as the White House calls them. Bush typically meets each family separately, joined by one aide, often Deputy Chief of Staff Joseph W. Hagin. He offers commemorative coins, poses for photos or signs autographs. "I do the best I can to cry with them or, you know, laugh with them if they wanna laugh, and hug them," Bush recently told Katie Couric of CBS News.

Karlson, whose son, Staff Sgt. Warren Hansen, died in a helicopter crash in Iraq in 2003, asked Bush for help in obtaining an investigative report. "I just felt I was being stonewalled, I wasn't getting anyplace," she recalled. "He said it will be taken care of. And it was. The next Wednesday, the report was hand-delivered." In the end, the report confirmed what she had been told about her son's death. "It has brought some peace," she said.

After such meetings, aides said, Bush often seems drained. During a trip to Fort Bragg, N.C., last year, he spent three hours with dozens of relatives of troops who were killed. One of them, Crystal Owen, asked him to wear a metal bracelet in honor of her dead husband. He put it on, then went to deliver a nationally televised address. With the widows still on his mind, Bush seemed flat as he began to speak, aides said, and at one point his eyes became watery.

DOJ_NMG_0068595

Halley, 41, lost her husband, National Guard Capt. Patrick Damon, also 41, in June in Afghanistan to what officially was ruled a heart attack. When Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) called to offer condolences and asked if she could do anything, Halley requested a telephone call from the president. Instead, when he came to Maine to visit his parents in Kennebunkport, the White House invited her to meet him at a school.

When Bush walked in, Halley told him about Patrick, how they had met at American University, moved to Maine and had a family. "After I spoke about my husband for quite some time, I said, 'And now he's dead. For what? Why? I've lost my soul mate.' " She asked her children, Mikayla, 14, and Jan-Christian, 12, to leave the room, then wept as she told Bush how hard life had become for them. "He started crying. I said, 'These two children do not like you and they have good reason for that. And I hold you responsible for the death of my husband.' "

Bush seemed surprised that she opposes even the war in Afghanistan and cited the Taliban. "And I said, 'Who put them in power?' And he got a little defensive and said, 'I'm really not here to discuss public policy with you.' And I said, 'That's probably wise, and I'm not here to talk about public policy, either.' "

Bush said he hoped their meeting helped her healing. "You know what would help my healing?" she recalled responding. "If you change your policies in the Mideast." Bush smiled, she said, but did not reply.

Halley said the meeting did not change either of their minds. She would still vote against him. But she said she appreciated that he opened himself up to her. "I don't think he's a heartless man," she said. "I think he's pulled in a lot of different directions by very intelligent people. . . . I don't think it's going to change his policies, but I hope it does make him think about it. I hope I'm in his dreams."

Army Considers More Combat Units For Iraq (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

The Army is studying whether to add more combat units to the rotation plan for Iraq and is considering accelerating the deployments for some brigades to meet a top commander's decision to keep more than 140,000 troops in the country through at least the spring of 2007, Pentagon officials say.

Rather than planning for a big drawdown of 30,000 Army soldiers and Marines this year to a level of 100,000, as field commanders had expected, the two services are now trying to figure out how to keep the equivalent of two extra divisions, or 40,000 troops, in Iraq.

Army Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the region, said last week he needed to maintain the higher-than-expected level because of increased sectarian violence in greater Baghdad between warring Sunni and Shi'ite Muslims.

The Army has met Gen. Abizaid's immediate need for more forces by delaying the departure of a Stryker armored vehicle brigade to Alaska and by calling in a fast-reaction brigade combat team from Kuwait. But a longer-term solution may require the Army to look at adding more units to the rotation mix.

"It may accelerate the pace of deployments, or it may mean looking at calling up additional units," said a Pentagon official who asked not to be named.

That option may become reality in November, when the Pentagon is expected to identify units that will go to Iraq next year. Currently, Army units deploy for about a year, then spend one year at their home base before going back to Iraq or Afghanistan. The Marine Corps, which patrols restive Anbar Province west of Baghdad, rotates two expeditionary forces every seven months.

The Army is facing more demand for troops at a time when military analysts say it is nearly stressed to the breaking point.

Non-deployed combat brigades are experiencing low readiness ratings due mostly to a lack of usable weapons and equipment. The wear and tear in Iraq is ruining M1A1 tanks, Bradley fighting vehicles, Humvee vehicles and other equipment at such a fast pace that the Army has neither the money nor the industrial base to replace them. A unit's functioning weapons systems are left in Iraq for use by replacement soldiers, leaving the stateside brigade well below the highest combat rating, according to Army officials and retired officers.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, Army chief of staff, this summer asked Congress for nearly $50 billion over three years to replace broken equipment in a process known as "resetting" the force.

DOJ_NMG_0068596

"We have inadequate Army and Marine Corps combat power to sustain this level of deployment," said retired Army Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey, a highly decorated Vietnam combatant who led the 24th Infantry Division in Desert Storm.

Gen. McCaffrey, who has traveled to Iraq in his role as a West Point professor, said the Army needs an immediate infusion of 80,000 new soldiers added to the active force of about 500,000.

"Not since World War II have we asked the Army and Marine Corps to operate at such a high intensity of deployments with such an under-resourced force," Gen. McCaffrey said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has rejected calls from Gen. McCaffrey and other retired generals to increase what is referred to as the authorized end strength approved by Congress each year. Instead, he opted for authorizing the Army a temporary increase of 482,000 to 512,000 active-duty soldiers.

Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon, said, "The Army has been planning rotation of forces through the year 2007 and is fully prepared to maintain the commitment to press the fight against the enemy while also giving the soldiers as much predictability on future missions as possible. We will meet any need the American public asks."

Gen. McCaffrey said he considers the ongoing battle for Baghdad a "tipping point" which would decide the war's outcome. He applauded Gen. Abizaid for upping the force level.

"It clarified the situation," he said. "Abizaid wants to win. Ambassador [Zalmay] Khalilzad wants to win. What they are saying is [Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's] government is in a fragile state ... I think what they are saying is we can't allow this to come apart on us."

'Iraq Is Not In Chaos' (WP)

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Last Wednesday, Newsweek-Washington Post's Lally Weymouth interviewed Iraqi President Jalal Talabani in New York. Excerpts:

Q. What happened in your meeting with President Bush?

A. We told him our progress in trade, the economy, training the army . . . and we asked him to provide the Iraqi army with the necessary arms for improving the capacity of the army. We also thanked him for his continuous support of Iraq. Don't forget, we were living under the worst kind of dictatorship.

What did the president say to you?

That he will continue to support the Iraqi people and will remain there until we ask him to leave.

Reportedly the U.S. government is losing faith in Prime Minister [Nouri al-]Maliki.

President Bush assured us that he will support the Maliki government. We assured him that all Iraqi political parties support Maliki. He has done many important things for Iraq. He has ordered all of the militias to stop their activities.

But they haven't stopped.

They are not operating as before.

When should the U.S. troops leave?

In seven provinces, the American army has withdrawn. The Iraqi army is replacing American forces in many cities. We hope that at the end of this year we will be able to control 12 provinces. We will remain in need of the American and coalition forces until we've trained our army and will be able to face terrorism and defeat it.

How long will that be?

I think within two years we will be able to train our army and have the capacity to face terrorism. . . . The presence of American forces -- even a symbolic one -- will frighten those who are trying to interfere in our affairs.

Are you talking about Iran?

Our prime minister just came back from Iran. He got good promises from Iran on security -- promises that they will never permit any kind of interference in the internal affairs of Iraq.

Do you believe that?

Our prime minister tells me he got real and serious promises. Let us see.

What do you think of the popular theory that Iraq should split into three parts?

DOJ_NMG_0068597

I don't think so. Iraq will not break up into three parts. Iraq will remain united -- we will have a united, federal Iraq. Kurds are struggling for the unity of Iraq -- Sunnis and Shiites, the same. There are differences among the Shiites and Sunnis which must be resolved, but not about the partition of Iraq.

So, while many here in the U.S. believe the war is a mess, you believe the opposite.

Iraq is not in chaos. There are many provinces that are calm -- where people live in prosperity. . . . I want to assure the American people that Iraqis are now enjoying democracy and human rights and are struggling to secure the country.

Would you welcome U.S. bases in Kurdistan?

Yes, they are welcome. Kurdistan wants the Americans to stay. In some places Sunnis want the Americans to stay -- Sunnis think the main danger is coming from Iran now. There is a change in the mind of the Sunnis. The Sunnis are for having good relations with America. The [Shiites] have started to think that.

Will the U.S. put bases in Kurdistan?

I think we will be in need of American forces for a long time -- even two military bases to prevent foreign interference. I don't ask to have 100,000 American soldiers -- 10,000 soldiers and two air bases would be enough. This will be [in] the interest of the Iraqi people and of peace in the Middle East.

U.S. Soldiers See Inept Output By Iraqi Troops (WT/AP)

By Antonio Castaneda

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The plan was simple: Iraqi troops would block escape routes while U.S. soldiers searched for weapons house by house. But the Iraqi troops didn't show up on time.

When they finally did appear, the Iraqis ignored U.S. orders and let dozens of cars -- including an ambulance full of armed militiamen -- pass through checkpoints in eastern Baghdad, American soldiers said in recent interviews.

It wasn't an isolated incident, they added.

U.S. commanders have hailed the performance of Iraqi troops in the crackdown on militias and insurgents in Baghdad. But some U.S. soldiers say the Iraqis serving alongside them are among the worst they've ever seen -- seeming more loyal to militias than the government.

Last week, for example, Sgt. 1st Class Eric Sheehan discovered that barriers and concertina wire that were supposed to bolster defensive positions had been dragged away -- again -- under the noses of nearby Iraqi soldiers.

I "suggest we fire these IAs and get them out of the way," Sgt. Sheehan, of Jennerstown, Pa., reported to senior officers, referring to Iraqi army troops.

"There's nothing we can do," came the reply.

U.S. soldiers from the 4th Squadron, 14th Cavalry Regiment eventually blocked the road again while Iraqi troops watched from a distance.

Some Americans speculated that the missing barriers were dragged off to strengthen militia defenses in nearby Sadr City, a sprawling Shi'ite neighborhood that is a stronghold of anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

"They've been doing this all week. They're working against us," said Sgt. Sheehan, who woke up the senior Iraqi officer at the checkpoint to complain -- futilely.

During another mission, Iraqi soldiers were suspected of looting the house of a wealthy resident, U.S. troops said.

Some Americans said they had seen much better Iraqi troops in the northern cities of Mosul and Tal-Afar, which have more Kurdish soldiers. They have been disappointed by the performance of units committed to the Baghdad fight.

U.S. officers think the problem has political and sectarian roots: Many of the Iraqi soldiers in the capital are Shi'ites recruited from the Baghdad area.

As the security crackdown focuses on Shi'ite neighborhoods, Iraqi troops come in contact with fellow Shi'ites from some of the 23 known militias. That puts great stress on the soldiers, who grew up in a society where respect for religion runs far deeper than for government institutions.

DOJ_NMG_0068598

"From my perspective, you can't make a distinction between Iraq army Shi'ites and the religious militias. You have a lot of soldiers and family members swayed and persuaded by the religious leadership," said Lt. Col. Greg Watt, who advises one of two Iraqi divisions in the city.

He then pointed to the nearby guards, under an Iraqi army division commander.

"There's no doubt in my mind that he has soldiers who are followers of religious leaders," Col. Watt said. "Are they loyal to the division commander? Yes. But they may be loyal to both."

Col. Watt expressed confidence the Iraqi army could win if it came to a pitched battle with militias.

"But what the Iraqi army can't do is protect soldiers when they go home, or protect their families," he added. "It's very, very difficult. That's why a solution has to be a political one and not a military one."

One immediate solution would be to bring in more units from outside Baghdad. Although many of those units are largely Shi'ite, too, the soldiers would be less likely to have family living under militia control.

But many Iraqi troops refuse to serve away from home. The commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, Maj. Gen. James Thurman, said his requests for 3,000 more Iraqi soldiers have been refused because the troops won't leave their home areas.

That attitude frustrates American soldiers.

"They have to step up, make sacrifices. We've made thousands of sacrifices for our own country's freedom," said Staff Sgt. Jeremy Chinnis, 30, of Richmond. "I think they think the Iraqi people don't support them."

Dangerous Neighborhood (NSWK)

By Lally Weymouth

Newsweek, September 25, 2006

Iran and Iraq go side by side, not only on maps but among America's most urgent challenges. As the U.N. General Assembly convened last week in New York, the two presidents talked separately to NEWSWEEK's Lally Weymouth. While Iraq's president is optimistic about his country's future, Iran's president remains intransigent in his refusal to halt nuclear-related activities as demanded by the United States as a precondition for talks. Excerpts:

IRANIAN PRESIDENT MAHMOUD AHMADINEJAD

WEYMOUTH: Will you stop enrichment and reprocessing activities?

AHMADINEJAD: Why should we agree to that? There is no such provision in the NPT [Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty].

Didn't you put that in question when you violated the NPT for more than 10 years? Do you recognize those violations?

It is the right of all member states of the NPT to have the technology for fuel reprocessing.

But don't responsibilities go with rights?

The problem is some believe that they sit above the law. They produce bombs and use them too. That is where the problem lies.

Do you think it would be in Iran's interest to move toward a normal relationship with the United States?

We are interested in having talks with everyone ... but the U.S. administration—that is, a section of the U.S. administration—does not create the right circumstances. They believe that they own the entire world, so they speak from that position, looking down at us. Some politicians in the United States think that the nuclear issue is a way to put pressure on Iran, but they are wrong. [A country] that has actually produced and used nuclear bombs cannot claim that they now want to stop proliferation.

Are you really serious when you say that Israel should be wiped off the face of the earth?

We need to look at the scene in the Middle East—60 years of war, 60 years of displacement, 60 years of conflict, not even a day of peace. We need to address and resolve the root problem.

Your suggestion is to wipe Israel off the face of the earth?

Our suggestion is very clear ... Let the Palestinian people decide their fate in a free and fair referendum, and the result, whatever it is, should be accepted ... The people with no roots there are now ruling the land.

You've been quoted as saying Israel should be wiped off the face of the earth. Is that your belief?

What I have said has made my position clear. If we look at a map of the Middle East from 70 years ago ...

So the answer is yes?

DOJ_NMG_0068599

Is this a test? Do you respect the right to self-determination for the Palestinian nation? Yes or no?

If the Palestinian people opted for a two-state solution, would you support that decision?

Israel currently occupies Palestine. Where did they come from? They should return.

You've made statements about the Holocaust, saying it was exaggerated. Is that your opinion?

It's not the numbers that are important ... We know this was a historical event that happened. But why is it that people who question it are persecuted and attacked?

There is a crisis of violence in Iraq. Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki recently asked for your help. Will you help him?

We've supported the Iraqi government from the start. We will support the political process in Iraq.

Everyone in the region says the result of the U.S. invasion of Iraq is that Iran is more powerful than ever.

Do you think there is a problem with Iran being a powerful country? A powerful Iran will benefit the region, because Iran is a country with a deep culture and has always been a peaceful country.

Are you going to continue backing terror groups—Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad?

Why do you call them terrorists? If someone occupied the United States and the American people rose to defend their home, would you call the American people terrorists?

I would say they were terrorists if they started killing civilians.

The Palestinian people have the right to live. Gaza is being bombarded. Homes are being destroyed.

What do you want the United States to do?

I sent a very detailed and caring letter [to President Bush]. I truly mean it when I say that I hope Mr. Bush will change his behavior and attitude. It doesn't make us happy that sentiments against him rise on a daily basis around the world.

How can you come to this country and tell our president to change his behavior?

We're just defending our honor.

IRAQI PRESIDENT JALAL TALABANI

WEYMOUTH: Americans are discouraged about Iraq. What is your assessment?

TALABANI: The media focuses only on the negative side of Iraq. We have problems with security, but we have big achievements and victories. People are enjoying a new kind of democracy: they are enjoying freedom of expression, of organization, and of having their own television and radio. We have liberated the economy from the control of the state. Now the private sector is active everywhere. We have 18 provinces, and at least 12 of these are quiet and calm. All over Iraq, schools are open.

Two leading U.S. generals testified recently that there is a civil war going on in Iraq.

This is not civil war. This is terrorist activity concentrated on Iraq by Al Qaeda and other extremists.

Aren't you worried aboutthe violence?

Of course we are worried. But this is one side ...

What about the Sunni militias?

Before the last election for Parliament, Sunnis refused to sit down with Shiites. I was mediating. Afterwards, they were convinced to participate in Parliament. They agreed to have a national unity government, and Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds have agreed to form a council for national security. Now Sunnis and Shiites are governing together. Though differences remain, this is a way of reconciliation.

Reportedly the U.S. government is losing faith in Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

President Bush assured us that he will support the Maliki government. We assured him that all Iraqi political parties support Maliki. He has done many important things for Iraq. He has ordered all of the militias to stop their activities.

But they haven't stopped.

They are not operating as before.

When should the U.S. troops leave?

I think within two years we will be able to train our Army and have the capacity to face terrorism. When we ask our allies to leave Iraq it will depend on being able to keep Iraq's sovereignty and independence free of danger from the outside. The presence of American forces—even a symbolic one—will frighten those who are trying to interfere in our affairs.

DOJ_NMG_0068600

Are you talking about Iran?

Our prime minister just came back from Iran. He got good promises from Iran on security—promises that they will never permit any kind of interference in the internal affairs of Iraq.

Do you believe that?

Let us see.

Turkish troops are massed at Iraq's border.

Yes, but they are not coming in. We convinced the PKK [a radical Kurdish separatist group based in Iraq] to stop fighting, and within days it will officially announce a ceasefire. This will help Iraq open a new chapter in relations with Turkey. We are urging the Turkish Kurds to be moderate, to wage their struggle through democratic means.

What do you think of the American idea of transforming Middle Eastern countries into democracies?

I support this idea. I believe democracy is the panacea for all problems in the Middle East.

So while many Americans believe the war in Iraq is a mess, you believe the opposite.

Iraq is not in chaos. There are many provinces that are calm—where people live in prosperity. We are grateful to your people, to your Army, to your president. You liberated us from a dictatorship.

So this fight is not in vain?

What I want from the American media is to send people to Iraq to see different parts of the country, not just Fallujah and Baghdad. Some places are in trouble, including Baghdad, but we are improving this.

Would you welcome U.S. bases in Kurdistan?

Yes. I think we will be in need of American forces for a long time to prevent foreign interference. Ten thousand soldiers and two air bases would be enough. This will be in the interest of the Iraqi people and of peace in the Middle East.

My Right Hand (TIME)

By Michael Weisskopf

Time, September 25, 2006

In his book Blood Brothers, TIME senior correspondent Michael Weisskopf weaves his own tale of losing a hand in Iraq with the stories of three soldiers who also spent time at Amputee Alley, Ward 57 of Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington. In this excerpt, the action begins on Dec. 10, 2003, as Weisskopf, 57 at the time, is on assignment in Baghdad, riding in the back of an open humvee along with TIME photographer James Nachtwey and two young soldiers, Private Orion Jenks and Private First Class Jim Beverly.

The army convoy rattled through Al-Adhamiya like a carnival roller coaster, each turn as blind as the next. Not that the soldiers could see much anyway. Night had fallen on the old Baghdad quarter, a byzantine maze lit only by kerosene lamps flickering from rugged stone houses. We moved warily in the darkness, patrolling for insurgents in blind alleys custom-made for ambushes and narrow passages perfect for concealing roadside bombs. It was anyone's bet who faced a more dire risk, the hunted in terrorist cells or the hunters in humvees, along with whom I was riding under a half-moon. I was in Iraq to profile the American soldier as "Person of the Year" for TIME magazine. It was a dream assignment, a chance to escape Washington and work in exotic environs on a big story.

We emerged into Al-Adhamiya's main marketplace, a large treeless square that was host to what looked like a block party in full swing. Old men, rocking back and forth on tiny stools, shuffled dominoes. Boys volleyed soccer balls. Women veiled in black fed their children from stalls of roasted chickens and shashlik. No one seemed to notice the foreign invaders passing by.

At first I thought it was a rock, the specialty of street urchins--a harmless shot against an armored humvee. I gazed down and spotted an object on the wooden bench 2 ft. away. The dark oval was as shiny and smooth as a tortoiseshell, roughly 6 in. long and 4 in. wide. None of my fellow passengers seemed to notice. I confronted the intruder alone, a journalist caught in a military moment. Something told me there was no time to consult the soldiers.

I rose halfway, leaned to the right, and cupped the object. I might as well have plucked volcanic lava from a crater. I could feel the flesh of my palm liquefying. Pain bolted up my arm like an electric current. In one fluid motion, I raised my right arm and started to throw the mass over the side of the vehicle, a short backhand toss. Then everything went dark.

DOJ_NMG_0068601

The humvee bed was cold and hard, an inhospitable place to awaken. I struggled to sit up and fell back. My right leg burned from knee to hip. Blood was oozing from it; my right arm felt heavy and numb. Was I having a nightmare? The hollow, faraway sound of voices was dreamlike. I shook my right arm, trying to wake it up. Still no response. I elevated it to see why.

My wrist looked like the neck of a decapitated chicken. The wound was jagged, the blood glistening in the light. My mouth was dry, my brow soaked in sweat; my heart beat quickly and weakly, little dings in my chest.

All sound and sight dimmed, as my thoughts turned inward. This is not how I pictured my life ending: futilely and unglamorously, on the frigid floor of a truck, thousands of miles away from anyone I loved.

After medic Billie Grimes stopped the bleeding with an elastic cord, I was rushed in the humvee to a nearby brigade clinic and then medevacked to a U.S. Army hospital elsewhere in Baghdad for surgery to clean what was left of my arm and the shrapnel wounds in my right thigh. There, I learned that everyone else in the back of the humvee had survived, though Jenks had serious leg wounds, Beverly had knee and hand injuries and Nachtwey had taken shrapnel in his knees and abdomen. The next morning, a middle-aged nurse with blond highlights approached my bed.

"You're a hero," she said. "You lost a hand and saved lives."

Hero? I was feeling anything but valiant. Mangled. Pitiful. Disoriented. Scared. I was anxious about my ability to work again with one hand and to parent my children, who lived with me half-time in Washington. My son Skyler was 11 years old, the same age I had been when my father, a workaholic community newspaper publisher, dropped dead of a heart attack. Olivia was 8, roughly as old as my sister had been. I couldn't bear to think I might let such wrenching family history repeat itself.

Mostly, however, I was angry at myself for getting in the wrong humvee, releasing the grenade too slowly, even grabbing it in the first place. Nothing would have happened if I hadn't picked it up. Why had I been acting like a cowboy? Why hadn't I just left the damn thing alone?

"It was an impulsive act," I told the nurse. "If I hadn't picked it up, I'd still have a hand."

"You probably wouldn't have had a life," she retorted. "You and everyone else in the vehicle would have died. It wasn't an impulse; it was an instinct to survive."

TIME colleagues pushed for my transfer from Baghdad to the U.S. military hospital in Landstuhl, Germany. They then joined my friends and sister Leslie Flesch in lobbying to get acting Secretary of the Army Les Brownlee to admit me to Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, making me the first reporter wounded in combat known to have received such treatment at the premier hospital reserved for soldiers.

Among the pros on the amputees' Ward 57 at Walter Reed, no one seemed fazed by my injury. But just the word amputation made me shudder. It conjured up a disjointed series of images: a childhood friend who had lost his leg in an auto accident; World War II veterans wheeled into ballparks for holiday games, their empty trousers or shirtsleeves pinned up. I had avoided mirrors all week. Now I feared seeing the startling reality in the faces of my family and friends who would be visiting on my first day in the hospital.

My fears turned out to be groundless. The one emotion everyone showed was happiness to see me alive, maimed or not. But two exchanges stood out. My sister surprised me with a gift: a 1900 silver dollar our gambler father had won in Las Vegas and given to her in 1956 when she was 8 years old.

I held my father's winnings and thought of the larger bet he lost. He deferred a family life to business success, and died before he had either. I had almost repeated the mistake. The realization put my father's death in a new light. I understood for the first time why he exited before getting to know me: he had gambled on a future that never materialized. It was a mistake I could begin to forgive.

I had gambled on a job assignment and had my own damage-control problems. Skyler had reacted angrily when he first heard of my injury. "He lied to me, he lied to me," Skyler shouted, referring to my parting words when I left for Iraq. "He promised me he wouldn't get hurt." According to my estranged wife Judith Katz, Skyler had moped and cried every day until I came home.

He was the first one through the door when visiting hours began. He and Olivia bounded onto my bed, showering me with hugs and get-well posters. Dressed in camouflage pants, Skyler before long had grabbed a roll of gauze and wound it around his right hand. He was identifying with my loss, a gesture I saw as a sign of forgiveness. I had shaken his sense of safety, the security blanket only a father can provide. Skyler's act of generosity capped a day of pardons across three generations of Weisskopf males.

DOJ_NMG_0068602

Five days after I arrived Ward 57, surgeons removed another 3.3 in. of my forearm. They needed an inch of bone to free up enough loose skin to cover my wound; I had agreed to lose another 2 in. to make room for an electronic component in my future prosthesis so that my artificial hand would have the capacity to rotate rather than just open and close.

Myoelectric is the non-sci-fi name for bionic. A myoelectric hand works off tiny electrical signals released when muscles are contracted. The signals are picked up by electrodes that line the inside of a prosthesis and cover the muscles of a stump. Electrodes send the signal to a computer chip that instructs an electronic hand to open, close or rotate.

For long stumps like mine, forearm muscles located 3 in. below the elbow drove the process. Flexing the one on the outside of my forearm signaled a hand to open. Tensing the inner muscle would close it. My first lesson with an occupational therapist, Captain Kathleen Yancosek, focused on how to isolate those muscles. Using a tool called "Myo-boy," Captain Katie strapped electrodes onto each of my forearm muscles and plugged the other end of a cord into a laptop computer. The object was to generate a spike on the monitor by flexing the right muscle. I jerked, twitched and turned my stump. Nothing happened. I pumped again, hunting for the right spot, but the monitor stayed blank. When I grew frustrated, Katie had me close my eyes to map the muscle in my mind. I contracted. She let out a cheer: "You did it."

I opened my eyes and saw a tiny streak on the monitor. I squeezed, again, sending the spike higher. Unfortunately, as I kept practicing, the computer indicated that I was firing both muscles at the same time. I finally managed to distinguish one muscle from the other. But manipulating those tiny muscles was exhausting. My hospital gown was soaked in sweat.

Over the course of the next week, I spent at least an hour a day working on the Myo-boy, graduating to new levels of virtual reality. Finally, I simulated the mechanics of a virtual hand, including the wrist rotation I had paid for with two extra inches of my arm. It took an extra step, hitting both muscles at the same time.

Once the pain of surgery had subsided after Christmas, I began to suffer the bane of amputees: phantom limb pain. Sometimes I felt as if my fist was clamping tighter and tighter until my fingers were ready to explode. At other times, the Phantom could create the sensation of twisted fingers or a bent thumb.

Virtually everyone on Ward 57 had some phantom limb pain. Its cause remained as mysterious as it had been when a Civil War doctor coined the term to identify the complaints of soldiers whose injured limbs had been sawed off. Some experts believe the brain has a blueprint of body parts that persists even if they've been cut off. According to one theory, when the brain sends signals and receives no feedback, it bombards the missing limb with more signals. That aggravates the swollen nerves that once served it, inducing pain.

Doctors were as hard-pressed to treat phantom pain as they were to explain it. They resorted to trial and error, using remedies originally intended for other ailments that seemed to relieve nerve pain. I had a sampling on my nightstand: pills to combat seizures and depression, lozenges for bronchitis, allergy nasal spray, arthritis cream, medicated patches for shingles and an electro-stimulation device. It was hard to tell if any of them worked. The crushing, stabbing pain in my right hand flared and subsided--but never went away. Doctors said it might last a month, a year or a lifetime. Every amputee was different.

Phantom pain was a daily topic at OT--occupational therapy, the whittling porch for amputees. I made my first friends there. Most of my neighbors were half my age and from different backgrounds, small-town boys who had passed up college or blue-collar trades for a military life. I was urban, overeducated, untattooed and distrustful of uniforms and blind patriotism. But I soon discovered that I shared something with those soldiers larger than the differences in our biographies. We were men struggling for identity. The psychological scars of amputation ran deeper than those from conventional wounds of war. The blasts took away something deeply personal. None of us felt like the men who had gone to Iraq. We possessed the same minds; they just resided in different bodies.

The loss of my writing hand launched an assault on my self-image. If I couldn't be a reporter, then who was I? What would I do? The questions left me raw and wide open, no more so than my new friends who had honed their bodies for a completely different cause: war. The military represented the perfect synthesis of muscle and discovery, a place to play out feelings of invincibility. Now they confronted the world from a wheelchair or without an arm. Life looked different with no war to fight, orders to follow and comrades to love. The question was how to fill the void, and with what.

DOJ_NMG_0068603

The tone in OT could shift from laughter to grave silence in the moment it took a soldier to scream in pain or explode into anger. Captain Katie segregated the angriest amputees. Her morning sessions bristled with tension. Metallica and Motorhead blared from speakers. One specialist who had trouble picking up a peg with his above-the-elbow prosthesis flung the $115,000 device against a wall. "I ain't doing it anymore," he shouted. Another threw the metal pedal of his wheelchair into a costly exercise machine.

My own moods fluctuated between anger and joy, frustration and triumph. But a feeling of melancholy prevailed as I came face to face with the larger tragedy beyond my own: stolen youth. Specialist Hilario Bermanis, 21, had been built like a fullback when he left his home in Micronesia to join the Army. Now he was hunched in a wheelchair, a thick neck and broad shoulders the only reminder of his once muscular body. He had lost his left hand and both legs above the knee to a rocket-propelled grenade in Baghdad.

Specialist James Fair, 22, had the cruelest of all fates; not only had he lost his sight, he had no hands for Braille or a cane. Still recovering from a brain injury in late December, he was wheeled into OT for sensory perception tests. He rolled his head back and forth, unresponsive to the therapists.

Three weeks of hospital life had taken a toll. I was 20 lbs. lighter, stooped, and as pale as a death-row inmate. Lacking a hand and 3 in. of forearm, my right limb hung almost a foot shorter than my left, the length of a child's arm attached to an adult's body. In a light-green hospital gown, I wasn't groomed for the runway or my date of Jan. 2. My girlfriend, Rebekah Edminster, had flown in from California for a 10-day stint.

A professional singer who lived in the artists' colony of Ojai, Rebekah, with whom I'd been romantically involved for a year, had kept her distance from Washington to avoid potential rivalry over my care. My sister had come for the first few days, and Judith, to whom I had been married for a decade, had been a continuous presence.

Rebekah arrived and kissed me as if nothing had changed. After a couple of hours, however, I sensed a little tension. I knew what was coming: a Washington Post story covering the Iraq incident had identified Judith as my wife. We were legally separated, but I apparently had left Rebekah with the idea that I had been divorced. She felt misled, telling a friend, "The grenade didn't kill him, but I'm going to."

I broached the subject, setting off a debate on the definition of marriage. I became angry and defensive. The room got close. I insisted I had never intentionally deceived her and said I needed support now, not doubt. "Listen, are we not friends?" Rebekah asked, locking her eyes on mine. I nodded yes."Then we'll get through this," she said.

On Jan. 8, 2004, I was released from the hospital and returned to my Washington home. My kids resumed their half-time life with me. Victor Vorobyev, a Russian Ã©migrÃ© hired by TIME as my driver, chauffeured them to and from school. I overcame my nightmare of not being able to produce peanut butter sandwiches, with the help of technology from Captain Katie's OT kitchen. A sheet of sticky, rubbery material held the jar in place while I twisted off the top with my good hand and scooped.

Skyler and Olivia had no adult notions of loss or judgments about helping me. Not long ago I had tied their shoes. Now they were tying mine. I had patched up their cuts and scrapes; now they were changing my dressings. Their sweetness permeated the house. Before Iraq, I had thought of parenting as another job--a lot of work with little payoff. Now it was a love affair. Skyler and I picked up our running chess game. Olivia helped me cook dinners--"one-handed spaghetti" was our specialty.

A blizzard plowed into Washington one day in late January. We packed into Victor's car and went sledding. I stood at the bottom of the hill and watched. The sun sparkled on their snowsuits like tiny stars. They laughed and called out: "Watch this, Dad." "Did you see me, Daddy?" I waved and wept at these beautiful sounds, realizing how close I had come to never hearing them again.

Why did I risk it? I had scrutinized my motivation for picking up a grenade, but not the reason I had put myself in range of it. My rationale for going to Iraq as a career milestone no longer struck me as truthful. I already had scrapbooks full of big stories and enough money in the bank. I realized that something else had driven me, an old problem of self-worth: I was good because of what I did, not because of who I was. I had important roles as father, brother, lover and son. But without achieving in some material way, I felt empty and unseen. Journalism had provided a regular opportunity to reinvent myself. I had gone to Iraq for another fix.

DOJ_NMG_0068604

Like any junkie, I thought only of myself, taking on a dangerous mission as if others didn't deserve a say, as if the chance of success for me was more important than the certainty of fatherhood for my kids. I didn't weigh the risk to them until I lay bleeding in the bed of a humvee, too late to spare them the fright.

It had taken a major loss for me to understand what I meant to others. Relationships rescued me. They got me out of Baghdad, into Walter Reed and back home. I received that help not because of a grade I had earned, a story written, or lives saved; it was for being me. I resolved to return the love by being less self-absorbed. I promised my kids I would stay out of war zones. My brother-in-law, Michael Flesch, came for a three-day visit, the longest time we had spent alone together in years. We hung out at Walter Reed by day and frequented Washington haunts by night.

And then there was Rebekah. I had finally realized why the divorce flap was so upsetting. Relationships meant everything to her, and I had shortchanged her on candor. The open heart she had brought to Walter Reed deserved better. I apologized in a couple of long phone calls to California, promising full disclosure as the bedrock of our relationship from here on out.

The arrival of my myoelectric arm in the first week of February was more exciting than a new pair of shoes--but no more comfortable to wear. Just getting it on was painful: my stump was still incredibly tender. If my former right hand had floated lightly, the fake one moved like a dumbbell--fat, clunky and heavy. Its 2 1/2 lbs. were concentrated in the electronic hand--the place farthest from the half-forearm. I kept bumping it into things. I named it Ralph, after the clumsiest kid in my grade school.

Ralph didn't work any better than he looked. The thumb and first two fingers opened and closed like a claw, the grossest of motor skills. The third finger and pinkie, which are employed by natural hands to carry things, were frozen. Ralph's wrist didn't bend. Despite weeks of training on a computer, I had difficulty with the basic functions: my stronger outer forearm muscle kept flexing and involuntarily opening the hand--even when I was trying to close it. I had no more success with the mechanism to rotate the wrist. The simultaneous contraction of both muscles was unnatural and hard to remember in real time. When I did it right, I couldn't keep the hand from spinning 360Ëš, an annoying loss of control--and embarrassing in public.

My disillusionment with Ralph grew. By the fifth day I was so frustrated I was ready to quit, thinking I'd be better off with one hand. On Feb. 11, I was invited to meet with my rehab team of eight people. Lieut. Colonel Paul Pasquina, medical director of the Army's amputee-care program, cited a few options to the myoelectric arm, including a body-powered prosthesis. They were lighter, unencumbered at the elbow, and ended in a hook. Pasquina said I might adopt a hook as a trademark that people would come to respect for its straightforward honesty.

I bristled. I wanted a prosthesis to disguise my deformity, not spotlight it. "The circles I travel in wouldn't be amused," I told Pasquina dismissively. I still was banking on an easy-fitting, lifelike substitute.

Dec. 10 marked the passing of a year since my injury. I knew I'd never regain what I had lost in penmanship, tennis, home repair, lovemaking, freedom from pain and dexterity. Even putting on a tie remained a challenge, one fraught with danger. Rushing to a TV appearance a few weeks earlier, I tried to knot one in the backseat of a taxi. I gripped the short end with my prosthetic hand, which began to spin uncontrollably, almost strangling me before I managed to extricate myself.

Despite occasional disasters, however, I was adjusting to a fake arm--thanks to certain modifications by prosthetist John Miguelez's team. Ralph had bit the dust, replaced by a more tapered, slightly lighter shell made of carbon fiber and acrylic resin. The modifications improved my range of motion and wardrobe--I could now button a dress shirt. But I was hardly wearing a second skin. The rigid shell chafed my forearm and got so hot in the summer that sweat dripped out of a small hole used to put it on.

Before Iraq, the technology of arm prostheses hadn't changed much since World War II. The tiny population of amputees created little market incentive. Miguelez used the burst in demand from Walter Reed to lean on manufacturers for progress. Before long, he was outfitting Iraq war amputees with an electronic hand that opened and closed 2 1/2 times faster and could be programmed to function at different speeds and grip strength.

The cosmetic arts also had improved. I received a silicone hand that was so lifelike it passed for real in social settings. But Pretty Boy, as I called it, kept tearing and afforded the precision of a boxing glove. It was too spongy to grasp anything small and too slippery to hold most objects for long.

Function was only part of the problem. The idea of trying to pass had begun to trouble me. It made me feel as if I had something to hide or be ashamed of. When I started to go bald, I shaved my head. No comb-overs, transplants or toupees for me.

DOJ_NMG_0068605

So why try to conceal a handicap? I was now proud of how I had lost my hand. The stump had a story to tell, regardless of my motivations for grabbing a grenade. Why not draw attention to it?

No one could miss my disability now. I put on a hook for Thanksgiving dinner and never took it off. It twisted into the end of my myoelectric prosthesis and turned 360Ëš like an electronic hand. Only it worked better. Two silver talons opened like forceps, locked on to items and could pick a dime off the floor. Occasionally I screwed on a plastic, clawlike device known by the German word for grabber--Greifer--to move heavy objects, and I contemplated the long list of attachments--garden tools, spatulas, hammers and pool-shooting bridges--that were available by special order. I usually sported the hook, however, even if it aroused more fear than friendship among people I passed on the street. Some kids cowered. Friends accepted it and greeted me with a high-two. Rebekah, who had agreed to marry me several months earlier, thought my choice impudent but sexy and advised me on clothing to complement it--black was obviously best.

Half a year after I dismissed the suggestion from a Walter Reed doctor, the hook had become my trademark. It was brash, straightforward and pragmatic, virtues I cherished. I had left a lot of me behind in the Baghdad grenade attack. By its first anniversary, I was starting to reclaim it.

On July 3, Rebekah and I flew to Rancho Mirage, Calif., to celebrate my stepfather's 90th birthday. My mother hosted a party in the main ballroom of a swank hotel, the Lodge, for more than 60 family members and friends. Inevitably, when the subject of my accident came up and led to admiring comments, I felt a familiar twinge of guilt and embarrassment. I still couldn't embrace the notion of my so-called heroism.

Lying awake that night, I was reminded of a conversation I'd had with Hal Wain, a psychologist at Walter Reed. I had sought him out a few months earlier to discuss why I had grabbed the grenade. Wain said I had one overriding objective: self-preservation. "That's what all heroes are made of," he said. "I have learned from guys coming back that the instinct to survive, the instinct to take care of oneself or others, is incredibly potent. I really don't care if you did it for your needs or for others; you did it. The end result would have been the same--you saved people's lives."

Wain defined heroism as quick response to a changing environment, like a driver who swerves into another lane for the purpose of avoiding an oncoming car and, in the process, saves the life of his passenger. "That wasn't his intent," he said. "But being flexible and shifting is a higher level of intelligence. The people who can't change die."

I expressed my frustration that such a major ordeal had seemed to have so little effect on me--I was still the same impatient, competitive and self-critical person I'd always been. If I had acted so nobly, why didn't I feel more content? Wain's response struck me at the time as somewhat facile: the good deed, he said, had left me angry at myself. "You're thinking you could have done the same thing and didn't have to lose the hand. You love a perfect win and didn't get that perfect victory that you wanted and maybe deserved."

As I tossed and turned in the early hours of Independence Day, the simple truth of the psychologist's words hit me. It was true: I was mad at myself for failing to pull off a clean sweep. And it was that anger that was preventing me from savoring the achievement of a lifetime: saving my own skin and that of three others. My failure to get rid of the grenade before it exploded was only the first in a long list of wrongs I would have to pardon before I could finally put the ordeal behind me.

I had gone to Iraq for adventure and glory, discounting the interests of family and friends.

I had blithely ridden into danger with little to gain journalistically.

I had focused more on the loss of my hand than on the higher importance of preserving life.

The shortcomings were tough to swallow. But I was resolved to begin the process, keeping in mind Hal Wain's definition of heroism: self-preservation. By that standard, I had scored a perfect win after all.

The prize was the rest of my life.

Go to time.com to see a video interview with Michael Weisskopf and read a bonus excerpt from his book Blood Brothers

The Men Of Ward 57 (TIME)

Time, September 25, 2006

Sunday, Sep. 24, 2006

The Men Of Ward 57

DOJ_NMG_0068606

It is the signature wound of the Iraq war: limb loss. The potency of insurgent bombs and the proficiency of U.S. lifesavers have produced this result. Of the 20,322 Americans wounded in action, 436 have been amputees--more than 2%, a figure higher than in every war of the previous century except Vietnam, for which there were no good statistics. In his book, Michael Weisskopf chronicles the recoveries of three amputees he met at Walter Reed.

Cpl. Bobby Isaacs

Isaacs was given 72 hours to live after a bomb slammed his humvee in Mosul in December 2003. He arrived at Walter Reed intact, but successive surgeries chipped away at both his legs. After returning home to Roxboro, N.C., Isaacs, 25, was invited to speak at churches and became a minor celebrity among Fundamentalist Baptists

Sgt. Pete Damon

A National Guard aviation mechanic, Damon was inflating a tire on a Black Hawk helicopter in Balad when the tire's metal rim exploded in October 2003. He lost his arms--and his partner Paul Bueche. Two months later, Damon married his longtime girlfriend Jenn, exchanging roses in place of rings. Haunted with guilt over Bueche's death, Damon, 34, began to find peace after meeting Bueche's parents, who absolved him of blame

Msgt. Luis Rodriguez

A bomb in Mosul in November 2003 took Rodriguez's right leg as well as the only job the hard-driving combat medic had ever wanted. But Rodriguez, 37, who won a Bronze Star for bravery in Iraq, found a way to stay in uniform, teaching his craft at Fort Campbell in Kentucky

To see previous coverage in TIME on the casualties of the war, go to this week's cover story on time.com

Iraqi Parties Reach Deal Postponing Federalism (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 24 -- Iraq's fractious political parties reached a deal Sunday meant to prevent the country from splintering into a federation of three autonomous zones until at least 2008.

The agreement forestalled concerns that the debate over federalism, a vague concept enshrined in the constitution but defined differently by various political groups, could cause the country's fragile multi-sect government to collapse.

Sunni Arabs had threatened to boycott parliament over a proposal, introduced by a Shiite Muslim group this month, to create a mechanism that could carve out a predominantly Shiite region in southern Iraq, similar to the semiautonomous Kurdish zone in the north. Sunnis adamantly oppose that plan, which would leave them with a central area devoid of the oil reserves in other regions, and have pushed for a full review of the country's new constitution.

Under the compromise reached Sunday, parliament will form a 27-member committee on Monday to review the constitution and then introduce the Shiite measure on creating federal regions the following day, lawmakers said.

The federalism law would not take effect for at least 18 months after it is enacted, the parliament members said.

The deal appears to have forestalled for now a political crisis over federalism, but lawmakers emphasized that the issue remains unresolved.

"We still need a miracle to save the country," said Dhafer al-Ani, a spokesman for the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni bloc in parliament. "The process of sectarian cleansing is still going on, and the violence is not waning, and this may serve those proponents of federalism who want to make the people believe that living together in a unified country is not possible."

The measure is backed by Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite political party. But lawmakers from several other parties -- including the Iraqi Accordance Front, secular parties and the bloc of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr -- said they would vote against it.

Still, Humam Hamoudi, a lawmaker from Hakim's party, said he was confident the measure would pass by Oct. 22, the constitutionally mandated deadline for establishing a mechanism to create federal regions. He said votes from the Kurdish bloc and the Supreme Council would provide the simple majority needed to approve the law.

DOJ_NMG_0068607

The Sunnis are lobbying to have a member of their sect named chairman of the constitutional review committee, which they hope will propose major revisions to the constitution. The charter, approved by voters last fall, was supported only reluctantly by the Sunnis on the condition that the federalism issue would be reexamined.

"The main issue is the union of Iraq -- that Iraq stays as one Iraq -- and this should lead to articles in the constitution that properly reflect that on the subject of finances, natural resources, oil, the army, police formation and language," said Alaa Makki, a leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party, which is part of the Iraqi Accordance Front, when asked what the Sunnis hoped to change in the charter.

In other developments, Saddam Hussein's chief lawyer said Sunday that the former president's defense team would boycott his genocide trial "indefinitely."

"The court committed several violations of the law, and we will not just sit there gagged to give it legitimacy," said Khalil al-Dulaimi, the head of Hussein's nine-member defense team, according to the Associated Press.

The attorneys walked out of court Wednesday to protest a government attempt to remove the tribunal's chief judge, a move condemned by human rights groups and international legal experts.

Violence continued to rage across the country Sunday. At least 14 people were killed in attacks, including two car bombings that targeted Iraqi security forces, police said.

The U.S. military also announced that two Marines assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 were killed Sunday in combat in volatile Anbar province..

Special correspondents K.I. Ibrahim and Saad al-Izzi contributed to this report.

Iraqis Break 2-week Deadlock On Federalism (USAT/AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

USA Today, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — Political leaders from Iraq's feuding ethnic and religious groups agreed Sunday to consider amending the constitution and to begin debating legislation that would allow the country to become a federation of semiautonomous regions.

The agreement among Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish leaders broke a two-week deadlock in parliament.

The federalism legislation was proposed by Shiite groups. Sunni Arabs have opposed a federal structure for Iraq. They fear that allowing Iraq to become a federation of self-ruling regions — rather than a nation with direct rule by the central government — will splinter the country and deny them a share of the wealth from Iraq's oil resources, which are found in the predominantly Kurdish north and the heavily Shiite south.

Sunni leaders agreed to debate the legislation in parliament after all parties accepted their demand that a committee be set up to study amending the constitution. The committee will be named today, and the bill will be read to the 275-member parliament Tuesday.

Sunni Arabs hope to push through a constitutional amendment that would make it more difficult to establish autonomous regions.

The parliamentary committee will have four months to propose amendments. A majority in parliament would have to approve any amendments before they are put to a national referendum. “I expect the work of the committee will last for about one year,” said Dhafir al-Anihe, a lawmaker with the Sunni Arab National Accordance Front.

Although the constitution approved by Iraqis in a referendum a year ago provides for federalism, separate legislation is needed to turn the country into a federation.

The right to seek amendments to the constitution was a key demand made by Sunni Arabs when they agreed to join Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's national unity government in the spring.

The depth of the divide between Shiites and Sunni Arabs was evident in a disagreement over when the Muslim holy month of Ramadan begins. The holiday, during which Muslims fast from sunup to sundown, is timed to the sighting of the new crescent moon. Sunni Arabs began observing it Saturday. However, Iraq's most influential Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, declared that Ramadan would start today. The Shiite-led government followed Sistani's lead.

DOJ_NMG_0068608

Violence among ethnic and religious groups has been intense in Baghdad this year. A bombing Saturday in the Shiite slum of Sadr City killed at least 38 people who were buying fuel for Ramadan. A Sunni Arab group claimed responsibility and said it was revenge for an attack by gunmen Friday on Sunni Arab homes and mosques that killed four people.

Al-Maliki pleaded for peace. "We are all invited to make use of these days to strengthen the bonds of brotherhood and avoid anything that could hurt the social fabric of the Iraqi people," he said in a statement. "Iraq is living in a very sensitive and historic period, either we live as loving brothers side by side and undivided by sectarianism or Iraq will shift into an area for settling accounts of political parties."

Despite his call, violence Sunday killed at least 20 Iraqis and wounded 37.

Sunday, four policemen on patrol near the Health Ministry were killed by a roadside bomb, police said. A car bomb targeting another police patrol killed five people, including three policemen, and wounded 17 in the eastern part of the capital, police Lt. Bilal Ali said.

Police also found more apparent victims of death squads in the capital. Five bodies were found bound and blindfolded in eastern Baghdad. In a northeastern part of the city, four bodies of men ages 30-35 were found riddled with bullets.

Two U.S. Marines with Regimental Combat Team 5 died in fighting in Anbar province west of Baghdad, the U.S. military said. It didn't release any further details.

Also Sunday, Saddam Hussein's chief lawyer said the defense team will boycott the former Iraqi leader's genocide trial indefinitely. Khalil al-Dulaimi accused the judges of violating Iraqi law. The move is unlikely to halt the trial. Proceedings resume today.

Al-Dulaimi called last week's decision to replace the chief judge in the case a "flagrant violation of the law" because it was "dictated by the government and not the court." He also accused the court of committing "several violations of the law," including refusing to hear non-Iraqi lawyers and requiring foreign attorneys to seek permission to enter the courtroom. Among Saddam's nine lawyers are a Jordanian, a Spaniard, a Frenchman and two Americans, including former U.S. attorney general Ramsey Clark.

Saddam and seven other defendants have been on trial since Aug. 21 over a crackdown in Kurdish areas in the late 1980s. Saddam could be sentenced to death if convicted of genocide.

Iraqis To Debate Bill On Creating Autonomous States (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Abdul Razzaq Al-Saiedi

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 24 — Iraqi political leaders agreed on Sunday to postpone until at least 2008 any effort to carve up the country into powerful autonomous states, easing concerns that Shiites would move quickly to split off into one large confederation in southern Iraq.

The delay was part of a deal reached over the weekend to start debate on a bill that could eventually allow the country to be broken into autonomous regions.

The fight is at the heart of one of the most critical and divisive issues in Iraq: whether Shiites in the south will be able to form semi-independent regions, like Kurdistan in the north, that would control their own security as well as billions of barrels of oil.

Autonomous states are allowed by the new Iraqi Constitution, but the charter requires Parliament first to pass a bill defining how that would occur. A powerful faction of Shiites and Kurds tried to pass such a proposal three weeks ago. But their move angered Sunni Arabs and some Shiite and secular lawmakers, who united to block the bill and suggested that the issue could endanger Iraq's fragile government.

During a meeting of political leaders on Sunday, Sunni parties and other critics won two important concessions from the Shiite and Kurdish factions in return for allowing the proposal to be debated in Parliament this week.

The first postpones for 18 months the effective date of any legislation allowing the creation of autonomous regions. The second requires Parliament to form a committee immediately to consider amendments to the Constitution, including Sunni proposals to restrict autonomous states.

DOJ_NMG_0068609

Moreover, Sunni negotiators emphasized that they did not agree to support the legislation that would be introduced this week but only to allow it to be debated, said Dhafir al-Ani, a leading Sunni lawmaker. "The issue is just to consider it and go with the process," Mr. Ani said.

The deal does allow supporters to put the issue before Parliament with a promise from rivals to debate the issue in good faith. When the bill was brought up earlier, it spurred an acrimonious fight. Mahmoud Mashhadani, the speaker of Parliament and a Sunni Arab, accused supporters of trying to sneak the bill past him, while other Sunni legislators said they had been double-crossed.

The political progress came as violence continued throughout Iraq. Two marines were killed as a result of "enemy action" in Anbar Province on Sunday, the United States military said.

At least 20 Iraqis were slain in bombings and other attacks, The Associated Press reported. The A.P. also reported that Saddam Hussein's legal team said it would continue to boycott the deposed leader's genocide trial in Baghdad. The lawyers are angry that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki fired a judge who prosecutors had charged was biased toward Mr. Hussein.

In one of Sunday's worst attacks, a bomb exploded near a Christian church in Baghdad, killing at least one person and wounding more than a dozen. Almaz Yunadim, a 34-year-old homemaker who witnessed the attack, said the attack was probably spurred by comments made by Pope Benedict XVI that many Muslims found offensive.

"People are being killed because of what the pope has said," she said. "The person who doesn't know how to speak should step down."

The political deal reached on Sunday says the legislation defining how autonomous states are formed will not take effect until 18 months after it is approved, said Khalid al-Atiya, a deputy speaker of Parliament who is a negotiator for one of the Shiite factions. The constitutional committee is expected to complete its work within a year, Mr. Atiya said through an aide.

The most ardent supporter of the proposal is Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite party. Mr. Hakim wants to carve out a nine-province state that would include most of the people and oil in southern Iraq.

Sunni Arabs are suspicious of the plan, believing that it is sure to rob them of their share of Iraq's oil wealth. And some Shiite leaders worry that Mr. Hakim's plan for one giant Shiite state would create a dynasty for Mr. Hakim and leave their parties marginalized. They would prefer smaller autonomous states in areas where their influence is more concentrated.

The fight over autonomous regions threatened to doom the entire Constitution until a deal was worked out just before Iraqis voted on the charter last October. In that deal, Sunni leaders dropped their opposition to the idea in return for a provision requiring Parliament to renegotiate the parts that trouble the Sunnis. Now, with the formation of the committee, that process will begin.

Mr. Ani, the Sunni lawmaker, said 27 committee members would be selected Tuesday. Another Sunni politician, Khalaf al-Alyan, said Sunni parties would get 5 seats, the Kurds 5 seats, the secular coalition of the former interim prime minister, Ayad Allawi, 2 seats and the dominant Shiite coalition, the United Iraqi Alliance, 12. Other parties would get the remaining 3 seats.

Divisions remain within the Shiite coalition. Opposition from legislators loyal to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, as well as members of the Fadhila Party, helped derail the legislation three weeks ago.

Fadhila has agreed to debate the bill, but its members will vote for the measure only if it discourages the creation of one huge federation across southern Iraq, said Hassan al-Shimiri, a party official. Its stance is at odds with that of Mr. Hakim's party, but such a provision "would ease the fears of people who are afraid of fragmenting the country," Mr. Shimiri said.

Iraq Puts Autonomy Issue On Hold, Heading Off Crisis (LAT)

By Doug Smith And Saif Rasheed

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's leaders stepped back from a simmering constitutional crisis Sunday, agreeing to wait at least 18 months before setting up autonomous regions that would shift power away from the central government.

During the cooling-off period, parliament would consider amendments to the constitution, providing a public forum for the divisive issue of autonomy.

DOJ_NMG_0068610

The deal, which was still being fine-tuned Sunday night, allows lawmakers to avoid a looming deadline that threatened to exacerbate the sectarian violence ravaging the country.

The compromise leaves intact southern Shiite Muslims' and northern Kurds' goal of creating a federal system that would strengthen their hold on the vast oil resources of their two regions. At the same time, Sunni Arabs, who dominate in the resource-poor central and western provinces, would have time to seek constitutional changes to limit the effects of autonomy.

The breakthrough occurred on a day in which bombings and killings claimed dozens of lives and Iraqi TV broadcast a videotape of two dead American soldiers being mutilated.

The military reported the deaths of two Marines in Al Anbar province Sunday. It did not release their names.

The video, a longer version of a clip aired in the summer, purported to show the two soldiers killed in June in an area south of Baghdad. The Mujahedin Shura Council, a group linked to Al Qaeda in Iraq, claimed responsibility for that attack.

The group said the deaths were in retaliation for the March raid in which U.S. soldiers allegedly raped an Iraqi girl and killed her and members of her family. Five U.S. soldiers and a former member of their unit face charges that range from failure to report the incident to rape and murder.

The video aired several times Sunday on the Al Arabiya channel. It showed masked men tying the partly unclad bodies to a truck by their heels and driving off. A later scene showed the bodies engulfed in flames. A narrator said the soldiers should be shown no mercy.

Lawmakers of all the major political blocs participated in the closed-door talks that led to the constitutional compromise. The deal will be put before the parliament this week for approval.

"I feel this agreement has ended a political crisis," said Dhafir Ani of the minority Sunni bloc that opposed the federal system. "I think for us this deal is good but not perfect."

Those present said the agreement called for the parliament to appoint a committee that would have a year to recommend amendments to the constitution. The members are to be named today.

On Tuesday, the parliament is to begin debate on proposals for forming a federal system. At least four groups have offered their own drafts of the power-sharing law, but the one provided by the majority Shiite bloc is expected to prevail. The 18-month waiting period for implementation will begin once the law is passed.

A clause allowing amendments was added to the constitution as a last-minute concession to Sunnis who objected to the mandate for a federal system. The constitution also set a deadline that would have required implementation of the new federal system by Oct. 22.

Party leaders downplayed the idea that the federalism clause would be the primary item on the new committee's agenda.

Ayad Samaraie, a Sunni member of parliament who was involved in the talks, said the committee would provide an opportunity to put aside sectarian issues and consider a variety of amendments in the national interest.

Authorities in Baghdad, meanwhile, reported that 45 bodies were received at the morgue Sunday — eight victims of assassination and the remainder killed and dumped after being kidnapped.

Several car bombs went off in east Baghdad. Two Iraqi policemen were killed and several officers and civilians injured in a 10:30 a.m. blast in the Rusafa neighborhood, and a second bomb targeting police in Alwiya killed a civilian.

In the afternoon, a car bomb near the Baghdad morgue killed four policemen and two civilians and injured eight.

Health Minister Ali Shammari escaped an assassination attempt when a roadside bomb detonated as his motorcade passed in Yarmouk, in south Baghdad. There were no casualties.

Five people were killed in separate attacks in Baqubah, north of Baghdad.

Police in the northern city of Kirkuk said they found the bodies of four unidentified shooting victims who had been tortured.

A curfew was imposed in the southern city of Samawah after a former Iraqi interpreter for the U.S. military was gunned down late Saturday, the Muthanna provincial police chief said.

Armed men stormed into a government building in Hillah in the south, killing a guard.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, said Sunday that American and Iraqi forces had killed 14 people and detained more than 25 in strikes on terrorist cells last week. The raids, in five provinces, also yielded caches of weapons and explosive devices. In one attack, three men in explosives vests were killed by aircraft fire in Al Anbar, the statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0068611

As Iraqi Lights Flicker, 'Generator Man' Feels Heat (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — In offices across Iraq, a ritual plays out every morning during the hottest months. Haggard employees drag themselves into the room, mumble a pleasantry or two and slump into their chairs, moaning about what a bad night's sleep they had: the power went out, the backup generator was broken, the heat was unbearable, the baby would not stop crying, mosquitoes were everywhere.

Inevitably, these grievances, like hornets, will gather in a single cloud of fury and swoop down on one target: the generator man, probably the most vilified figure in Iraqi society after Saddam Hussein.

Iraq has three sources of electrical power. At the low end is the frail national grid, which provides only about one hour of electricity every four hours — a total of six hours a day — and sometimes less.

At the top is the small, personal-size generator, a feature in many homes, though the steadily rising cost of fuel now makes it a luxury for most families.

Filling the gap, and carrying the load for much of urban Iraq, is the generator man, owner and operator of the neighborhood power plant. Throughout Baghdad, for example, there is at least one generator every few blocks to help power nearby homes and businesses.

The machines sit beneath corrugated tin roofs, on patches of sidewalk or in empty lots — hulking contraptions the size of small cars, jury-rigged with tubes and pipes that sputter and belch and make a deafening racket.

Customers run colored wires from their homes to the local generator by way of utility poles, converging with others into one wild, polychromatic river of wire that plunges through the roof of the generator shack, stopping at a makeshift fuse board.

In theory, the generator man provides 10 to 12 hours of power a day during periods of peak demand, seamlessly switching on when the national grid switches off. His services are especially valued during summer, when temperatures usually hover well over 100 degrees and air-conditioners are essential for sleep.

In addition, the generator man offers a better option, theoretically, than the personal generator, allowing families to pay less for a stronger current that will allow them to run all their major appliances simultaneously, rather than having to decide whether to forgo the television and computer for the washing machine or the air-conditioner and hair dryer for the refrigerator.

A subscription for about 10 amperes from the generator man — typical for an average middle-class family here in the capital — costs about $65 a month, a mere fraction of the cost of drawing a similar current from a personal generator for several hours a day.

But in practice, most here say, the generator man often falls way short of his promises.

"My generator man?" seethed a seemingly well-adjusted, middle-class mother in Baghdad one recent sleep-deprived morning. "I want to cut his head off."

Many Iraqis say the generator man employs various tricks to try to save himself money: he starts his generator late and turns it off early; he prolongs repairs after breakdowns, both real and bogus; he claims he cannot get fuel because of national fuel shortages. Yet, they say, he never reimburses customers for lost hours.

"They are a bunch of thieves!" said Yusra, 47, an industrial engineer who lives in the relatively prosperous Mansour neighborhood in Baghdad and who requested that her last name not be published for fear of reprisals from her generator man. "We are 99.9 percent dependent on them! They are ruling our lives — not day by day, but hour by hour!"

Firas, 19, a university student who lives in Saidiya, a middle-class Baghdad neighborhood, and who asked that his last name not be published, said his generator man fiddled with the wires that lead to the homes of customers who offended him, causing interruptions to the service, or decreasing the current.

Talk to the generator man, however, and you will meet the self-styled savior of the republic.

"It's a tiring job," sighed a generator man who gave his name as Abu Fatma to protect his identity. His generator supplies power to about 95 homes and businesses.

Like the dozen or so other generator men interviewed for this article, Abu Fatma, 28, and his brother and partner, Hatem Abdul Karim, 22, were good-natured and remarkably unfazed by the hate they engendered.

On a recent afternoon, the brothers were hanging out around the corner from the generator, waiting for the national power grid to shut down so they could jump into action. Next to the generator was a small, windowless hut, not much bigger than the generator itself, containing a mattress and a television. This is where Mr. Karim, as the chief operator, lives round-the-clock.

The way the brothers see it, they are providing a very important service and a very difficult one under difficult circumstances. Rather than complain, they say, their clients should appreciate their hard work in the face of mounting fuel prices, chronic fuel shortages, dirty fuel that clogs up the machinery, the uncertainties of the national grid that require 24-hour vigilance, and costly and time-consuming repairs.

"The people, they only think about themselves," said Abu Fatma, his fingers stained with grease, sounding not so much resentful as resigned. "They complain and complain."

During one generator breakdown, his brother's shack was pummeled with sandals and other shoes, one of the worst insults in the Arab world. Mr. Karim and other generator men say they have been physically attacked by furious customers.

Generally, though, customers will vent by telephone.

"We should start the power at 1 p.m.," said Moyid, co-owner of a generator in a residential section of the upscale Karada neighborhood, who gave only his first name. "If it turns 1:05 and we haven't provided the power, the phone won't stop ringing."

As if on cue, his cellphone rang. It was past 1 p.m.

"I'm very sorry," Moyid told the caller, explaining that he had been distracted by a journalist and had lost track of the time. As he cranked up the generator, which erupted in a roar, one of his partners retrieved another cellphone dedicated to the generator and discovered it had received 30 unanswered phone calls in recent minutes. Everyone laughed.

Generator men insist that the laws of the free market apply to their business — the unhappy customer can always run his line to another generator. (Generator men are squirrelly when it comes to questions about earnings and say, simply, that the competition is tough and their profit margins slender.)

But disgruntled customers are often dissuaded from switching by the expense of running a new wire to another generator and paying a new subscription fee. And for many who switch, life remains the same.

"This year we changed our subscription three times, from bad to worse," said Firas, the university student. His family, he said, had fallen victim to a ploy commonly used by new generator men: they begin by offering more hours and lower rates than their competitors, but once they have captured a share of the market, they lower their hours and raise their rates.

Generator men are supposedly regulated by local district councils, which are charged with ensuring fair rates and energy supply. But many Iraqis say this system is a joke and rarely enforced.

The generator man, said Yusra, the industrial engineer, is just one of many travails Iraqis have to deal with daily, from corruption to foreign meddling to poor public services. "You want to smack him but you have to smile at him," she grumbled. "You can't think about dignity."

"We are a humiliated people," she said.

The generator man, perhaps because of his visibility and accessibility, becomes the embodiment of all that is wrong in Iraq — or, at least, all that is not working as it is supposed to work, which to most people is just about everything.

"Most of our customers are really angry," said Muhammad, a university student and the co-owner of a generator in Karada. He also preferred not to give his full name. He was lounging with his two partners on the carpeted floor of a concrete and brick hut next to their machine, waiting for the national grid to shut down.

"Very few people sympathize with us," he said. "Most care only about themselves."

Unit Makes Do As Army Strives To Plug Gaps (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

FORT STEWART, Ga. — The pressures that the conflict in Iraq is putting on the Army are apparent amid the towering pine trees of southeast Georgia, where the Third Infantry Division is preparing for the likelihood that it will go back to Iraq for a third tour.

DOJ_NMG_0068613

Col. Tom James, who commands the division's Second Brigade, acknowledged that his unit's equipment levels had fallen so low that it now had no tanks or other armored vehicles to use in training and that his soldiers were rated as largely untrained in attack and defense.

The rest of the division, which helped lead the invasion of Iraq in 2003 and conducted the first probes into Baghdad, is moving back to full strength after many months of being a shell of its former self.

But at a time when Pentagon officials are saying the Army is stretched so thin that it may be forced to go back on its pledge to limit National Guard deployment overseas, the division's situation is symptomatic of how the shortages are playing out on the ground.

The enormous strains on equipment and personnel, because of longer-than-expected deployments, have left active Army units with little combat power in reserve. The Second Brigade, for example, has only half of the roughly 3,500 soldiers it is supposed to have. The unit trains on computer simulators, meant to recreate the experience of firing a tank's main gun or driving in a convoy under attack.

"It's a good tool before you get the equipment you need," Colonel James said. But a few years ago, he said, having a combat brigade in a mechanized infantry division at such a low state of readiness would have been "unheard of."

Other than the 17 brigades in Iraq and Afghanistan, only two or three combat brigades in the entire Army — perhaps 7,000 to 10,000 troops — are fully trained and sufficiently equipped to respond quickly to crises, said a senior Army general.

Most other units of the active-duty Army, which is growing to 42 brigades, are resting or being refitted at their home bases. But even that cycle, which is supposed to take two years, is being compressed to a year or less because of the need to prepare units quickly to return to Iraq.

After coming from Iraq in 2003, the Third Infantry Division was sent back in 2005. Then, within weeks of returning home last January, it was told by the Army that one of its four brigades had to be ready to go back again, this time in only 11 months. The three other brigades would have to be ready by mid-2007, Army planners said.

Yet almost all of the division's equipment had been left in Iraq for their replacements, and thousands of its soldiers left the Army or were reassigned shortly after coming home, leaving the division largely hollow. Most senior officers were replaced in June.

In addition to preparing for Iraq, the Army assigned the division other missions it had to be ready to execute, including responding to hurricanes and other natural disasters and deploying to Korea if conflict broke out there.

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, who took command in June, says officials at Army headquarters ask him every month how ready his division is to handle a crisis in Korea. The answer, General Lynch says, is that he is getting there.

Since this summer, 1,000 soldiers a month have been arriving at Fort Stewart, 400 of them just out of basic training. As a result, the First and Third Brigades are now at or near their authorized troop strength, but many of the soldiers are raw.

The two brigades started receiving tanks and other equipment to begin training in the field only in the last month, leaving the division only partly able to respond immediately if called to Korea, General Lynch said.

"I'm confident two of the four brigade combat teams would say, 'O.K., let's go,' " General Lynch said in an interview. "The Second and Fourth Brigades would say, 'O.K., boss, but we've got no equipment. What are we going to use?' So we'd have to figure out where we're going to draw their equipment."

Meanwhile, the division is also preparing for deployment to Iraq on an abbreviated timeline.

The brief time at home does not sit well with some soldiers. Specialist George Patterson, who re-enlisted after returning from Iraq in January, said last week that he was surprised to learn he could end up being home with his wife and daughter for only a year.

"I knew I would be going back," Specialist Patterson said. "Did I think I would leave and go back in the same year? No. It kind of stinks."

Instead of allowing more than a year to prepare to deploy, the First Brigade training schedule has been squeezed into only a few months, so the brigade can be ready to deploy as ordered by early December. Though the unit has not yet been formally designated for Iraq, most soldiers say there is little doubt they are headed there early next year.

DOJ_NMG_0068614

Some combat-skills training not likely to be used in Iraq has been shortened substantially, said Col. John Charlton, the brigade commander. "It's about taking all the requirements and compressing them, which is a challenge," he said.

The timetable also leaves officers and their soldiers less time to form close relationships that can be vital, several officers said.

And soldiers have less time to learn their weapons systems. Many of the major weapons systems, like artillery and even tanks, are unlikely to be used frequently in a counterinsurgency fight like Iraq.

The division has only a few dozen fully armored Humvees for training because most of the vehicles are in use in Iraq. Nor does it have all the tanks and trucks it is supposed to have when at full strength.

"There is enough equipment, and I would almost say just enough equipment," said Lt. Col. Sean Morrissey, the division's logistics officer. "We're accustomed to, 'I need 100 trucks. Where's my hundred trucks?' Well, we're nowhere near that."

Last week, in training areas deep in the Fort Stewart woods, First Brigade soldiers were still learning to use other systems important in Iraq, like unmanned aerial vehicles, which are used for conducting surveillance.

Standing at a training airfield with three of the aircraft nearby, Sgt. Mark Melbourne, the senior noncommissioned officer for the brigade's unmanned aerial vehicles platoon, said only 6 of the brigade's 15 operators had qualified so far in operating the aircraft from a ground station.

All of them are supposed to be qualified by next month, but the training has been slowed by frequent rain, Sergeant Melbourne said.

This week, the First Brigade began a full-scale mission rehearsal for Iraq.

Normally, armored units preparing for Iraq are sent to Fort Irwin, Calif., for such training, but transporting a brigade's worth of equipment and soldiers there takes a month, which the schedule would not permit.

So the trainers and Arabic-speaking role players, who will simulate conditions the unit is likely to encounter in Iraq, were brought here to conduct the three-week exercise in a Georgia pine forest, rather than in the California desert.

British Soldiers Allegedly Traded Guns For Cocaine (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 24 -- A newspaper in Britain reported Sunday that British soldiers had smuggled stolen guns out of Iraq and exchanged them on the black market for cocaine.

A spokesman for the Defense Ministry said Sunday that soldiers had been investigated for the "unlawful possession" of weapons and that prosecutors would decide whether there was enough evidence to file charges. He would not comment on the report that small arms had been exchanged on the black market for drugs.

According to the Sunday Times, the soldiers transported handguns from Iraq to Germany and exchanged some of them for cocaine with a street value of $4,700. The drugs were then sold to soldiers fighting in Iraq, the newspaper reported.

The article said soldiers from the 3rd Battalion, Yorkshire Regiment, which has since returned from Iraq, are at the center of the inquiry.

The allegations come at a time of heightened focus on military misconduct, including reports of increasing drug use among troops in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Additionally, a British soldier pleaded guilty last week to "inhumane" treatment of Iraqi civilians in the death of a hotel receptionist who was allegedly beaten in September 2003 at a British military camp in Basra, a city in southern Iraq. Baha Mousa suffered 93 injuries, prosecutors said, including fractured ribs and a broken nose, before he died.

Six other soldiers charged in connection with his death have pleaded not guilty in the continuing court-martial.

On Saturday, thousands of protesters demanding that Britain withdraw its troops from Iraq and Afghanistan marched in Manchester, England, where Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labor Party opened its annual conference this weekend.

With polls showing public hostility toward Blair and weariness with the ongoing war, the prime minister announced earlier this month that he would step down within a year.

DOJ_NMG_0068615

During an interview with the BBC on Sunday, Blair said the war in Afghanistan, where British soldiers have a particularly large presence, must continue.

"The whole reason we've gone into that as part of the NATO force under the U.N. resolution is because it is essential for the Taliban and al-Qaeda to come back into the southern part of Afghanistan, and it's essential for us to keep them out."

Blair also said the battle with insurgents in southern Afghanistan has been "tougher than anyone expected."

Due Process, Bulldozed (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

Until five months ago, Bilal Hussein was part of a team of Associated Press photographers that had won a Pulitzer Prize for photos documenting the fighting and carnage in Iraq.

Now he's a prisoner, having been seized by the U.S. government.

You might ask: What's he been charged with?

The answer: Nothing.

There was a flurry of interest last week in the case of Maher Arar, a terror suspect who was shipped to Syria and tortured before it was learned that, alas, he was not a terrorist. Mr. Hussein got a little news coverage last week, as well. People who still think there is a place in this world for fairness, justice and due process are calling on the authorities to either charge him with a crime or release him.

Mr. Hussein, an Iraqi hired by The A.P., was taken into custody by U.S. forces in Ramadi last April 12. As in many similar cases, U.S. officials have been saying — without disclosing evidence to back up their comments — that he had improper ties to the insurgents.

But neither the Americans nor the Iraqis have officially charged Mr. Hussein with anything.

Scott Horton, a prominent New York lawyer called in by The A.P. to work on the case, said: "The administration always starts with a broad-brush tarring of these individuals. You'll have officials saying: 'Oh, they're bad dudes. They're evil. We have evidence we can't show you that would demonstrate just how terrible these people are.'

"Well, sometimes they do. But very frequently, alarmingly frequently, they don't."

Mr. Hussein's case closely resembles that of Abdul Ameer Hussein, a cameraman hired by CBS News who was wounded while covering an attack on an American convoy in Mosul on April 5, 2005. He was shot by a U.S. soldier, a sniper who was more than 200 yards away.

Mr. Hussein was taken to a hospital. His camera and videotapes were seized. And despite his CBS press credentials, which were checked out and found to be legitimate, he was arrested by U.S. authorities and imprisoned. Much of his time over the course of the next year was spent in solitary confinement at the Abu Ghraib prison, where he was subjected to coercive interrogation and other indignities.

For what?

American officials were telling reporters, without offering any evidence, that Mr. Hussein had been collaborating with insurgents. He hadn't been. It turned out he was completely innocent. In fact, he was a kind of timid guy who was less than thrilled about having a job that required him to shoot combat footage.

This is a spooky time in history. It's one thing for tyrannical regimes like the old Soviet Union and Communist China to bulldoze the very idea of human rights and human decency by engaging in such atrocities as detention without trial, torture and other forms of state terror. It's something else completely when the United States, the greatest symbol of liberty that the world has ever known, begins to head down that hellish road.

Abdul Ameer Hussein ultimately was able to escape the clutches of the authorities because of the persistent legal effort pushed by CBS News on his behalf. Scott Horton was part of that effort. A year after he was taken into custody, Mr. Hussein, manacled and wearing an orange jumpsuit, was walked into a Baghdad courtroom for a trial. It was quickly determined that the case against him was ludicrous.

DOJ_NMG_0068616

"There was absolutely no evidence against this guy," said Mr. Horton. "Even the attorney general of Iraq said there was no basis for proceeding against him."

The case was dismissed.

Several Iraqi journalists working for international news organizations have been held without charge by American and Iraqi forces. The absence of concrete evidence in so many of the cases is disturbing, to say the least.

"I am absolutely convinced," said Mr. Horton, "that the ton of bricks fell on these two guys — Bilal Hussein and Abdul Ameer Hussein — because they were working as professional journalists. They were the eyes of the world, covering things that the Pentagon doesn't want people in America to see."

A legitimate news organization can't help but experience a shudder at hearing that one of its employees may have been collaborating with the enemy. It's a chilling, devastating allegation. To make that charge recklessly is reprehensible.

The Rise Of Jihadistan (NSWK)

By Ron Moreau, Sami Yousafzai And Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, September 25, 2006

You don't have to drive very far from Kabul these days to find the Taliban. In Ghazni province's Andar district, just over a two-hour trip from the capital on the main southern highway, a thin young man, dressed in brown and wearing a white prayer cap, stands by the roadside waiting for two NEWSWEEK correspondents. It is midday on the central Afghan plains, far from the jihadist-infested mountains to the east and west. Without speaking, the sentinel guides his visitors along a sandy horse trail toward a mud-brick village within sight of the highway. As they get closer a young Taliban fighter carrying a walkie-talkie and an AK-47 rifle pops out from behind a tree. He is manning an improvised explosive device, he explains, in case Afghan or U.S. troops try to enter the village.

In a parched clearing a few hundred yards on, more than 100 Taliban fighters ranging in age from teenagers to a grandfatherly 55-year-old have assembled to meet their provincial commander, Muhammad Sabir. An imposing man with a long, bushy beard, wearing a brown and green turban and a beige shawl over his shoulders, Sabir inspects his troops, all of them armed with AKs and rocket-propelled grenade launchers. He claims to have some 900 fighters, and says the military and psychological tide is turning in their favor. "One year ago we couldn't have had such a meeting at midnight," says Sabir, who is in his mid-40s and looks forward to living out his life as an anti-American jihadist. "Now we gather in broad daylight. The people know we are returning to power."

Not long after NEWSWEEK's visit, U.S. and Afghan National Army forces launched a major attack to dislodge the Taliban from Ghazni and four neighboring provinces. But when NEWSWEEK returned in mid-September, Sabir's fighters were back, performing their afternoon prayers. It is an all too familiar story. Ridge by ridge and valley by valley, the religious zealots who harbored Osama bin Laden before 9/11—and who suffered devastating losses in the U.S. invasion that began five years ago next week—are surging back into the country's center. In the countryside over the past year Taliban guerrillas have filled a power vacuum that had been created by the relatively light NATO and U.S. military footprint of some 40,000 soldiers, and by the weakness of Afghan President Hamid Karzai's administration.

In Ghazni and in six provinces to the south, and in other hot spots to the east, Karzai's government barely exists outside district towns. Hard-core Taliban forces have filled the void by infiltrating from the relatively lawless tribal areas of Pakistan where they had fled at the end of 2001. Once back inside Afghanistan these committed jihadist commanders and fighters, aided by key sympathizers who had remained behind, have raised hundreds, if not thousands, of new, local recruits, many for pay. They feed on the people's disillusion with the lack of economic progress, equity and stability that Karzai's government, NATO, Washington and the international community had promised.

NATO officials say the Taliban seems to be flush with cash, thanks to the guerrillas' alliance with prosperous opium traffickers. The fighters are paid more than $5 a day—good money in Afghanistan, and at least twice what the new Afghan National Army's 30,000 soldiers receive. It's a bad sign, too, that a shortage of local police has led Karzai to approve a plan allowing local warlords—often traffickers themselves—to rebuild their private armies. U.N. officials have spent the past three years trying to disband Afghanistan's irregular militias, which are accused of widespread human-rights abuses. Now the warlords can rearm with the government's blessing. Afghanistan is "unfortunately well on its way" to becoming a "narco-state," NATO's supreme commander, Marine Gen. Jim Jones, said before Congress last week.

DOJ_NMG_0068617

Jabar Shilghari, one of Ghazni's members of Parliament, is appalled by his province's rapid reversal of fortune. Only a year ago he was freely stumping for votes throughout the province. Today it's not safe for him to return to his own village. In a recent meeting he asked Karzai for more police and soldiers; he was rebuffed by the deputy director of intelligence, who told him the Taliban threat in Ghazni is minimal. "We have patiently waited five years for change, for an end to official corruption and abuse of power and for economic development," says Shilghari, who now lives in the increasingly sequestered capital of Kabul. "But we've received nothing."

Not long ago, the Bush administration was fond of pointing to Afghanistan as a model of transformation. That mountainous landlocked country, we were told, was being converted from a "failed state"—Al Qaeda's base for the worst ever attacks on U.S. continental soil—into a functioning, responsible member of the international community. In speech after speech, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other senior U.S. officials ticked off the happy stats: the Taliban and Al Qaeda had been routed, democratic presidential and parliamentary elections had been held, more than 3 million refugees had returned and 1.75 million girls were attending school.

But the harsh truth is that five years after the U.S. invasion on Oct. 7, 2001, most of the good news is confined to Kabul, with its choking rush-hour traffic jams, a construction boom and a handful of air-conditioned shopping malls. Much of the rest of Afghanistan appears to be failing again. Most worrisome, a new failed-state sanctuary is emerging across thousands of square miles along the Afghan-Pakistan border: "Jihadistan," it could be called. It's an autonomous quasi state of religious radicals, mostly belonging to Pashtun tribes who don't recognize the Afghan-Pakistan frontier—an arbitrary line drawn by the British colonialists in 1893. The enclave's fluid borders span a widening belt of territory from mountainous hideouts in the southernmost provinces of Afghanistan—Nimruz, Helmand and Farah—up through the agricultural middle of the country in Ghazni, Uruzgan and Zabul, and then north to Paktia and parts of Konar. It extends well across the Pakistan border where, despite close cooperation between the U.S. and Pakistani militaries, jihadist militants in Waziristan province have begun calling themselves "Pakistani Taliban." No longer worried about interference from Islamabad, they openly recruit young men to fight in Afghanistan, and they hold Islamic kangaroo courts that sometimes stage public executions.

There are not nearly enough U.S., Western or Afghan troops or resources in the field to counter them. At a time when the American president has resurrected Osama bin Laden as public enemy No. 1—comparing him recently to Lenin and Hitler—Bush's own top commander in the field, Army Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, says not enough money is being invested in creating a new Afghanistan. Improving Afghan lives is the only way to drive a stake through the Taliban or put the elusive Qaeda leader out of action, he says. "We need more in terms of investment in Afghan infrastructure. We need more resources, for road building, counternarcotics, good governance, a justice system," Eikenberry told NEWSWEEK last week. As the general is fond of saying: "Where the roads end, the Taliban begin."

Indeed, the aid numbers for the past five years are grim. In the first years of reconstruction, aid amounted to just $67 a year per Afghan, says Beth DeGrasse of the government-funded U.S. Institute of Peace. She compares that figure with other recent nation-building exercises such as Bosnia ($249) and East Timor ($256), citing figures from the International Monetary Fund. "You get what you pay for in these endeavors, and we tried to do Afghanistan on the cheap," she says. "And we are going to pay for it." International conferences since 2002 have pledged some $15 billion, but countries have ponied up less than half of that so far. And the Afghan government estimates it will need $27.5 billion through 2010 to rebuild the country and its institutions.

Some critics point to a jarring mismatch between Bush's rhetoric and the scant attention paid to Afghanistan. Jim Dobbins, Bush's former special envoy to Kabul—he also led the Clinton administration's rebuilding efforts in Bosnia, Kosovo, Haiti and Somalia—calls Afghanistan the "most under-resourced nation-building effort in history." Former Bush reconstruction coordinator Carlos Pascual, who retired in December 2005, does not dispute this assessment. He says the State Department has "maybe 20 to 30 percent" of the people it needs. Even Republican Sen. Richard Lugar, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, fretted last week that for five years the administration and Congress have failed to create a powerful nation-building czar, despite their enthusiasm for regime change. "We have a long way to go," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068618

The dangers of allowing Afghanistan to become a jihadist haven again are too many to count. It's not merely that bin Laden and Zawahiri may now die peacefully in their beds, safe among Pashtun tribesmen, as a senior U.S. military official conceded to NEWSWEEK last week, speaking anonymously because he was discussing classified operations. (A French intelligence report leaked over the weekend suggested bin Laden had done just that in August, dying quietly of typhus, but like many such rumors in the past it could not be confirmed.) Nor is the problem simply that the increasingly confident Taliban is launching ever more brazen attacks—in recent weeks, bombing a convoy scarcely a block from the U.S. Embassy in Kabul and assassinating a major provincial governor.

No: it's that Al Qaeda or other terrorist groups now have a place from which to hatch the next 9/11. "This standoff could go on for 40 or 50 years," says a retired U.S. general who served in Afghanistan, speaking only on condition of anonymity. "It's not going to be a takeover by the Taliban as long as NATO is there. Instead this is going to be like the triborder region of South America, or like Kashmir, a long, drawn-out stalemate where everyone carves out spheres of influence." Eikenberry disagrees, though he refused to put a time frame on Afghanistan's recovery. "It won't be decades," he says.

The Taliban doesn't always share Al Qaeda's goals or tactics, although some units have taken up suicide bombing. But a guerrilla calling himself Commander Hemat, a former anti-Soviet mujahedin fighter who now works closely with the Taliban and Al Qaeda, says foreign Arabs are being welcomed again. "Now the money is flowing again because the insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan are producing results," he told NEWSWEEK. Zabibullah, a Taliban operative who has proved reliable in the past, says the Qaeda operatives "feel more secure and can concentrate on their own business other than just surviving."

Pakistan fostered the Taliban movement in the 1990s as a way of holding sway over Afghanistan and undercutting India's influence there. Those ties persist. Despite Bush's praise of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf—"We're on the hunt together," Bush said at a joint news conference on Friday—U.S. and British military officials say Musharraf has allowed the Taliban to set up headquarters near the southwestern city of Quetta. Musharraf has also cut a deal giving militants free rein in north Waziristan; since then cross-border attacks have increased. Senior U.S. officials say that Musharraf caved in to Qaeda sympathizers who fiercely resisted the Pakistani Army's incursion into the tribal region last year. Musharraf reassured Bush last week that the Waziristan tribal leaders had agreed not to permit Taliban or Qaeda cross-border activity, but the militants say no such commitment was made. "Instead of eliminating the militants, the Pakistani military operation only added to their strength," says Ayaz Amir, a respected political columnist for the daily Dawn newspaper. The Afghan Taliban's recent offensive has only raised the morale of their Pakistani brethren.

General Eikenberry says that Al Qaeda or its successors have nothing like the liberty that allowed them to plot 9/11 in the open. "They have no safe haven inside Afghanistan that if we find it, we will not strike against them," he said. But conclusive victory will depend on a "political solution" arising from a far more effective Afghan government, Eikenberry says. Asked whether terrorists will always have a place to root there, Eikenberry pauses for long seconds before answering. "You reach a tipping point" where military superiority no longer counts as much, he said. "There's always going to be another valley for terrorist forces or extremists to hide in."

No one knows this better than Eikenberry himself, a genial soldier-scholar with degrees from Harvard and Stanford. Two weeks after NEWSWEEK's visit to Ghazni province's Andar district, the American general passed through the same area and urged Afghan security forces to be more active in combating the increasingly aggressive, large and visible Taliban presence.

Days later, Eikenberry launched his major Afghan-U.S. operation in Ghazni, code-named Mountain Fury. Most of the Taliban had easily escaped to the east while a number of insurgents remained behind to engage the enemy, firing automatic weapons and RPGs. According to Afghan officials, about 38 Taliban were killed that day. Interviewed after the action, Momin Ahmad, the Taliban's deputy commander for a cluster of Andar villages, disputes that number. He says he lost only four men: a Pakistani, an Iraqi and two local insurgents who were killed by an Apache helicopter that shot up a local vineyard.

And while Ahmad's unit is now regrouping to the east, at least 35 Taliban have stashed their weapons and stayed in the village posing as farmers. They will lay ambushes and plant IEDs to harass Afghan and U.S. troops, Ahmad says, and the larger Taliban force will return when it's safe. He shrugs off the setback, saying it's only temporary. "We never expected the success we've had," says Ahmad. Nor, five years ago, did anyone else.

DOJ_NMG_0068619

NATO Details Airstrikes In Afghanistan (AP)

By Rahim Faiez

AP, September 25, 2006

NATO forces killed more than 60 suspected insurgents the last several days in an increasingly volatile southern Afghan province while suffering no casualties, the military alliance said Sunday.

Afghanistan's Ministry of Defense said 40 Taliban fighters were killed by NATO airstrikes that "completely destroyed" a militant base in the district of Grishk on Saturday. Maj. Luke Knittig, a NATO spokesman, said the alliance also estimated about 40 fighters were killed.

A NATO helicopter, meanwhile, fired on about 20 insurgents attacking a NATO patrol in neighboring Naw Zad district Friday, killing 15 of the rebels, the alliance said.

In a third incident, an attack helicopter fired on a group of insurgents who shot at a support helicopter Thursday, killing eight of the militants in nearby Sangin district, the statement said.

NATO troops, mostly from Canada and Britain, moved into southern Afghanistan earlier this summer, taking over from a U.S.-led force in a region that in recent months has seen some of the fiercest fighting since the Taliban regime was defeated in late 2001.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, whose country has about 5,000 soldiers in southern Helmand province, said Sunday that NATO's battle with Afghan insurgents has been more difficult than anticipated but must continue.

"I think the particular mission was tougher than anyone expected. But I'm not surprised it was tough," Blair said in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp.

He said the Taliban and al-Qaida are trying hard to gain control in Afghanistan's south and "it's essential for us to keep them out."

Blair's government has had to cope with charges by middle-ranking officers in Afghanistan that ground troops have not received adequate air support and other backing.

Adm. Edmund P. Giambastiani Jr., vice chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, said during a visit to Afghanistan earlier this month that the U.S. military is better able to detect roadside bombs before they detonate thanks in part to the creation of an anti-explosives team.

"Now we must work harder every day toward reducing our numbers of causalities from these horrible attacks," said Giambastiani, according to statements released Sunday by the U.S. military.

Taliban fighters have increasingly used suicide and roadside bombs to attack Western troops and Afghan civilians.

The anti-explosives team focuses on trends, techniques, tactics and procedures used in developing the devices and the information is passed on to troops in the field, the statement said.

Giambastiani said the Navy and Air Force are sending electronic warfare officers to Afghanistan and Iraq to work on counter-explosives measures. He said the military planned to purchase route-clearing equipment for use in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

NATO has about 20,000 soldiers in Afghanistan, while the United States has an additional 21,000, mostly in the eastern part of the country along the border with Pakistan.

Losing Afghanistan (WSJ)

By John Kerry

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

As we marked the fifth anniversary of the worst attack on American soil, there was enormous discussion of the lessons of 9/11. But after the bagpipes stopped, and news coverage turned to other issues, perhaps the first lesson of that day seemed quickly forgotten: We cannot allow Afghanistan to become a terrorist stronghold and a staging ground for attacks on America.

If Washington seems to have forgotten Afghanistan, it is clear the Taliban and al Qaeda have not. Less than five years after American troops masterfully toppled the Taliban, the disastrous diversion in Iraq has allowed these radicals the chance to rise again. Time is running out to reverse an unfolding disaster in the war we were right to fight after 9/11.

DOJ_NMG_0068620

Funded largely by a flourishing opium trade, a resurgent Taliban effectively controls entire swathes of southern Afghanistan. Roadside bomb attacks have more than doubled this year, and suicide attacks have more than tripled. Britain's commander in Afghanistan recently said that "the intensity and ferocity of the fighting is far greater than in Iraq on a daily basis."

Al Qaeda is again taking advantage: The recent plot to blow up U.S.-bound jets was reportedly masterminded by an al Qaeda affiliate operating from Afghanistan. The same killers who attacked us on 9/11 are still plotting against America -- and they're still holed up in Afghanistan. President Karzai put it simply: "The same enemies that blew up themselves in . . . the twin towers in America are still around." And while President Bush frequently quotes Ayman al-Zawahiri, he hasn't mentioned that on the fifth anniversary of 9/11 al Qaeda's No. 2 described the situation in Afghanistan as "very good."

When did denying al Qaeda a safe haven in Afghanistan cease to be an urgent American priority? Somehow, we ended up with seven times more troops in Iraq -- which even the administration now admits had nothing to do with 9/11 -- than in Afghanistan, where the killers still roam free. Even as the president claimed we are on the offensive against terrorists, Gen. James Jones, the U.S. commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan, made an urgent plea for more troops to fight the Taliban. President Karzai has also appealed for more troops and support, and on my trip to Afghanistan this year, he stressed to me the importance of a robust American troop presence. And on Sept. 11 this year, U.S. Col. Michael Harrison noted "more troops would be welcome" in the hunt for bin Laden and his henchmen.

Quite simply, we must change course -- starting with the immediate deployment of at least 5,000 additional U.S. troops. That includes more special forces to defeat the Taliban, more civil affairs troops to bolster the promising Provisional Reconstruction Teams, more infantry to prevent Taliban infiltration from Pakistan, and more clandestine intelligence units to hunt al Qaeda on both sides of the border. That also means more predator drones to provide real-time intelligence, more helicopters and transport aircraft to allow rapid deployment, and more heavy combat equipment to overpower enemy forces.

We must also redouble our reconstruction efforts. The Taliban's resurgence comes as no surprise when 40% of the population is unemployed and 90% lack regular electricity. As Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry recently said, "wherever the road ends, that's where the Taliban starts." That's why our generals are asking for more reconstruction funds to win over the local population. Yet this administration has appropriated nearly four times more in reconstruction funds for Iraq than Afghanistan -- and actually cut Afghan aid by 30% this year. We need to substantially increase development aid and take advantage of the improved security provided by additional troops to ensure that reconstruction efforts reach the remote villages where the Taliban finds support. We must ensure that the elected government in Kabul, helped by the U.S. -- not the Taliban, helped by al Qaeda -- rebuilds Afghanistan.

This is especially important to counter the opium trade, which increased 50% last year and now funds insurgents, warlords and terrorists world-wide. We must provide alternative livelihoods for opium farmers and spur the judicial reforms necessary to prevent drug lords from acting with impunity. We cannot -- and should not -- do this alone. Asked which of the 26 countries in the alliance were dragging their feet in Afghanistan, Gen. Jones replied, "All of them." Where allies have pledged troops and assistance, they must follow through. But we must lead by example. That's how you win hearts and minds, and show the world the true face of America -- and that's how you win the war on terror.

Finally, we must use economic leverage to ensure the Taliban no longer finds sanctuary and recruits in Pakistan. Last year we gave Pakistan only $300 million in economic support, about what we spend in a day in Iraq. We need to give more, in development funds earmarked for specific projects that help undermine radicals, and demand more in return from the Musharraf government. We cannot afford to repeat the mistakes of the past. The U.S. must not cut and run from the real front line in the war on terror. We must recommit to victory in Afghanistan.

Mr. Kerry, a senator from Massachusetts, was the 2004 Democratic nominee for president.

Two Deaths Were A 'Clue That Something's Wrong' (LAT)

By Craig Pyes And Kevin Sack

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

A Special Forces team in Afghanistan failed to alert its superiors. Witnesses tell of torture.

DOJ_NMG_0068621

WAZI, Afghanistan — The Green Berets of ODA 2021 were on high alert as their convoy rumbled down the winding, rutted road that day in March 2003. The team had been tipped that armed men loyal to the notoriously volatile warlord Pacha Khan Zadran lay in wait around the bend.

As they approached this mountain village in eastern Afghanistan, the Americans spied the warlord's fighters high on a ridge to their right. They scrambled for cover behind their trucks and Humvees.

Moments later, machine-gun fire and rocket-propelled grenades rained down on their vulnerable position. Though pinned down, the Americans responded with a fusillade of their own.

"The air was snapping like Rice Crispies [sic]," the Special Forces team's newly assigned commander, Chief Warrant Officer Kenneth C. Waller, 32, wrote in a florid after-action report. "So many rounds were flying back and forth that lead was overcoming the oxygen in the air."

The battle raged for 45 minutes, then A-10 attack planes and Apache helicopters flew in and strafed the Afghans into retreat.

There were no casualties among the 17 Americans on patrol that day. "It seemed as if we had an angelic bubble surrounding our position," Waller reported to headquarters.

Though Waller filed several detailed and colorful accounts of the battle, he apparently omitted any mention of what happened next.

As some members of ODA 2021 pursued the warlord's men into the hills, others moved into the village to search the mud-walled houses for fighters.

They detained three unarmed men for questioning. Two of them, brothers Jan and Wakil Mohammed, told the soldiers they were just returning from evening prayers at the mosque and had nothing to do with the shootout.

Suddenly, another band of five or six Green Berets emerged from the hills where they had been chasing Pacha Khan's men. They had no interpreters.

"Those soldiers were running toward us and yelling in English, and we didn't understand what they were saying," Jan Mohammed recalled in an interview. Amid the confusion, he said, his brother grew frantic. Wakil, a woodcutter and father of two, raised his hands and shouted in Pashto, "De Khoday day para ma me vala!" according to his brother. "For God's sake, don't shoot me!"

There was a burst of gunfire from one soldier, Jan Mohammed said, and three rounds ripped into Wakil. One struck him in the mouth. He fell dead at his brother's feet.

At day's end, Waller would report to his chain of command that six enemy fighters had been killed in action.

But the circumstances of Wakil's death were not described in Waller's reports, and Army criminal investigators would later determine that the killing could not be classified as a battlefield casualty. Last year, they listed it as a murder. However, the military has since reopened its probe, and investigators decline to say whether the same charges are being pursued.

It would not be the only questionable death of a detainee in the custody of ODA 2021, nor the only one that leaders of the 10-man field team would fail to disclose to superiors in the Alabama National Guard's 20th Special Forces Group.

Within days of the Wazi killing, an 18-year-old Afghan army recruit named Jamal Naseer died after being interrogated at the team's firebase in Gardez, about 25 miles to the north. Multiple witnesses say his body showed signs of severe beating and other abuse. His brother and six others also held at Gardez say they were tortured.

The commander over all Special Forces in Afghanistan at the time, then-Col. James G. "Greg" Champion, said in a brief interview that neither death was reported up the chain of command. Champion, a National Guardsman who has since been promoted to brigadier general, said he did not hear of the deaths until 18 months later, when he learned that The Times was investigating.

The team's battalion commander also said that neither death was reported to him.

"Two unreported deaths in a few days are a clue that something's wrong" with that team, said a military official familiar with the incidents, who asked not to be identified.

There were others who helped keep the secrets of the base. The United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan, or UNAMA, which was responsible for monitoring human rights abuses, was informed that Naseer's death in Gardez probably involved "torture and other cruel and inhuman treatment" by Special Forces troops. But U.N. officials acknowledge they did not report it to American authorities for at least 13 months, and U.S. officials say it was never reported at all.

DOJ_NMG_0068622

The provincial governor helped conceal the mistreatment by arranging for the late-night removal of Naseer's body from the military base. He also ordered the abrupt transfer of the other detainees from the base to the custody of the local police chief after they had been held many days beyond what military procedures allowed.

Though U.S. commanders in Afghanistan said they did not know about the death, word spread throughout Paktia province, according to Gen. Hajji Abdul Sattar, the Paktia attorney general for intelligence. He said no one spoke out or complained, however, because "people were scared that … the same thing would happen to them."

The Army's Criminal Investigation Command has been examining both deaths and apparent cover-ups for two years, since learning about them from The Times and the Crimes of War Project, a Washington-based nonprofit educational organization, which first confirmed Naseer's death.

ODA 2021's missions and tactics became markedly more aggressive after Waller took charge of the Special Forces detachment in February 2003, a month before the questionable deaths in Wazi and Gardez. He recently had been reassigned from another Special Forces unit, where some of his men complained that his gung-ho leadership style put them at unnecessary risk.

Waller was characterized by several 20th Group officials as deeply affected by the Sept. 11 attacks and having come to Afghanistan "spoiling for a fight."

In Gardez, he was able to set his sights squarely on Pacha Khan, the warlord who had been destabilizing the countryside for months.

Pacha Khan's men were suspected of extorting illegal payments from truckers on the road from Gardez to Khowst, supporting anti-government forces, and staging an ambush that wounded the ODA's battalion chief during a Thanksgiving trip to Gardez.

But at the Pentagon and State Department, Pacha Khan was regarded as a political figure and thus a problem for the new Afghan government, not the U.S. military. The Special Forces team chafed at the political constraints on its freedom to go after him.

Local U.N. officials said they were struck by how deeply personal the conflict between the team and the warlord had become. One of the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity, recalled that one Green Beret likened the team's rivalry with Pacha Khan to a blood feud.

Another U.N. official said the same American soldier had told him that "he was so frustrated with [Pacha Khan] that he was going to kill him."

Tea at Sato Kandaw

Unmanned Predator aircraft patrolled the skies over Paktia province, their cameras trained on the 17 checkpoints along the mountain road linking Khowst and Gardez. What they recorded convinced U.S. intelligence officials that trucks hauling firewood and produce were again being stopped and forced to pay bribes.

At the most infamous checkpoint, atop Sato Kandaw Pass, drivers typically had to pay $10 or $15, according to a March 2, 2003, Army intelligence report. The money was being split between Pacha Khan and a former Taliban official, Jalaludin Haqqani, the report said.

Situated on a bend overlooking a sparsely vegetated valley, the Sato Kandaw checkpoint consisted of living quarters and a small mosque used as an armory. The post was controlled by a former Pacha Khan lieutenant named Ahmad Naseer, better known as Commander Parre. He had recently defected to the Afghan government in exchange for $3,000 and a truck provided by the CIA. He said he saw the future of the country with the Americans, not with Pacha Khan.

Despite the change in management, reports of shakedowns persisted, along with complaints that female travelers were being harassed and that a young boy was being held as a sex slave.

Sato Kandaw was enough of a concern that Raz Mohammed Dalili, then the governor of Paktia, took the unusual step of asking American troops to remove the checkpoint. Dalili, in an interview, said he had made his request to a Special Forces soldier named Mike.

DOJ_NMG_0068623

There was no ODA 2021 member named Mike at the time, military documents show. However, Sgt. 1st Class Michael E. MacMillan, an intelligence analyst and member of the regular Army's 7th Special Forces Group at Ft. Bragg, N.C., was then working with the Gardez unit.

Described in correspondence from Waller as the team's "intelligence agent," MacMillan was assigned to conduct interrogations and collect information for combat operations, including one at Sato Kandaw, according to several people familiar with the team. MacMillan, contacted at his home in North Carolina, declined to be interviewed for this report and shut his door.

Parre and his men had their guards down when the ODA (for Operational Detachment Alpha) arrived at Sato Kandaw on the chilly morning of March 5. He said that they shook hands and that the soldier he knew as Mike asked to talk over green tea.

Parre said he knew Mike because the Americans had stopped by from time to time to collect intelligence. The checkpoint commander thought it odd when some of the Americans scrambled to take positions along the road and on the high bluffs, but Mike assured him it was merely a precaution.

Inside, Parre began cutting chocolate as his cook prepared the tea. Mike asked about his relationship with Pacha Khan. Parre said that before he could respond, two men jumped him from behind, pushing him to the ground so that he could barely breathe.

"They covered me with a hood," Parre said. "The interpreter translated, 'If you move, we'll kill you.' And I told him, 'If there is any problem, we can solve it through negotiation…. We are your friends.' "

In the next room, other American soldiers quickly subdued Parre's men, including his 18-year-old brother, Jamal Naseer. The Afghans were cuffed, hooded and tossed by their bound limbs into vehicles, Parre said.

The Americans also found the boy who allegedly had been pressed into sexual slavery and made plans to return him to his family. Before leaving, ODA 2021 confiscated a stash of munitions and mostly unserviceable weapons and blew them up.

Allegations of Abuse

The detainees said the physical abuse began as soon as they reached the Gardez firebase.

"We were kicked in the small of our back and told to stay straight, and cold water was poured over our body in the open air," Parre told The Times. "They put stones under our knees. We were continuously forced to stay on our knees until we lost the sensation of our legs and couldn't walk."

He said an interrogator ripped off one of his toenails. At another point, he said, someone fired four rounds near his head. The other seven detainees, among them a 23-year-old with one leg, also reported abuse.

Because the detainees were hooded through much of their detention, they said, they could not identify their interrogators, except to note that their speech sounded American.

"They were asking me international questions," Parre said. "Have you met any Al Qaeda leader? Have you gone to Pakistan? To Iran? And who was creating trouble on the highway? But I didn't know any of these things."

He said there were also questions about Pacha Khan. Interrogators had obtained a note from the warlord to Parre promising to make him a division commander. Parre said he told the Americans they no longer had ties.

As the beatings continued, he said, an Afghan interpreter pleaded with him to give the interrogators what they wanted. "Just say anything to get it to stop," Parre quoted the interpreter as saying. He said there were times he felt seconds from death. "I can't tell you the feeling," he said. "Half dead. Half alive."

An American in Gardez at the time said Afghan soldiers working with the Special Forces complained to someone on the team about the mistreatment. The American, who spoke on condition of anonymity, also told The Times that interrogations were taken over after a day or two by a Navy SEAL. The detainees were moved into a tent at a back corner of the base, out of sight, he said.

The Times could not verify any involvement by the Navy commandos, but internal military documents show that SEALs were operating around Gardez during the period. A spokesman for the Naval Criminal Investigative Service said it "was not alerted at any time to the potential of SEAL involvement."

The detention of Parre and his men was no secret in the region. An intelligence summary filed by ODA 2021 shortly after the arrests reported ecstatic reactions from both the Afghan government and the local populace. Gov. Dalili dropped by the firebase to offer congratulations. He reported that President Hamid Karzai was "very pleased," the summary said.

DOJ_NMG_0068624

The team's intelligence reports about the operation flashed across computer screens at the Army's operations center in Bagram, said someone who was present. They also were distributed to NATO forces.

As required, the team reported the detentions to the 20th Group's 1st Battalion, and the information was passed along to the Combined Joint Special Operations Task Force, the command over all Special Forces in Afghanistan.

The detainees were "still undergoing interviews," the team reported after a day, adding, "A lot of intelligence is being generated for follow-on operations."

Under Army procedures, Parre and his men should either have been released after four days or sent to a holding facility in Bagram if interrogations yielded evidence of ties to the Taliban or Al Qaeda.

Internal military records show that after two days of questioning, the Americans did not plan to send the detainees to Bagram. They had been notified earlier in their tour that the arrival of battered prisoners at that base might prompt an investigation, according to the records.

But ODA 2021 also was reluctant to transfer the detainees to local police custody. A March 6 communique from the Special Forces team expressed doubts about the Gardez police chief's loyalty and reliability and said ODA 2021 was working with the governor to find other ways to keep the Sato Kandaw detainees in custody.

At a meeting of security authorities in Gardez, Mike from ODA 2021 warned the police chief and the other local commanders that he would kill them if they released his prisoners, according to U.N. officials who reacted angrily to the blunt talk.

For the moment, however, Parre and his men remained in custody at the firebase, and the beatings continued.

Mission to Wazi

A week after their successful Sato Kandaw operation, Waller and ODA 2021 were ready to push farther into Pacha Khan country. Col. Champion approved plans for what the team described as a simple reconnaissance patrol of the Wazi district.

However, there are indications Waller wanted his team to be prepared for more.

He borrowed two soldiers from another Special Forces team, a security detachment generally excluded from combat operations. And he tried unsuccessfully to enlist members of a commando unit that reported to a different chain of command.

Waller's men loaded an extra machine gun into each truck and stacked in so much ammunition that there was little room for their feet. "We were going hunting this time," one team member said.

If they left Gardez looking for a fight, they found it with Pacha Khan's men on the road outside Wazi.

In his post-battle reports, Waller took obvious relish in describing one of his team's kills to his battalion commander, Lt. Col. Steven W. Duff, who had been wounded in the Thanksgiving ambush in the same region.

Waller told Duff that the team's weaponry sergeant, Joseph T. "Todd" Henderson, "got one of the bastards associated with shooting you. The bastard nearly exploded as the shell ripped through his chest cavity."

The team leader said that his weaponry sergeant "takes this personally since he was on your convoy when you were shot…. Sorry we could not have got them all."

Waller concluded: "This team does not have any [sissies]. You should have seen them laughing during the fight …. Told you we would find them."

The day's events at Wazi had not ended with the shooting of Wakil Mohammed. The victim's brother, Jan, was taken into custody along with a neighbor, Dawood Khan.

Both men told The Times that while held overnight in Gardez, they were forced to kneel and press their foreheads against a wall. Every time they sat back, they said, they were kicked in the small of the back and the chest.

"At first they didn't ask us any questions," Mohammed said. "Everyone who was there took turns kicking me, and when I fell on the ground from the blows they started to stomp on me. We were forced to stay on our knees, and my knees were injured from the stones on the ground. I felt really bad pain in my chest."

He said the Americans eventually asked him about his brother, but he couldn't concentrate. "I kept seeing my brother's face and the gunshot in his mouth," he said.

Dawood Khan said his interrogators asked whether Mohammed was one of Pacha Khan's commanders. "I told them, 'No, he has no connection,' " he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068625

He said that after being beaten he was twice dunked in a tub of icy water and submerged to the verge of drowning. He said he and Mohammed were forced to stay awake through a cold night.

The two villagers were released the next day with clean sets of clothing. A report to headquarters described them as cooperative.

Heroes and 'Idiots'

Waller's bosses at battalion headquarters were thrilled the team had escaped casualties in the attack at Wazi. The National Guardsmen had "performed heroically," a battalion operations officer wrote to Waller, encouraging him to nominate his men for battlefield awards.

He did, later nominating every soldier in the fight, including himself, for either the Silver or Bronze Star, according to military documents.

But in the same laudatory message, the operations officer informed Waller that he had recommended his removal from command of ODA 2021 for, "among other things, the extremely unprofessional remarks" in his reports.

"This is yet another example in a long line of incidents with you that has resulted in this battalion, and more importantly, your teams looking like idiots instead of getting the recognition they rightfully deserve," the battalion officer wrote.

By this time, Champion's 20th Special Forces Group was in the process of turning over the Special Operations task force to its replacement, the 3rd Special Forces Group, based at Ft. Bragg. The new guys were regular Army all the way, and they did not much care for Waller's references to the air "snapping like Rice Crispies" or the team's "angelic bubble" of protection, the operations officer wrote.

"All they see is that we are a Guard unit operating unprofessionally in a combat zone," he wrote. "If Champion wasn't in command yesterday, you would be in a world of shit right now."

A Death in Gardez

In Gardez, the days of detention for Parre and his men continued to mount.

Parre said he believed his brother, Jamal, was subjected to the harshest interrogation because, at only 18, he was perceived to be the most vulnerable. When he first saw Jamal a few days after their capture, his brother's body was already black and blue and swollen, Parre said.

He said Jamal told him the Americans had forced him to stand with arms and legs outstretched as they took turns beating him. He was moaning about the pain in his kidneys and back, Parre said.

On the afternoon Jamal died — Parre fixes the date at March 16, 2003, though that could not be verified — he saw two men assisting his brother, who was having difficulty walking. There was no interpreter, Parre said, so he and an American soldier pantomimed their way through a discussion of Jamal's condition.

First the American jabbed a finger into his arm to show that Jamal had been given an IV drip, Parre said. Then he shook his head to suggest it hadn't worked. He pumped his fist like a heart, and again shook his head negatively. Parre said he didn't fully understand at the time, but he feared the worst. Eventually, he was escorted into a tent to see his brother.

"I thought he was smiling at me, and so I smiled back," Parre recounted. "I thought Jamal wanted to tell me that I was worrying for nothing. And I went to him and shook him and said, 'Jamalah, Jamalah,' and then I realized that he had been martyred."

Parre adjusted the body so that Jamal's head pointed to Mecca, and started to cry.

Later that night, Parre said, several Americans entered the tent, put their hands over their hearts and offered condolences. But he said the man he knew as Mike asserted that Jamal had died of an illness, not at the hands of the Americans.

"No, my brother was healthy," Parre said he responded. "His brain, his heart, his legs, he was not sick. He had no history of sickness or injury in any part of his body. He died because of your cruelty."

ODA 2021 held a team meeting shortly after Jamal's death, according to an American soldier based in Gardez. The team was advised that the Afghan had died of a sex-related infection that shut down his kidneys, the soldier said. The point of the meeting, he said, was "to make sure everybody's on the same sheet of paper — this is what happened to the man," in case there was an investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0068626

Capt. Craig Mallak, medical examiner for the U.S. armed forces, said Naseer's death was never reported to his office. He said it would have been required unless the detainee was deemed to have died of natural causes. Authorities at a civilian hospital in Gardez, where Naseer's body was transferred, said they performed no autopsy.

A hospital worker who prepared the body for burial said in an interview that "it was completely black." Hajji Abdul Qayum said Jamal's face was "dark and looked like it was burned." He said it was "completely swollen, as were his palms, and the soles of his feet were swollen double in size."

"I have no idea what he might have been beaten with," the hospital worker said.

Naseer's mother, Kajala, also viewed her son's body before burial. She told Afghan military investigators that "the entire body was full of injuries."

Dr. Michael Baden, a prominent forensic pathologist who works for the New York State Police, said the descriptions were inconsistent with death by organ failure. "You can't confuse those," he said. "It sounds very much like blunt trauma."

Scars, No Charges

After Jamal died, Gov. Dalili arranged for the late-night transfer of the body to the local hospital, according to an Afghan military inquiry. He also ordered the transfers of Parre and his men to the local jail.

There, local physician Aziz Ulrahman examined the prisoners and described them as battered and bruised, with seeping, unbandaged wounds. He said Parre's feet were black. "We have no terminology for that," he said. "It was caused by blunt-force trauma."

A few days later, a delegation from Afghanistan's Judicial Reform Commission happened to visit the Gardez police station and came face to face with Parre and his men. The delegation, which included a representative from the Italian Embassy and several Afghan jurists, did not report the prisoners' condition, although witnesses said it was discussed.

A political officer with the U.N. mission in Afghanistan was with the group and interviewed Parre and his men. He wrote a detailed memo noting that one Afghan soldier had died in U.S. custody and raising the possibility that Special Forces might have been involved in "cruel and inhuman treatment" of detainees.

Though his memo cautioned that the detainees' accounts should not be taken at face value, it said their wounds and injuries "seemed consistent with their accounts of beating and torture." He recommended that the U.N. report the incident for investigation.

There is no record that U.N. officials informed U.S. or coalition authorities about the Gardez case for at least 13 months, if at all.

Several U.N. officials acknowledged that the report seemed to have fallen into "a black hole" after making its way to the mission's headquarters in Kabul, the Afghan capital.

It was only in the spring of 2004, U.N. officials said, that they forwarded the information to the U.S. Embassy in Kabul. However, Zalmay Khalilzad, who was then the U.S. ambassador to Afghanistan, said he had no recollection of hearing about the case, and no mention of the death was found in embassy records, a spokesman said.

Both Lakhdar Brahimi, head of the U.N. assistance mission when Jamal Naseer died, and his successor, Jean Arnault, declined to comment on the U.N.'s handling of the matter.

Parre and his companions were later moved secretly to a civilian prison in Kabul, still without any formal charges. Afghan military prosecutors immediately launched an investigation into their unexplained detention.

That inquiry produced a 117-page report asserting that the detainees had been tortured and that there was a "strong probability" that one of the men had been "murdered." The report speculated that the prolonged imprisonment was intended to give the detainees' wounds time to heal.

When the Afghan attorney general ordered all seven released, it came after 58 days of captivity. No charges were ever filed against any of the men.

The Last Laugh

It wasn't long after Parre and his men were ousted from Sato Kandaw that ODA 2021 got word that Pacha Khan had reclaimed the checkpoint. The team mounted another patrol to the mountain pass, where a confrontation on the road erupted in gunfire.

DOJ_NMG_0068627

The circumstances remain in dispute. ODA 2021 reported that an enemy vehicle had come barreling toward the American convoy and that the driver had been "engaged and killed," while five other men escaped.

According to Pacha Khan's family, the driver was on his way to get food for the checkpoint's soldiers. The dead driver was the warlord's eldest son, Jalani Khan. His body was left on the roadside.

Several days later, the team reported that every checkpoint along the road from Khowst to Gardez seemed to be clear. Pacha Khan's influence was waning, and much of the credit went to Waller's team.

"The guys in Gardez … are having a significant effect on the area," an official with the Special Operations task force wrote to colleagues.

But with tensions inflamed by the killing of Pacha Khan's son, and with the 20th Group about to head home, Champion reined in the team. Waller's proposals for two patrols targeting the warlord were rejected.

The commander's "gut reaction," explained a March 28 note to Duff from Champion's staff, "is that Chief Waller is just out looking for another fight with PKZ, whom we've been told to back off of …. The [commander] is concerned that guys are rattling the tree, but what they are getting is criminal elements [versus terrorists], and we are not cops."

As they packed their gear in early April, the 20th Group's field commanders were frustrated to be leaving the warlord at large.

"Pacha Khan Zadran is probably now laughing at the Americans," the commander of the Special Forces team in Khowst wrote to superiors.

Maj. Rick Rhyne, the incoming 3rd Group operations chief, shrugged off the complaint.

"There is a reason, most likely political, that we cannot touch him," he wrote. "He can laugh all he wants to."

EPILOGUE: Inquiries Are Underway, so Far Without Charges

In the years since ODA 2021 returned to its red-clay roots, the interrogation methods practiced by some Special Forces units in Afghanistan migrated to Iraq.

Early warnings seem to have been disregarded. In Afghanistan, the International Committee of the Red Cross complained of mistreatment as early as December 2002. It delivered a private report to top U.S. military commanders alleging widespread abuse at the firebases at the very time Parre and his men were being held in Gardez.

The Red Cross had interviewed more than 40 former firebase detainees who described beatings, kickings, verbal threats, sleep and food deprivation, immersion in icy water and prolonged exposure to extreme cold, according to a copy of the previously undisclosed report, which was obtained from U.S. government sources.

Initially, U.S. officials reacted skeptically, dismissing the Red Cross claims.

"Don't get all spun up on this," advised Maj. Rhyne, the Special Operations officer, in a note to battalion commanders. "Just let the teams know there were allegations but no proof."

Capt. Sean McMahon, a judge advocate general for the Special Operations task force, wrote to others on the headquarters staff that the allegations were vague. But he said Lt. Gen. Dan McNeill, then commander of U.S.-led forces in Afghanistan, wanted all interrogators reminded of proper methods.

The interrogators needed to understand, McMahon wrote, that "if they are implementing certain procedures, they must cease."

Some members of ODA 2021 have come under criminal investigation stemming from the deaths of Jamal Naseer and Wakil Mohammed. No one has been charged, and the names of those targeted by the inquiry have not been released.

The Army's Criminal Investigation Command has no timetable for completing the inquiries into either death, spokesman Christopher P. Grey said.

The investigations have proved challenging, he said, because of difficulties locating witnesses and barriers in language and culture. The families refused to allow the exhumation of either victim, citing religious beliefs.

But the investigators also have been hampered by missteps.

When the CID first looked into Naseer's death, it was unable to identify the victim and dropped the matter quickly. After he was identified by The Times and the Crimes of War Project, the case was reopened. In Mohammed's case, investigators operated for at least a year under the assumption that he had died two months earlier than he did.

DOJ_NMG_0068628

Last year, Army investigators recommended that one soldier be charged with murder in the Wazi shooting, and another with dereliction of duty for not reporting the incident. The recommendations were sent to the U.S. Army Special Forces Command at Ft. Bragg.

The case was reopened last year, and the CID spokesman would not say whether the agency was pursuing similar charges more than a year later.

The Times attempted to interview every member of ODA 2021 and others in the chain of command. One who declined to be interviewed was former team leader Waller, who said he preferred to let the military legal system finish its work. "I'm not at liberty to discuss it while it's under investigation," he said. Waller continues to work full time at the 20th Group headquarters. Champion, the National Guard colonel who directed all Special Forces in Afghanistan in 2002-03, was promoted to general in 2004. He recently completed a tour as deputy commanding general over all operations in Afghanistan.

He acknowledged in a telephone interview that he had been contacted by Army investigators, but he declined to comment further.

"We'll see what happens with the investigation and where it goes," he said.

Pacha Khan remained a problem for the American forces well after the 20th Group's departure.

Over the next two years, however, the warlord grudgingly ended hostilities with the Afghan government and became part of it.

In 2004, his youngest son was appointed governor of the new administrative district of Wazi Zadran. And last fall, the warlord himself made a bid for elected office.

Today, the nemesis of ODA 2021 is a member of the new Afghan parliament.

*

About this series

*

"Firebase Gardez" examines the deployment to Afghanistan of a decorated Alabama National Guard unit. It is the result of a yearlong investigation in the U.S. and Afghanistan by Times staff writer Kevin Sack and freelance investigative journalist Craig Pyes. It was written by Sack.

Pyes, a two-time Pulitzer Prize winner and frequent contributor to the newspaper, reported from Afghanistan jointly for The Times and the Crimes of War Project, a Washington-based nonprofit that describes itself as "a collaboration of journalists, lawyers and scholars dedicated to raising public awareness of the laws of war." In 2004, the group provided The Times with the first evidence of an unreported Afghan death in U.S. custody and joined with the newspaper to investigate further. That led to a military inquiry by the Army's Criminal Investigation Command that continues today.

The Times reviewed thousands of pages of internal military documents to reconstruct the period when a 10-member Special Forces combat team called ODA 2021 (for Operational Detachment Alpha) was assigned to the Gardez firebase.

Every member of the team was contacted. Most declined to be interviewed or referred reporters to public affairs officers. The Army and all of its subordinate commands — the U.S. Central Command, U.S. Special Operations Command, Army Special Forces Command, 20th Special Forces Group and the Alabama National Guard — declined to comment.

Times researchers Nona Yates and Janet Lundblad contributed to these reports.

kevin.sack@latimes.com

craig.pyes@latimes.com

Army Explores Issue Of Living Wills As More Return From War In Comas (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya, Usa Today

USA Today, September 25, 2006

A growing number of troops are returning from Iraq and Afghanistan with severe brain damage, prompting the Army to examine whether living wills or other care directives from soldiers ought to be available to battlefield doctors.

The issue was raised this summer by wounded soldiers and families of casualties during a symposium sponsored by the Army's Wounded Warrior Program.

FAMILIES REORDER LIVES: Catastrophic wounds mean lifetime care

"With technology as good as it is, they can keep that soldier alive, but they can't put their hands on a digitized piece of paper" containing a do-not-resuscitate order, says Ed Salau, a former Army lieutenant who lost his left leg during combat in Iraq. He was one of 40 people at the June symposium.

Army officials say they plan more symposiums to hear from wounded soldiers and their families, but they make no promises about what steps they might take.

From January 2003 through July, the Pentagon identified at least 250 troops who returned from war with head wounds that left them — at least initially — comatose or unable to care for themselves or respond to people. Brain injuries, most from roadside bombs, are the signature wound of the Iraq war.

The number is a small part of the 20,000 troops wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan, but it is "unprecedented," says Dale Smith, professor of medical history at the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences in Bethesda, Md. "All of these (comatose) people died in former wars before they got home."

Troops can fill out living wills instructing doctors to withhold care. Those at the symposium recommended that troops be better educated about the process and that the wills be accessible to doctors.

Today, field surgeons unaware of last wishes say they often keep soldiers with crippling brain injuries alive and fly them to the USA. That allows families a chance to get closure and to make decisions about organ donation, says Brett Schlifka, an Army neurosurgeon. It also might leave relatives to decide whether to withhold life support.

Not every family member favors a move toward living wills. Sarah Wade, whose husband, Ted, suffered a major head injury from a roadside blast in Iraq in 2004, says she has mixed feelings. If her husband had a living will, he might have directed doctors not to take the steps that saved his life, she says. Since he was sent back to the USA, his condition has improved, she says. "I'm leaning against it," she says of giving combat surgeons access to do-not-resuscitate orders.

Army Col. Mary Carstensen, director of the Wounded Warrior Program, says the concerns raised at the symposium are being sent to appropriate offices within the Army, Pentagon and Department of Veterans Affairs.

"There was so much emotion behind each one of these issues that we know we have to do something," she says.

Families Bear Catastrophic War Wounds (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Army chaplain Kenneth Kaibel touched a cup of Communion wine to the lips of Spc. Ethan Biggers, who lay comatose at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. A drop slipped down his throat. The soldier gagged and coughed twice as his stepmother, Cheryl Biggers, cradled him ever more closely.

"That's all right," she whispered, her left hand gently supporting the base of his head. Depressions revealed where battlefield surgeons peeled back his scalp and removed large sections of skull to relieve swelling from a bullet fired by a sniper in Iraq in March.

His stepmother grasped his clenched fingers and kept her face close to his. "I want to make sure that he knows that I have him," Cheryl Biggers explained.

That was in June. Ethan Biggers, 22, was later transferred to a Department of Veterans Affairs hospital in Tampa and remains in a near-coma state.

"He can hear us. He opens his eyes. And we think he can follow our voices," says Cheryl Biggers, 51. "But he can't quite focus."

Biggers is part of a small but growing number of catastrophically wounded casualties from Iraq and Afghanistan — many of whom would never have survived this long in previous wars.

According to the Pentagon, at least 250 soldiers and Marines have returned from Iraq and Afghanistan with head wounds that left them — at least initially — comatose or unable to care for themselves.

ARMY MULLS LIVING WILLS: More returning from war with brain damage

DOJ_NMG_0068630

"We all look at the amputees and say, 'God, they're really lucky,' " says Liza Biggers, 25, who left her career as a freelance artist to devote all her time to her brother.

Families' lives rearranged

Families of these wrecked young men contend not only with the shock of seeing the physical destruction to their loved ones but also with how their own lives change dramatically. Parents and siblings give up careers, forsake wages and reconstruct homes to care for wounded relatives rather than consign them to a nursing home.

"My son is in such a state," says Edgar Edmundson, 51, who left his job as a pie bakery supervisor to care full time for his son, Eric, 26, an Army sergeant. "He doesn't have control of his bladder or his bowels. He can't walk and he can't talk. ... To me, his father, the life my son knew is over."

Eric Edmundson, married and the father of a 20-month-old girl, was hurt in a roadside explosion Oct. 2 in Iraq. During surgery, his heart stopped and he suffered severe brain damage. His father, who had dreams of one day opening a gun and bait shop with his only son, now bathes and changes him daily and takes him to a rehabilitation center for physical therapy. Edgar Edmundson and his wife, Beth, who works as a state office supervisor, share a three-bedroom rental home in New Bern, N.C., with their son and his family.

"I guess you could say we don't have any disposable income," Edgar Edmundson says. "I live this every day. My son and I were very close. We had big plans."

Families say they also struggle with military and VA medical systems that were unprepared for these severely brain-damaged casualties.

They say the rehabilitation of catastrophic cases has not kept pace with the advances in battlefield medicine that kept these servicemembers alive and brought them home safely.

"They're saving their lives. But there is no system really in place to give them their life back," says Marissa Behee, whose husband, Jarod, 27, was shot in the head by a sniper in Iraq on May 25, 2005.

She says her husband showed little improvement after spending three months in the summer of 2005 in one of the VA's new polytrauma centers in Palo Alto, Calif. The centers are designed specifically to treat servicemembers suffering multiple injuries.

Help for soldiers, families

VA officials defend their programs and say they have made great strides in meeting these severe needs with their polytrauma facilities. By the end of this fiscal year, 21 new outpatient centers designed to monitor and continue treating rehab patients will be operating, officials say. They concede, however, that war has brought new challenges.

"There are some issues about family support, issues about the complexity of the medical and specialized needs that have to be addressed," says Lucille "Lu" Beck, chief consultant to the VA for rehabilitative services. "We have survivors now who come to us with medical conditions, rehab needs, multiple impairments that we've not seen before."

Behee has formed a foundation called Heroes with Head Injuries to provide other families with information on how to navigate the military medical system with a brain-damaged loved one.

In an effort to address concerns about military care, the Army's Wounded Warrior Program, which serves as an advocate for severely disabled soldiers and their families, held the first in a series of symposiums with wounded soldiers and family members. In June, the Army asked the more than 40 attendees to go through dozens of complaints and narrow them to a manageable list. Among the issues raised: problems in the process of notifying families about casualties; a shortage of trained case managers; the adequacy of rehabilitation for severely brain-damaged soldiers; confusion about the medical retirement process; and the need for more financial support for families.

"They are being pushed to the highest level," says Army Col. Mary Carstensen, director of the Wounded Warrior Program.

One recommendation from the symposium was for the military to more aggressively urge soldiers to fill out living wills containing directives about whether medical treatment should be withheld in the event of a dire brain injury.

Ethan Biggers' family is divided. His twin brother, Matt, a former soldier, believes Ethan wouldn't have wanted extraordinary steps taken to preserve his life.

DOJ_NMG_0068631

Army Maj. Ronald Riechers, a neurologist who treated Ethan Biggers at Walter Reed, is grim about his future. He says Biggers could either remain in a near-coma or progress to requiring significant lifelong assistance. Perhaps he would be able to sit in a wheelchair, Riechers says.

Cheryl and Liza Biggers believe they see incremental improvement in Ethan and hold out hope. Ethan Biggers' wife, Britni, hopes her husband will someday recognize the couple's son, Eben, born June 2.

Liza Biggers works with hospital staff to stimulate responses from her brother, using Britni's Cotton Blossom body lotion, peeled oranges and Tootsie Rolls.

"I feel that we're here to get Ethan better," she says. "It's not asking too much to sacrifice a year or two of our lives to get Ethan back."

They suffered a setback July 27 when Ethan's father, Rand Biggers, died in a traffic accident. He had shepherded his son through the military's medical system. "I believe in God," he had said. "Something goodwill come out of it."

Today, the Biggers family continues its vigil at Ethan's bedside.

Cheryl Biggers says that for soldiers like her stepson, their last waking thought was of war. "I want to make sure that he knows where he is, that he's safe. We wouldn't be here with him unless it was safe, and trying to convince him to wake up," she says softly, cradling Ethan.

"Come on out and join us," she tells him. "Everybody's waiting."

Backstory: Enlisting Churches To Help Soldiers (CSM)

By Sean J. Miller

The Christian Science Monitor, September 25, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS

John Morris, a military chaplain, stands at the front of a crowded conference room dressed in desert fatigues and tan combat boots, commanding his audience's attention with a tone barely above a whisper. Addressing some 30 Minnesota church leaders, Major Morris opens with a story about his time in Anbar Province, an insurgent stronghold in western Iraq.

"When the insurgents found out a new unit was there, they would walk a child in front of our convoys," he recalls. "What does a good Minnesota person do? Stop. You only do that one time, because you get ambushed and someone gets maimed or killed."

It's a chilling story, which Morris heard from numerous soldiers in combat, meant to convey the reality of war - and the kind of psychological stress soldiers go through in the field and when they come home.

Morris is on a mission. Since returning from the Middle East, the deputy state chaplain of the Minnesota Army National Guard has labored to convince members of Minnesota's religious community - many of whom oppose the war - to support the soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. More than that, he wants them to be frontline counselors and comforters.

"Sociologists or psychologists - they're great, they're helpful," Morris tells the audience. "But when I get to this issue, I have to always tell them, 'I'm sorry but there are people better qualified than you to handle this: religious leaders.' You're the healers. You bring reconciliation."

***

Morris is tall, with close-cropped brown hair and smooth features. He projects a calm, commanding presence that comes from experience hard earned. In April 2004, he was deployed with the US troops who surrounded Fallujah in response to four American contractors being killed and mutilated. While the battle for Fallujah raged, Morris circled the area in an armored Humvee offering Protestant Easter sunrise services to the support troops. The brutality of the conflict tested even his Christianity.

"That's probably the closest I've ever come to hate," says Morris."I came so close to the mentality: 'Kill them all and God is on our side.' Spiritual discipline held me back from that abyss."

Morris's spiritual discipline was still being tested two months after he returned home to Roseville, Minn. He was experiencing violent mood swings. His anger erupted at the slightest provocation, as when someone cut in front of him in a line at the airport. Morris wondered what combat soldiers must face after coming home.

"I'm a chaplain and I didn't pull a trigger and didn't take a human life, and I'm this mad," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0068632

The horrors of war do shadow American soldiers. According to a 2004 study published in the New England Journal of Medicine, 17 percent of combat veterans arrive home with mental health issues, ranging from depression to posttraumatic stress disorder.

National Guard soldiers face their own peculiar problems. They experience a rapid change from military to civilian life. In less than two weeks, once their tours in Iraq or Afghanistan are up, they can go from dodging roadside bombs and insurgent ambushes, to picking up Starbucks and rushing to a business meeting. Moreover, not since World War II have so many Guard soldiers served in combat and had to reintegrate into civilian life.

The Pentagon has learned - often the hard way - that returning soldiers need long-term support with the transition. "We didn't do it for the Vietnam vets, and in a sense we're paying for that now," says David Segal, a military sociologist at the University of Maryland.

Guard soldiers are entitled to the same counseling and support services offered to members of other branches of the military. But they often live hundreds of miles from the nearest military post, which can make counseling difficult.

Minnesota's program is unusual because - in addition to offering spiritual counseling - it requires Guard soldiers to report back to their barracks 30, 60, and 90 days after they're home. This is actually in violation of Pentagon policy, which insists that Guard members are "on leave" and cannot be called back. But Morris calls this time the "golden, hour," and feels it's critical to keep members connected and supported.

"I'm proud to tell you that, in Minnesota, we are in open violation of that Department of Defense policy," he says.

In the last year, he's had two soldiers tell him that they planned to kill themselves after they reported back to their barracks. Morris says he got those soldiers counseling, which they may not have received otherwise.

Another soldier Morris helped was Sgt. Ron Huff, an 18-year veteran of the Army National Guard. Sergeant Huff recently spent a year in Iraq clearing improvised explosive devises from the highway between Tikrit and Kirkuk. In his first month home, he couldn't switch out of his Iraq driving style and was ticketed four times for speeding by the same sheriff's deputy. Later, he experienced flashbacks, turned to alcohol, and totaled his motorcycle.

In Iraq, Huff commanded 35 soldiers - who affectionately called him "Huff Daddy" - but back home he didn't know where, or how, to ask for help. That's when Morris walked into his office. As Huff recalls it, Morris made him realize that "I'm not the only one who feels crazy." Huff and Morris now work together. "He's the smart guy and I'm the common sense guy," Huff says.

***

In the year sinc Morris started his church outreach programcalled "Beyond the Yellow Ribbon," Minnesota hasn't lost a Guard to suicide. The idea is to ask churches with soldiers in their congregations to become "military friendly." Morris encourages them to take care of the service members and their families - bringing them meals, providing marital counseling, or just listening.

Pastors, he says, can publicly welcome soldiers home and acknowledge their service. They can also watch for signs of reckless behavior.

The program "is a step in the right direction," says Prof. Segal, the military sociologist. "I think it will make the transition easier."

Yet not everyone is enamored of Morris's program. Gary Kohls, a lay member of Every Church a Peace Church, a national group that encourages churches to preach pacifism, says Christians shouldn't engage in combat, even if they're soldiers. "We take the stance that [combat trauma] could be prevented totally, by refusing to engage in homicidal violence," says Dr. Kohls, the leader of a worship community in Duluth, Minn. "I'm very disappointed when churches are either silent or vocally in support of killing."

It took until late July for Minnesota's religious leaders to accept an invitation to hear Morris address the problems faced by returning Guard soldiers. When the chaplain finished his presentation and the applause died down, he made a heartfelt request. "Please, do not repeat what we did to Vietnam veterans," he said.

One pastor who listened that morning - and won't - was Don Britt. His church, the United Church of Christ, has opposed the war in Iraq. "I hate war and I hate this war in particular," says Mr. Britt. "But I have a son there."

DOJ_NMG_0068633

Britt says listening to Morris will help him raise his congregation's awareness of his son, Dan, and other soldiers' experience. "Hopefully, a lot more people will make the distinction between the politicians making the decisions to send these guys to war and our soldiers," he says.

DOJ:

Wainstein Confirmed For New DOJ Post (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz And Brendan Smith, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 25, 2006

The senatorial stalemate over U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia Kenneth Wainstein's nomination to head the new National Security Division in the Justice Department ended last week when Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) backed down, clearing the way for Wainstein's unanimous confirmation.

Levin single-handedly blocked a confirmation vote on Wainstein for months because the Justice Department wouldn't release records Levin wanted concerning FBI agents' objections to Defense Department interrogation techniques used on terrorism detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. Wainstein served as FBI general counsel in 2003 and chief of staff for FBI Director Robert Mueller in 2004.

On the Senate floor Sept. 21, Levin said he was still "troubled by the Department of Justice's stonewalling of my requests," but he acknowledged Wainstein did not control the documents and had been forthcoming during his nomination.

"It really hasn't been that trying," Wainstein says of the delays. "I've been doing the greatest job in the world — as U.S. attorney in D.C."

Wainstein says the consolidation of Justice's national-security assets in one division will improve communication and accountability. "There is no higher priority than counterterrorism these days," he says. As U.S. attorney for the past two years, the 44-year-old Northern Virginia native created a stand-alone homicide unit and a program targeting gangs.

On Friday the Justice Department appointed Jeffrey Taylor, counselor to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, to replace Wainstein. From 1995 to 1999, Taylor was a federal prosecutor in San Diego handling drug cases. He spent the next three years detailed to the Senate Judiciary Committee under Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), where he helped craft the USA Patriot Act. Taylor returned to San Diego before joining then-Attorney General John Ashcroft as counsel for criminal and national security matters.

Some observers question Taylor's lack of experience with the D.C. office, the nation's largest U.S. Attorney's Office and the only one that also handles local criminal cases. But Gonzales said in a statement that Taylor's "legal skills, leadership ability, and personable approach to doing business will make this time of transition for the U.S. Attorney's Office very smooth and productive."

Emma Schwartz can be contacted at eschwartz@alm.com. Brendan Smith can be contacted at blsmith@alm.com.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

HP Chief Tackles Boardroom Scandal Head-on (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins And Jon Swartz

USA Today, September 25, 2006

Mark Hurd admits company ran

covert probes in which investigators spied on directors, journalists, others

PALO ALTO, Calif. — Embattled Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd, trying to seize control of a burgeoning boardroom spying scandal, faces renewed questions this week over a news-leak probe that spurred the forced resignation last week of HP's chairwoman.

Hurd and the tech giant's new criminal defense law firm last week confirmed that he and former chairwoman Patricia Dunn were more deeply involved in some of the probe's unsavory tactics than Dunn and HP had previously acknowledged.

DOJ_NMG_0068634

Hurd's remarks, his most extensive so far, capped a searing week in which HP was pummeled by published reports detailing the probe — and Wall Street's unease about Hurd's role in a case that is the focus of growing federal and state law-enforcement probes.

At a news conference drawing dozens of reporters, Hurd said he approved a plan to send an e-mail to a journalist containing false information to trick her into revealing her sources. He said he felt "strongly" that the leaks had hurt HP's reputation but acknowledged he had not read a report on the probe's early findings addressed to him.

"I could have, and I should have," he said.

Hurd and one of HP's new criminal defense attorneys, Michael Holston, left unanswered several key questions about how the news-leak probe went so seriously awry.

Holston said it was unclear whether HP employees had supplied Social Security numbers of journalists, board members and a company employee to private investigators who used that information to get personal phone records. Also, Holston said a review by his firm had not found evidence "so far" that the probe used telephone wiretapping, leaving open the possibility that evidence of such tactics may still emerge as the review continues.

Dunn resigned as director Friday at the board's request; she was to relinquish the chairmanship in January but keep her board seat. Hurd assumed her title immediately.

Media reports over the weekend said two Hewlett-Packard executives who played key roles in the news-leak probe are about to leave the company.

A source familiar with the matter confirmed that those executives are senior counsel Kevin Hunsaker and Anthony Gentilucci, head of global security. Hunsaker directed the probe's second phase, "Kona II," and assured HP the tactics used were legal, said Holston, an attorney with Morgan Lewis & Bockius.

In a statement, Dunn defended herself anew, saying she had "followed the proper processes" and had not chosen the people who conducted the probe.

"The people HP relied upon to conduct this type of investigation let me and the company down," she said.

Hurd, 49, hired as CEO last year, apologized to the journalists who had been investigated. He did not answer questions at the conference. Dunn did not attend.

Hurd said the probe's intent was "absolutely proper and appropriate." Still, he said, "some of the findings that Morgan Lewis has uncovered are very disturbing to me."

Hurd and Holston gave details of the firm's review — involving more than a million pages of documents — that for the first time confirmed many details reported by news organizations: The company ran two covert probes, code-named "Kona I" and "Kona II," starting early last year, in which private investigators spied on HP directors, journalists, employees, spouses and other relatives. The probes drew on "hundreds" of personal phone calling records of those individuals.

Investigators sent a CNet tech news reporter an e-mail containing hidden software to trick her into revealing her sources and physically followed her and kept an eye on her home, Holston said. Investigators tailed director George Keyworth, his wife and possibly other relatives to his Northern California home and at a meeting in Boulder, Colo. The review found evidence investigators had rifled through individuals' trash.

Gentilucci gave an HP employee's Social Security number to a private investigator to get phone-call records, Holston said. Investigators also got Social Security numbers of three journalists, three directors and an HP employee.

Investigators considered "undercover operations" at the San Francisco offices of The Wall Street Journal and CNet, although Holston said there was no evidence those operations were carried out.

At Friday's conference, Hurd acknowledged what has worried investors: The probe and its aftermath are sapping attention when he and his team should be recharging the company's operations.

"Our job is to fix this and get back to the job of running a business," he said.

HP shares traded higher after hours following Hurd's remarks; they closed at $35.11 a share, up 24 cents, in regular trading. Investors had shown little concern about the scandal's impact until Thursday, when shares fell more than 5% on unusually heavy volume.

HP analysts, who have grown concerned with Hurd's possible role in the scandal, said they were relieved by his upfront comments.

"His reputation is that of a straight-shooter, and that is reflected in the way he has successfully run the company," says Martin Reynolds, an analyst at market researcher Gartner. "I think he's safe."

The scandal is unlikely to affect HP's bottom line, Reynolds and others say, as long as it does not further damage Hurd, who is credited with rejuvenating the $90 billion company after the tech bust and a controversial merger with Compaq Computer.

Hurd said HP has appointed former U.S. prosecutor Bart Schwartz to conduct an independent review of HP's investigative methods. Also, Richard Hackborn, a current board member, has now assumed the additional duties of independent lead director, a position he was to take in January.

Hurd, Dunn and other HP executives are scheduled to testify Thursday before the House Energy and Commerce Committee. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer and federal agencies are investigating whether HP and its executives broke laws. Lockyer on Friday told CNBC there is no evidence yet linking Hurd to criminal wrongdoing.

The Securities and Exchange Commission last week started a new investigation into the matter, joining other probes by the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco.

The spying scandal dates to early last year, when then-chairwoman and CEO Carly Fiorina and other directors began looking into leaks of board meetings. After Fiorina was ousted, her successor as chairperson, Dunn, pursued the investigation, which eventually pointed to director Keyworth. HP first disclosed the investigation on Sept. 6. Five days later, HP announced a boardroom shuffle: Dunn would step down as chairman in January and Keyworth resigned. Director Tom Perkins quit in protest over the probe in May.

Dunn's, H-P's Accounts Differ In Leak Probe (WSJ)

By Don Clark, Peter Waldman And Bruce Orwall

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

Now that Patricia Dunn has severed her ties to Hewlett-Packard Co., the question is whether H-P's former chairman will back the company's version of events in the simmering scandal over an investigation into leaks from its board.

Already, there are signs that Ms. Dunn's account differs in some respects from H-P's, a split that could imperil H-P's efforts to contain the controversy. Any differences could be made clearer Thursday, when Ms. Dunn, H-P Chief Executive Mark Hurd, and at least one other company executive are expected to testify before a House committee.

Ms. Dunn announced her resignation as a director and chairman Friday, the same day H-P offered its first outline of how an investigation into media leaks from its board had spiraled to include filched phone records, a booby-trapped email and physical surveillance of at least one director and a journalist. Criminal investigations are under way by the FBI and California attorney general.

The company, at a dramatic news conference, focused heavily on the conduct of Ms. Dunn, suggesting she had instigated and closely monitored the probe -- to the extent of directly consulting with private investigators. Mr. Hurd said he supported an investigation to stop board leaks, but termed some tactics "disturbing."

Ms. Dunn referred questions to her lawyer, James Brosnahan, over the weekend. But in Mr. Brosnahan's comments, and her own prepared remarks, Ms. Dunn paints the probe as a collective board action that involved others at H-P.

Ms. Dunn had previously agreed to give up the chairman's role to Mr. Hurd in January, while remaining on the board. Her accelerated departure is a bitter footnote to a career that began in freelance journalism, continued at Wells Fargo & Co. and peaked as Ms. Dunn rose to lead fund management giant Barclays Global Investors, where she remains nonexecutive vice chairman. Ms. Dunn, 53, has twice beaten cancer, and last week was inducted into a San Francisco-area business group's hall of fame.

Mr. Brosnahan says it makes "no sense at all" to think that she would knowingly participate in anything she thought was criminal. "The irony of Pattie's situation," he adds, "is that she's a great devotee of privacy, people's personal rights and so forth. She has been for good corporate governance."

DOJ_NMG_0068636

Ms. Dunn joined H-P's board in 1998. She became chairman in February 2005, following the ouster of Chief Executive Carleton Fiorina. The board's initial inquiry into leaks was prompted by a January 2005 Wall Street Journal article detailing board unhappiness with Ms. Fiorina. Ms. Dunn says she continued the probe after she became chairman, with support from other directors.

"There were strong feelings among members of the board that the leaker had to be found," Mr. Brosnahan says, adding that Ms. Dunn told the board several times about the probe.

The board had internal divisions. For one thing, longtime director George Keyworth and Thomas Perkins, a venture capitalist who departed and returned to the board, believed that Mr. Hurd should have been given the chairman's role when he became CEO in March 2005, people familiar with the matter say. Ms. Dunn knew they opposed her retaining the title, those people say.

Michael Holston, a lawyer from Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP leading H-P's internal review of the leak investigation, said Friday that Ms. Dunn in early 2005 contacted Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., a Boston-area detective agency that H-P had used previously.

For a month or so, he said, Ms. Dunn worked directly with Ronald DeLia, who operates SOS, on a probe code-named KONA I. H-P's security unit wasn't brought into the probe for two months, he said. Mr. Holston also said Ms. Dunn had received "regular updates," on a second, broader phase of the leak investigation, dubbed KONA II, begun in early 2006.

Mr. Brosnahan says Ms. Dunn asked people within H-P how to conduct such a probe and was told that Mr. DeLia was someone "who helped the company a great deal." Ms. Dunn then spoke to Mr. DeLia to "give him whatever insight she had into who might be doing this" as background for the investigation, Mr. Brosnahan says.

Mr. Brosnahan will not say whether Ms. Dunn discussed investigative tactics with Mr. DeLia; he expects her to be questioned on that point before the House Energy and Commerce committee Thursday.

H-P staff members became more heavily involved in the second phase of the investigation in 2006. Kevin Hunsaker, an H-P senior counsel, directed the KONA II probe, and provided assurances to H-P general counsel Ann Baskins that the investigative tactics were legal, Mr. Holston said. Others involved included Tony Gentilucci, manager of H-P's global security investigation unit. Mr. Hunsaker and Mr. Gentilucci were described as "in the process of leaving the company" on Friday by a person familiar with the matter. Mr. Gentilucci's lawyer declined to comment.

Mr. Hunsaker's lawyer, Michael Pancer, said Mr. Hunsaker believes his and H-P's conduct in the probe was legal. He said Mr. Hunsaker has been asked to testify at Thursday's House hearing and will decide whether to do so this week.

TRACKING THE SCANDAL

See a graphical timeline1 and key documents in the H-P scandal. Plus, read profiles2 of H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, former director Thomas Perkins and other key players in the leak-probe controversy. (Complete coverage.3)

Ms. Dunn has also made statements that appear inconsistent with other participants' accounts, as well as internal H-P emails that have emerged. She has said in interviews that she couldn't supervise the leak probes because she was a potential target. But emails show that H-P's investigators consulted extensively with her and Ms. Baskins. Mr. Holston said Friday that Ms. Dunn and Ms. Baskins received "regular updates" on the probe.

Ms. Dunn has also said in interviews that she told Mr. Perkins, before he resigned from the board, that personal phone records were being scrutinized. Mr. Perkins' spokesman, Mark Corallo, has said that is "absolutely not true."

The debate over Ms. Dunn's role isn't only important to her reputation but also to Mr. Hurd's effort to put the scandal behind the company.

On Friday, Mr. Hurd focused his criticism on KONA II, and the failure of managers, including himself, to ensure that proper procedures were followed. But the most legally questionable tactic -- obtaining phone records by impersonating a phone user, or "pretexting" -- apparently was also used during the first phase of the investigation, according to a newly obtained SOS report, dated July 19, 2005.

The report shows that the cellphone records of Wall Street Journal reporter Pui-Wing Tam were obtained for calls made between mid-April and mid-June of 2005. Home phone records of calls made by Ms. Fiorina between late December 2004 and mid-April 2005 were also examined. The latter date is two months after she left the company.

DOJ_NMG_0068637

Some of these details could become important in establishing how much Mr. Hurd knew of the tactics employed. While expressing regrets for the way the probe was handled, the H-P CEO didn't flatly deny knowing of the tactics during it.

For example, he said he attended a "brief meeting" in July 2005 concerning the first phase of the investigation, but didn't say if investigative tactics were discussed. Mr. Holston said Mr. Hurd approved a ruse to send a phony email to a reporter at CNET News.com. Mr. Hurd said he didn't recall hearing plans to use tracer technology that would show where the message was forwarded.

Mr. Hurd also said he attended a March 2006 meeting at which a "verbal summary" of KONA II was discussed. He didn't say if pretexting or other tactics were discussed. He expressed regret that he didn't read a written report about KONA II, which may have included mention of the investigative tactics.

At Hewlett-Packard, A Chief Wounded By Divided Attention (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

PALO ALTO, Calif., Sept. 22 — Mark V. Hurd sat at the head of the table in the Hewlett-Packard boardroom, the room that had been the source of leaks and the starting point of a misguided and ultimately embarrassing attempt to plug them.

Mr. Hurd, the chief executive, had wanted to talk about the transformation inside Hewlett-Packard, how it was becoming a lean Silicon Valley growth company instead of a cash cow content to thrive on the high profit margins of its ink and toner cartridges.

But instead, in his first public interview since the spying operation was revealed in early September, Mr. Hurd needed to talk first about the spying investigation that has sullied the company's reputation as well as his own.

"This is just a horrible thing that has happened," Mr. Hurd said Wednesday afternoon, his rimless glasses perched on the end of his nose, "and we have to fix it." He echoed that sentiment in a news conference on Friday at which he expressed regret and then apologized for the actions of company investigators and the detectives they hired.

Mr. Hurd also apologized for his own inaction. As shocking as it has been to hear the methods used — obtaining private phone records, or trying to plant tracking software on a journalist's computer — it is almost as surprising that Mr. Hurd sat on the sidelines while the company's Clouseaus drew up plans to infiltrate newsrooms with spies masquerading as secretaries or janitors.

Mr. Hurd, 49, is known as an operations expert who asks lot of questions. "Mark is very rigorous on operational details," said Shane V. Robison, an executive vice president and chief strategy and technology officer. "He knows what to ask and he knows when to step back and listen," Mr. Robison said in an interview in late August before the furor erupted.

At least twice when he had the opportunity — at meetings in July 2005 and in March 2006 — Mr. Hurd failed to ask critical questions about the methods in the leak investigation.

But some people close to him suggest — though they do not know for certain — that he failed to focus on the leak investigation partly because he was focused on getting the company fixed and partly because he regarded the search as the project of Patricia C. Dunn, the chairwoman.

At Friday's event and in the interview, Mr. Hurd chose not to explain that inattention.

"He said nothing in effect, but he said it very well," said Charles Wolf, a securities analyst who follows Hewlett-Packard for Needham & Company. Mr. Hurd may explain more when he testifies Thursday at a House subcommittee hearing.

The mood inside Hewlett-Packard grew more apprehensive in midweek after Mr. Hurd's name surfaced in documents about the spying operation. And a few corporate governance analysts have wondered whether he might become a victim of the scandal, like Ms. Dunn, whom he succeeded as chairman after her resignation from the board on Friday.

But what has won him the benefit of the doubt within the company and among investors is that he has done so well fixing the company. He was transforming NCR when he was hired in March 2005 to take on the task of righting Hewlett-Packard.

At the time, most analysts and investors said its best days were behind it. But the stock has risen 77.4 percent as he cut costs, restructured operations, hired more salespeople and pushed employees to find new opportunities for growth, like commercial printers, energy-saving blade servers and software to manage data centers.

DOJ_NMG_0068638

"He doesn't promise much, but he's delivered five quarters of upside surprises," Mr. Wolf said.

The reason Wall Street remains enamored of him and the company is what Mr. Hurd has done with a business model that employees have taken to calling the Triangle, a regular feature on company whiteboards and PowerPoint presentations.

On one corner is Efficiency. At first that meant reducing headcount. Shortly after Mr. Hurd arrived, he announced that the company would shed 14,500 employees, or about 10 percent of its work force, for about $2 billion a year in savings. But he is not done cutting. The company continues to find places to cut costs, like disposing of some of its real estate.

On another corner is Capital Strategy, which is the $16 billion Hewlett-Packard has hoarded.

On the third corner is Targeted Growth, which is where the savings and the cash hoard are spent.

Growing animated when the Triangle was mentioned, Mr. Hurd said, "It's not rocket science." But as for execution, Mr. Robison, the chief strategist, said, "You have to do all three at the same time, and that is really hard."

The point Mr. Hurd makes to employees is that cutting costs is not enough. "Management's job is to explain that cost-cutting and growth are not two things," he said. "They are really one thing."

A good example is Hewlett-Packard's data centers. It had 85 of them spread around the world. The company is building six of them in two cities to handle all the data processing. It will close the existing centers, sell the real estate and lay off more employees to save $1 billion.

Lower personnel and operating costs free up money to develop the software and equipment that will make the centers more efficient. But there is also a growth opportunity, because Hewlett-Packard will sell similar data centers to other companies that also want to cut costs.

Knowing that cost-cutting and growth are the same objective helps to cushion the pain of never-ending cost-cutting. "The person knows we aren't just taking costs out, we are helping the company grow," Mr. Hurd said. "The employees have to know the plan. Then it is a different attitude. They want to be on a winning team."

"That's what's so horrible about the current situation," he said, returning to the spying scandal. "They want to know they are making progress. The people in the company are working very hard. We've done some tough stuff. I don't want to forget we took 15,000 jobs out of the company and told a lot of employees to go home and tell their families they that no longer have jobs."

The concept could be an important model for any aging behemoth — think of Ford, Coca-Cola or Time Warner — that wants to grow but needs to cut first. He has been at it less than 20 months, and not everyone thinks it can be sustained.

"The jury is very much out on whether Hurd has made any notable progress on growth yet," said A. M. Sacconaghi, a securities analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Company. "That is his next big challenge, and materially boosting revenue growth on a $90 billon company will be much tougher than cutting costs."

The distractions of the spying scandal are certain to test the concentration of the company's top executives. But those who have known Mr. Hurd say they think he can keep morale at the company high.

Dipak C. Jain, the dean of the Kellogg School of Management at Northwestern University, who has known Mr. Hurd for more than a decade, said his style was not to bully or humiliate his lieutenants. "People don't get intimidated working with him," Mr. Jain said. "He believes that if people get intimidated, their best doesn't come out."

Mr. Hurd recognized, for instance, how anxiety-ridden top executives become when they discuss the current quarter. "They get defensive," he said. So when he arrived at the company in 2005, one of his first management meetings was about 2010. "We would take the short-term emotion out of the equation and work backwards," he said.

At the same time, he is not bothered by people who say Carleton S. Fiorina, the former chief executive and chairwoman, should get some credit for the company's current success. "I don't look at things as binary," he said. "It just needed a bit of crystallization."

There is another aspect of his management style that may account for the paradox of his success in running the company's business and his failure to stop the managers overseeing the detectives from getting so far off track. Mr. Hurd trusts his executives to make decisions.

He said he discovered after he arrived at Hewlett-Packard that he was being asked to make too many decisions. For instance, he was mediating disputes between the computer division and the printing division, which shared a sales force. He tore up that matrix system of management and made division executives responsible for their own sales.

DOJ_NMG_0068639

Pushing down responsibility and accountability develops products faster, gets them to market faster and makes for more satisfied customers, Mr. Hurd said. That new structure freed Vyomesh Joshi, executive vice president for the printing division, to invest heavily in new areas — like the online photo service Snapfish, copiers, commercial printing and a teleconferencing service called Halo — that have added $1.3 billion in revenue over 12 months.

Does distributing responsibility have another cost — more detachment from the oversight by the chief executive? It is another unanswered question. But as Mr. Hurd explained a sketch about bureaucracy and how information is shared in an organization, he noted: "The problem isn't at the bottom. It is near the top."

He says he thinks a lot about process. To help repair the damage from the scandal, he has appointed Bart M. Schwartz, a former federal prosecutor, to examine the company's process for investigations.

"We are working as hard as we can to get through this," Mr. Hurd said Wednesday.

The Changing Rules Of Corporate Spy Games (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 25, 2006

While it may seem like an anomaly, the saga of high-level snooping at Hewlett-Packard sheds light on an ethical balancing act playing out across corporate America.

Companies routinely take measures - including, as in Hewlett Packard's case, retaining the services of outside private investigators - to guard trade secrets and confidential plans. But as technology makes it easier to trace leaks, firms are also seeing the need to avoid cultivating mistrust.

The drama at Hewlett-Packard is highly unusual because clandestine measures focused on top company officials and on journalists, to find which board member was leaking information to the press.

Yet even beyond HP, defining the limits of corporate snooping may be growing in complexity. New technologies are expanding both the opportunities for malfeasance and the ability to chase it down. And in a knowledge-based economy, generating and guarding ideas is now central to any corporation's market value. That involves nurturing loyalty and morale among creative employees, while also monitoring their activities.

"HP had every right to initiate an investigation," says Sean Walsh, a private investigator who works with other corporations in Silicon Valley and the San Francisco area. "Where things went awry was the methodology used in this case."

As the Hewlett-Packard case suggests, sometimes efforts at damage control do more harm than good. HP should be winning plaudits for its recent stock price highs. Instead, the high-tech giant is in the news for the lengths it went to hunt down a board member with loose lips.

By HP's own account on Friday, its leak-tracing efforts crossed a line into "inappropriate" actions. Chief executive officer Mark Hurd gave a news briefing to apologize for investigators' use of techniques such as gaining access to personal phone records under false pretenses.

But questions have continued to emerge about his own role. As a board member who was aware of the investigation, he lent his approval to an attempted e-mail "sting" that targeted a journalist. Investigators hired by HP put a hidden code in the e-mail to trace if it was forwarded to a boardroom leaker. Mr. Hurd was apparently aware of the general stratagem, but not of the tracer code. He has volunteered to talk about the affair at a Capitol Hill hearing Thursday.

A number of cautionary lessons are emerging, say experts, on business ethics, management, and security. While some of the tactics HP used may be illegal, others have landed the company in hot water simply because they were improper.

"The bar of ethics is higher than the bar of the law," says Dean Krehmeyer, who heads the Business Roundtable Institute for Corporate Ethics in Charlottesville, Va.

At the same time, experts say, today's corporations have a need - even a duty - to protect their business secrets.

Mr. Walsh, who helps many corporations with security, says it's not unusual for companies to hire an investigator to go under cover as an employee to stop theft. Walsh's firm has contracts to perform regular "bug sweeps" and other countermeasures to make sure no one is using high-tech means to steal trade secrets. And when crises erupt, in-house security teams often call for outside help from firms like Walsh's.

DOJ_NMG_0068640

"We usually are there when the horse is already out of the barn," says Walsh, a past president of the California Association of Licensed Investigators.

About three years ago, he was tapped to track down a leak of sorts. A software company had detected a pattern of large files being downloaded at odd hours. Walsh helped identify which worker was stealing sensitive data.

In fact, it is now routine for companies to use computers or video cameras to monitor all manner of office behavior.

Experts say it's important that companies let employees know what is being tracked and why, so workers will support efforts that may, in the end, help them prosper.

But recognizing boundaries and privacy is also important, experts say.

"Don't snoop," is generally a good guideline of workplace etiquette, says Barbara Pachter of consulting firm Pachter & Associates in Cherry Hill, N.J. "It might not set the right tone."

Others add that building a tone of trust is especially vital in the boardroom in an era when corporate directors face new duties and heightened scrutiny. Black-bag investigations don't achieve that goal, they say.

"A culture that could produce this kind of thinking ... needs to be seriously reexamined," says Charles Elson, who heads the University of Delaware's Center of Corporate Governance.

At Hewlett-Packard, the boardroom culture was apparently poisoned by personal conflicts during a period that saw the ouster of Carly Fiorina as CEO early in 2005. Next month Ms. Fiorina is publishing a book on her controversial tenure at the iconic Silicon Valley company.

The leaks were a serious matter and each board member denied being the source when asked by HP.

"There was potential for harm," says Craig Dunn, a business ethics expert at San Diego State University.

He doesn't see it as problematic that the probe included surveillance of board members beyond company property. But securing records for personal phone calls under false pretenses, and the phone records of journalists, crossed a line, he says.

"Now you're going outside" the company, he says, beyond where "you have direct control or access." Who's spying on you?

In a survey of 526 US companies:

• 76% monitor workers' website connections.

• 26% have fired workers for misusing the Internet.

• 6% have fired employees for misusing office telephones.

Sources: American Management Association and ePolicy Institute

HP Moves Leave Legal Issues Open (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 25, 2006

With the stock market in a lather over Hewlett-Packard's troubled leak investigations, HP CEO Mark Hurd tried on Friday to take control of the situation. But in doing so, he left unanswered key questions about legal representation in the festering matter.

In a brief press conference, Hurd addressed some investor concerns by announcing that Patricia Dunn, the former chairwoman who ordered an aggressive probe of boardroom leaks, would be leaving the board immediately, and that Hurd would be taking over as chairman.

Hurd and Morgan, Lewis & Bockius partner Michael Holston disclosed some details of what a company investigation has found, including the fact that Hurd himself was kept informed of certain parts of the leak probe. It's not clear, though, at what point Hurd knew that investigators "pretexted" -- lied -- to gain access to board member, employee and journalist phone records.

Morgan Lewis was hired Sept. 8 to perform an independent investigation, and to represent the company in talks with federal and state prosecutors.

But one statement by Hurd raised questions for many lawyers: "Morgan Lewis reports to me, not to the HP board," he said.

Such a statement might have been a reassurance Sept. 19. Until then, the leak investigation seemed to be more a board problem than one pointing to Hurd. But by Friday, news reports -- and several remarks by Hurd and Holston at the press conference -- made it clear that Hurd's role in the probe is also being examined.

DOJ_NMG_0068641

For example, Hurd acknowledged Friday that he attended a March 2006 meeting at which a summary of the investigation was presented. "I understand there is also a written report of the investigation addressed to me and others, but I did not read it," Hurd said. "I could have, and I should have."

Speaking privately -- largely because they hope to some day be hired in the HP matter -- several lawyers who conduct internal corporate investigations said this could compromise the investigation, since Morgan Lewis is expected to independently investigate potential wrongdoing, and is likely to report to prosecutors on its findings.

But, they added, it's not unheard of for such situations to pop up.

There's no concrete guidance from the federal government on when outside counsel conducting an internal investigation has a conflict.

"There's no statutory definition of what an internal investigation is," said one former federal prosecutor who asked not to be named.

The former prosecutor said that as a probe goes on, questions often come up about seemingly uninvolved parties' role in possible wrongdoing.

"When you're looking into various things, trying to figure out what happened, your initial impression could change," the ex-prosecutor said. "And when your initial impression changes, your opinion of who should do what should change."

That could mean additional counsel must be brought in, said several white-collar lawyers.

Of course, these aren't the first questions about independence to come up in the case.

Morgan Lewis came in at a time when the board's normal outside counsel, Larry Sonsini of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, was under immense press scrutiny for what he knew about the leak probe.

Sonsini had been the one to communicate with former HP director Thomas Perkins -- whose resignation spurred the leak probe crisis -- in the days before it blew up. And e-mails between Sonsini and Perkins that made it into several press outlets showed that Sonsini had some knowledge of the investigation, though it's not clear he knew what tactics were involved.

Over the last few weeks, Sonsini, along with other partners at his firm, seem to have taken a diminished role in the HP matter. While at least one lawyer at the firm went with Morgan Lewis lawyers to meet with federal prosecutors on Sept. 11, the company said in recent days that Morgan Lewis attorneys would be in charge of dealing with the government.

The Hewlett-Packard mess began last year when Dunn -- whose lawyer, James Brosnahan, didn't return calls by press time Friday -- ordered an investigation to identify the source of leaks about board deliberations.

That initial investigation turned up nothing, Hurd and Holston said Friday. But, they added, a subsequent probe conducted last year identified a leaker responsible for providing information used in a Jan. 23 CNet story on the company's overall direction.

While it's been reported in several news outlets that the leaker was former board member George Keyworth -- who stepped down last week -- the CNet story does not appear to contain any company information that had not already been made public.

After the second investigation was announced to the board this past spring, an outraged Perkins quit in protest.

The disclosure of the investigation followed Perkins' resignation. Though Perkins resigned on May 18, it was not until Sept. 6 that the company gave details -- as required by law -- about the director's action. In that filing, the company said it had received a comment letter from the SEC asking for more information about Perkins' resignation.

Perkins' lawyer, Viet Dinh, a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, has said his client engaged in a 3 1/2-month effort to get Hewlett-Packard to come clean about why Perkins quit.

Perkins abruptly quit during an HP board meeting after Keyworth was asked to resign. (Keyworth at first refused to resign, but then agreed to step down as part of a settlement with the company.)

Investigators apparently used legally suspect means -- including impersonating the targets of their probe -- to access the phone records of board members, HP employees, journalists and Sonsini.

A Boston investigative firm has been cited as the one responsible for hiring people to lie in calls to phone company officials to gain access to the phone records of board members. Boston investigative firm Security Outsourcing Solutions reportedly provided HP with an opinion from a Boston lawyer that the "pretexting" was legal.

The legality of such tactics is up for consideration by the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office and the California attorney general. They're both investigating the issue, and Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to indict people inside and outside HP, and has met with HP representatives more than once since the scandal broke.

The HP Virus (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

AS IT TURNS OUT, Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn didn't have to order her minions to invent a disgruntled HP executive. She can now become one herself by adding "former" to her title. That's because the HP board defenestrated her Friday in one of the more satisfying denouements to one of the more embarrassing corporate dramas in recent memory.

The plan to create a fictitious unhappy HP executive, which Dunn approved, was part of an effort to trick a reporter into revealing her sources at the company. The announcement of Dunn's ouster came after two weeks of revelations about the leak investigation, which started under former Chief Executive Carly Fiorina in early 2005 but intensified this year. According to the company, its security contractors obtained personal phone records under false pretenses; sent a kind of spyware to a reporter via e-mail; conducted surveillance on HP board members, relatives and at least one reporter; and even suggested planting spies at news organizations.

For her part, Dunn insisted that she didn't do anything wrong, issuing a statement that HP's click-and-dagger contractors "let me and the company down." It's difficult to gin up much sympathy for Dunn, but it's also hard not to see her as a scapegoat. Evidence abounds that other top HP executives — including Chief Executive Mark V. Hurd, who now adds "chairman" to his nameplate after Dunn's removal — were told about at least some of the deceptions and intrusions planned by its contractors. Hurd admitted Friday that he'd been told about the plan to create a fictitious HP employee to plant stories. A lawyer that Hurd hired to get to the bottom of the mess, Mike Holston, said Friday that HP's chief ethics officer and the firm's lawyers told HP's leadership that the techniques being used were legal.

Setting aside for a moment that some of the methods used were almost certainly illegal, the kinds of deceptions practiced by HP's contractors don't pass the smell test. A key part of the plan, which Hurd said he doesn't recall being told about, was to e-mail the reporter a purported scoop in an attachment that was bugged. Malicious software programs are among the biggest problems faced by the computer industry and its customers, so it's mystifying why a computer manufacturer such as HP would even think about a stunt like this. Then again, maybe HP executives just weren't thinking at all.

Regulators Scrutinize Amaranth (WSJ)

By Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

Regulators are examining the circumstances surrounding the multibillion-dollar losses this month by Greenwich, Conn., hedge fund Amaranth Advisors, people familiar with the situation say.

Amaranth said last week it had lost roughly $6 billion, or 65% of its assets, in September, primarily on bad bets in the volatile natural-gas market.

The inquiries are at an early stage, and it isn't clear that any regulators are probing wrongdoing. It is common for market regulators to inquire about major changes at large investment funds that may have an impact on markets. Hedge funds are lightly regulated investment pools for wealthy individuals and institutional investors such as pension funds and college endowments.

Among the details that may arise in the reviews, these people say, are how Amaranth presented its trading strategies and internal controls to investors and whether it followed its policies as it had outlined them. The Securities and Exchange Commission has limited authority over such funds, but it does monitor how the funds represent their operations to investors and can investigate fraud, if any is suspected.

A person close to Amaranth said the firm had been in touch with regulators since first announcing heavy losses on Monday Sept. 18. "Amaranth voluntarily reached out to its various regulators early Monday to apprise them of the situation, to answer any questions they may have and to offer its full cooperation," the person said.

Among the entities Amaranth itself contacted, the person familiar with the firm says, are the SEC; the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, which regulates commodity and energy markets; the New York Mercantile Exchange, the primary U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0068643

energy market; Britain's Financial Services Authority, which oversees a widely used electronic energy-trading platform; and Canadian securities regulators.

A spokesman for the CFTC said it couldn't comment on what it was or wasn't looking into. Officials at the other regulatory groups couldn't be reached for comment.

Telos In Turmoil Over Shares (WP)

By Terence O'hara

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

The trouble began on the golf course, when unidentified insiders at Telos Corp. began questioning whether director David Borland's use of a company club membership compromised his independence as a member of the firm's audit committee.

The fuse quickly burned, and by August more than half of the company's board had resigned. The imbroglio was the latest in a fight that has gone on for years, with the owners of Telos's preferred stock in revolt trying to collect more than $80 million they say is long overdue.

It didn't matter much when Telos, a small defense contractor that specializes in network and communications security applications, was a languishing technology company. But in recent years, its business with the Defense Department has been booming. Though Telos is unprofitable it is considered a potential takeover target, and its owners are fighting over the possible spoils.

"I'm just insisting on rights I have that are in writing," said Marshall Greenblatt of Potomac, a former Telos director who has owned preferred stock since it was issued 17 years ago, and wants the money he was guaranteed at that time. "A deal is a deal." Preferred stock typically includes a guaranteed dividend and other advantages.

One of Greenblatt's fellow preferred shareholders, New York hedge fund Costa Brava LP, has sued Telos and asked a judge to put the company in receivership. Costa Brava contends that the company's majority shareholder, British millionaire John R. C. Porter, is siphoning cash from the company in the form of fees and high-interest on loans he has made to Telos.

Anger over Porter, and frustration that the company may have favored him over preferred shareholders, prompted some of the directors to resign in August, according to company Securities and Exchange Commission filings.

None of those who resigned could be reached for comment. Requests to interview Porter were made to the company, but a Telos official said he could not be reached.

Longtime Telos chief executive John B. Wood said the company's problems have been stoked by hedge-fund shareholders who are being too hasty in demanding benefits from their preferred stock -- and hurting the company's chances to become more valuable in a possible future sale.

"We have activist hedge funds who use the cloak of corporate governance to litigate their returns," Wood said of the company's dissident investors. "We as a company have a responsibility and a duty to protect the interest of all of our stakeholders, and not give a priority of one group over another group."

Wood would not comment on any aspect of the resignations. However, he noted that "we reconstituted the board quickly thereafter," and that the incident has not damaged the company's stock price.

At the heart of the dispute is Telos's stock structure, the remnant of a 1989 leveraged buyout. All of Telos's common stock is held by insiders, including Porter, who bought control of the company in 1994. Yet Telos's preferred stock, issued in the 1989 leveraged buyout, is publicly traded on the over-the-counter exchange. It has done well in the past three years, rising from 50 cents a share in 2003 to around $19 a share.

The owners of that preferred stock are owed more than $80 million in dividends and redemptions. If Telos were sold, preferred shareholders, not Porter, would get most, if not all, of the leftover cash from a sale after its lenders are paid off.

The spat on the board began this summer, when fellow directors learned that Borland used a company-owned golf membership. Borland paid the $38,000 in dues and other expenses with his own money. But the fact that the company owned the membership was seen by some board members as a conflict with his duties on the audit committee -- and emblematic of broader problems.

DOJ_NMG_0068644

Borland resigned as chairman of the audit committee. But three directors, Geoffrey B. Baker, Malcolm M.B. Sterrett, and Norman P. Byers, thought Borland should have resigned from other board committees as well and possibly left the board altogether. When he didn't, they quit.

They resigned at the same time as three other board members. Langhorne A. Motley said he was quitting for health reasons and because of the workload of being a director. Bruce J. Stewart and Thomas L. Owsley did not say why they resigned.

Most worrisome for Telos, Motley and Byers were the two members of Telos's proxy board, an independent subset of the board of directors required by the Defense Department to make sure that Telos's foreign ownership doesn't compromise national security. Porter is a British citizen.

Byers was the proxy board's chairman, and was on the board since 1994.

"Uppermost in my mind has been my fiduciary duties . . . and to provide the oversight necessary to insure the company's compliance with all federal security laws," Byers wrote in his resignation letter, using language similar to that Sterrett and Baker used. "Unfortunately, on several recent occasions, other important participants in the corporate enterprise have done everything possible to obstruct or prevent the board of directors from taking those actions I believe are absolutely necessary and appropriate to insure good corporate governance and compliance. It has been made abundantly clear to me I will not be allowed to function effectively or independently as a fiduciary for the Department of Defense, the Company, all its stockholders and employees."

Wood, who has worked at Telos for 14 years and became chief executive in 1994, said all he wants to do is build the company, and that he hopes the differences between the two classes of stockholders can be resolved. He also held out hope that the company could reach an out-of-court settlement with the preferred shareholders, but that seems unlikely.

"What it boils down to: One group wants their money now, one group is more patient," he said of the preferred and common shareholders, respectively. "Having said that, would we prefer to reach a settlement that's fair for everybody? Absolutely."

Cook The Books, Get Life In Prison: Is Justice Served? (WP)

By Carrie Johnson And Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

In the category of longest prison sentence, WorldCom Inc. founder Bernard J. Ebbers recently bested the organizer of an armed robbery, the leaders of a Bronx drug gang and the acting boss of the Gambino crime family.

It was a contest Ebbers surely would have preferred to lose.

Tomorrow, the man who once swaggered through the halls of his telecommunications company as a cowboy-booted billionaire is scheduled to surrender to authorities and begin a 25-year sentence. Federal prison policies virtually ensure that Ebbers, who has a heart ailment, will spend the rest of his life in prison for his role in an $11 billion accounting fraud.

Ebbers, 65, is to report to prison on the same day that former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow will be sentenced by a federal judge in Houston. Fastow, who secretly pocketed more than $45 million in a scheme to disguise mounting financial problems at the energy company, faces a maximum of 10 years in prison as part of his plea deal.

The length of Ebbers's sentence when compared with others touches on one of the most controversial parts of the American criminal justice system: How large a pound of flesh should society exact for serious white-collar crime? When the victims are diffuse, the crime complex and the injuries economic, what kind of punishment constitutes justice?

A top executive who gambles his fate at a trial nowadays risks what amounts to a life term for fraud that can involve as little as $2.5 million in losses, said University of Missouri law professor Frank Bowman. Crimes such as first-degree murder, high-level drug dealing and espionage trigger similar recommendations.

"That means you have to equate fiddling with the corporate books with first-degree murder or treason," Bowman said. "My own sense is that any sentence over 20 years for anybody for an economic crime is hard to justify."

Public revulsion over financial crimes that cost small investors billions of dollars has barely waned since prosecutors began to investigate a string of corporate scandals in late 2001. The death of convicted Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay in July induced profanity-laden outrage from shareholders who felt they had been "cheated" out of seeing Lay sent to prison. Federal prosecutors seized the mood, imploring Congress this month to pass legislation that would make it easier for them to recover $43.5 million from Lay's estate, a process that has been seriously complicated by his death.

DOJ_NMG_0068645

The drive to exact punishment even beyond the grave is a sign of vindictiveness in public officials and shareholders, defense lawyers contend.

Reid H. Weingarten, a Washington-based lawyer for Ebbers, said in an e-mail that the judge in his case had public relations, not justice, in mind. "The purpose of the sentence was to please and appease the howling mob demanding Ebbers's head, not a worthy goal of the criminal justice system," he said.

Fastow, 44, assessed the prospect of spending decades behind bars after the government hit him with a 98-count indictment for serving as the architect of the Enron fraud. Prosecutors also accused Fastow of enlisting his wife and using the bank accounts of his two young sons to siphon money from the company undetected. Lea W. Fastow, indicted to pressure her husband to cooperate with investigators, pleaded guilty to a tax charge two years ago for underreporting income from his business partnerships. She served almost a year in a high-security prison.

As part of the couple's package deal, Andrew Fastow pleaded guilty, agreed to testify against Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, and negotiated a substantial break in his prison term. Skilling, 52, was convicted of 19 criminal charges in May and faces decades in prison when he is sentenced next month.

Fordham University law professor Daniel Richman said shorter sentences in exchange for cooperation reflect the reality of white-collar investigations: Prosecutors must rely on tainted insiders to help convict higher-level executives. In this year's Enron trial, for example, lawyers for Skilling and Lay branded Fastow a liar, a thief and the person most responsible for Enron's collapse who avoided his just deserts by signing a deal with prosecutors.

"Sentences are the currency with which the government buys information," said Richman, a former federal prosecutor.

Not accepting a deal can be costly, as former mid-level Dynegy Inc. executive Jamie Olis, now 40, learned two years ago. Olis, who while growing up was physically abused by his mother's boyfriend and spent time in foster care before working his way through college, became a national symbol of inflexible sentencing policies. He lost his case and was sentenced to more than 24 years in prison -- despite the defense's presentation of his background -- for taking part in a $300 million accounting fraud. Olis's former boss at the energy company signed a plea agreement, testified against Olis and was sentenced to 15 months.

A federal appeals court last year threw out Olis's sentence, and a federal judge in Houston on Friday reduced it to six years. That means Olis is likely to spend about two more years in prison.

"Not every case is Enron, and not every white-collar offender is one of the smartest guys in the room," said Washington defense lawyer Barry Boss, referring to the name of a book and documentary film about the Enron scandal. "We're such a vindictive country."

But white-collar criminals are unusually sensitive to deterrence, according to prosecutors and securities regulators. The sight of colleagues in handcuffs, or signing away their homes and fortunes, sends a powerful message.

What's more, legal experts say, former executives do not deserve lighter treatment than drug dealers or burglars simply because they broke accounting rules or lied -- crimes that are harder to unravel and whose victims are more diffuse.

"You want people to understand that just because they're in high places, they make a lot of money and they can hire fabulous lawyers, that they're not going to walk away with a slap on the wrist," said former Securities and Exchange Commission chairman Harvey L. Pitt. "If you ask me, 'Did Bernie Ebbers destroy lives?' I would tell you that his conduct did."

Historically, white-collar criminals have not received long sentences. Probation was common even for crimes that involved large losses, and even the most famous defendants received sentences that by today's standards appear lenient. Junk-bond king Michael Milken was initially sentenced to 10 years on fraud charges, but a judge reduced the sentence to 33 months, and he was paroled after serving only two years.

That began to change in the mid-1990s, after policymakers expressed concern that punitive sentences for nonviolent drug crimes carried life sentences while white-collar criminals often skated. In 1994, financier Tom J. Billman, who bilked savings and loans of $25 million and fled the country, was sentenced to 40 years in prison. He served about 10 years before being paroled in 2005.

Sentences became even longer when parole was abolished in the federal system and sentencing guidelines were repeatedly amended to increase prison terms for white-collar crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0068646

Were the WorldCom and Enron scandals to happen today, the sentences for Ebbers and Fastow might be even longer. Angry lawmakers enacted even tougher penalties for corporate fraud after those companies filed for bankruptcy protection. But the stiff new punishments apply only to people who committed crimes after 2002.

"On a personal level, you've got to feel for people" like Ebbers who will probably die in prison, said University of Texas law professor Henry T.C. Hu, "but overall I think the system's got it right."

CRIMINAL LAW:

String Of Heists Raises Fears Bank Jobs Are On Rise (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, September 25, 2006

The Paparazzi Bandit photographs bank tellers as he robs them. The Goofy Hat Bandit wears a black fedora. The Hallmark Bandit writes lengthy notes demanding cash — and sometimes asks tellers if they had a good weekend.

These serial bank robbers, and a few others, are behind what authorities say is an unusual surge in bank robberies during the last few months in Los Angeles, one of several U.S. cities where such crimes have ticked upward recently.

FBI officials say they are concerned that bank robberies — generally a high-risk, low-reward type of crime — might be increasing again after declining nationwide since 2001. Numbers for 2006 won't be available for months.

It's unclear precisely why Los Angeles, Dallas, Chicago and other cities are seeing a jump in bank robberies, but it appears to be part of a general increase in violent crimes nationwide, says Chip Burrus, the FBI's assistant director for criminal investigations.

“There's an awful lot of gang activity out there, and a certain percentage (of gang crimes) are going to be bank robberies,” he says.

The jump in bank robberies does not appear to be nationwide, says John Hall of the American Bankers Association, a trade group based in Washington, D.C.

Regional increases may reflect a particular economic or crime trend in an area, such as an increase in drug trafficking or a spike in unemployment, he says.

Laura Eimiller, spokeswoman for the FBI's Los Angeles field office, says the rise in robberies there comes even as increased security measures have made the risks for bank robbers greater, and the rewards less.

More security cameras and tiny dye packs designed to explode after a robber leaves a bank with cash generally have made it more likely that robbers will be caught. Bank tellers now typically have less than $1,000 in their cash drawers, making huge heists unlikely.

“It is a stupid crime,” Eimiller says. “When you get caught, you're going to go away for a long, long time, particularly if you use a gun.”

Bank robbery is a federal crime. Those who use a weapon — or a fake weapon — while committing such an offense face up to 25 years in prison if convicted.

Los Angeles leads the nation in bank robberies. About two-thirds of the 249 bank robberies that have been committed there this year have been non-violent “note jobs,” in which a robber has approached a teller with a note demanding money, Eimiller says.

One at-large suspect, who has robbed seven banks since May 17, usually waits in the teller line until he is called, chats with other customers and hands tellers long notes demanding cash and threatening to use a weapon.

“He's known as the Hallmark Bandit because in May and June, he asked the tellers how their Mother's Day or Father's Day was,” Eimiller says. “He's very chatty.”

Takeovers, in which armed robbers force customers and employees to the floor or take hostages, have accounted for the remaining one-third of robberies in Los Angeles this year, an unusually large ratio that has alarmed authorities, Eimiller says.

“We've had a dramatic increase in ‘takeover' robberies, where the bandits are armed or there's an assault,” she says. “Robberies are getting more violent. We're seeing a large percentage associated with Los Angeles street gangs.”

DOJ_NMG_0068647

Robbers in a group known as the Big Money Bandits brandish weapons, force everyone in a bank to lie on the floor and yell out, “Give us the big money,” or, “Show us the big money,” Eimiller says.

In some cases, robbers in the Big Money Bandits group have dressed as security guards. The group has been linked to a dozen robberies since April.

In Dallas, the number of bank robberies has tripled this year compared with the same time last year, says FBI Special Agent Beverly Esselbach. The city had 96 bank robberies through September this year. The North Texas area, which includes Dallas, had 172 bank robberies during that period, up from 82 at the same time last year.

Two of the most prolific serial robbers, including one who hit 18 banks, have been caught, she says. Another suspect who has been linked to 20 bank robberies is still on the loose.

“It's kind of cyclical” in the Dallas area, Esselbach says. “Every three years they see an upsurge in bank robberies. Usually it starts before the holidays in November and drops off in January. This year, it didn't drop off. It just kept going.”

Last year, Chicago had a record 240 bank robberies, including a 75% increase in “takeover” robberies, says Special Agent Ross Rice of the FBI's Chicago field office.

“We're on pace to beat that” in 2006, Rice says. During a six-day period this month, the Chicago area had 15 bank robberies.

“There's no rhyme or reason to it,” Rice says. “We've had every type of robbery: note jobs, armed takeovers, hostage situations, suburban, city, serial offenders, first- timers.”

There have been no signs that concern over jobs or the economy, widely believed to be factors in bank robbery rises, is behind the recent spate of robberies, Rice says.

New York City also has seen a rash of robberies recently, including 32 in August, says Jim Margolin of the FBI's field office there.

Death Penalty Sought Against D.C. Man (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

Federal authorities are seeking the death penalty against a D.C. man charged in five killings, setting up the prospect of just the third capital murder trial in the city over the past 30 years.

Larry Gooch, described by law-enforcement officials as "an enforcer" in the M Street Crew drug gang, is expected to go on trial in January on felony charges, including first-degree murder and armed robbery.

Though capital punishment is banned in the District, Gooch, 27, could get the death penalty if convicted because he has been charged in a federal case.

The Justice Department last year filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty against Gooch, a decision requiring the approval of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

Gooch is charged in the Aug. 1, 2000, shooting deaths of Christopher Lane, 19, and William Cunningham, 27.

He is also charged in the Sept. 13, 2002, shooting death of Miguel Miles, 34, and the Feb. 21, 2003, fatal shootings of Calvin Cooper, 40, and his girlfriend, Yolanda Miller, 32.

Three men identified by prosecutors as leaders in the M Street gang -- John L. Franklin, 33, George "Shug" Wilson, 37, and William Dee Robinson, 30, a former D.C. Public Schools bus driver -- already are serving life sentences in the case. More than 30 people have been arrested, but Gooch is the only defendant facing the death penalty.

Nicknamed "Goo," Gooch was considered "crazy" by other gang members and assumed the role of "enforcer" or "muscle," Assistant U.S. Attorney Darlene M. Soltys wrote in a recent court memo.

"He was perceived as having no regard for life and had as his motto 'live for the block, die for the block,'" Miss Soltys wrote.

Prosecutors say the killings were committed "in furtherance of the M Street Crew's racketeering enterprise," which under federal law, they say, makes Gooch eligible for the death penalty.

Gooch's attorneys, Jensen E. Barber II and Thomas Todd Heslep, declined to comment for this story. However, Mr. Barber recently filed a 104-page memorandum in which he outlined sharp opposition to the death penalty if his client is convicted.

DOJ_NMG_0068648

The memorandum argues against capital punishment "on the grounds it violates fundamental fairness in the administration of justice and is at odds with basic notions of human dignity, civility and compassion."

In addition to arguing a host of procedural and constitutional issues, Mr. Barber noted voters in the District have "continually rejected the death penalty."

In Gooch's case, Mr. Barber also argued, "we are dealing with garden-variety murders."

"It may be a sad commentary on our violent society, but those in the system know that there are murders, and there are murders," he wrote. "The law says the death penalty is supposed to be reserved for the 'worst' murders."

Mr. Barber argued the case should be prosecuted in D.C. Superior Court, not federal court.

"Federal jurisdiction in this case is based solely upon allegations of drug trafficking, which, at best, serve only as a background to the alleged murders," he wrote.

If the case were prosecuted in D.C. Superior Court, Gooch would not face the death penalty.

But federal prosecutors say Gooch committed federal crimes.

Citing an organized racketeering conspiracy, they describe the M Street Crew in court memos as "a well-defined, traditional chain conspiracy with various roles assigned to people, such as foot soldiers, runners and lieutenants."

Gang members also held meetings to decide who could sell drugs in the neighborhood, what to do if "the feds" brought charges, and where to stash drugs and how to package them, prosecutors say.

Some gang members were photographed flashing the letter "M" to each other by twisting their fingers, authorities say. And Gooch called meetings, kicked out blackballed members and enforced rules about where dealers could sell drugs, according to prosecutors.

Gooch killed Miss Miller and Mr. Cooper in part amid suspicion they were cooperating with investigators, prosecutors said. The FBI and Metropolitan Police Department investigation into the M Street Crew included thousands of hours of taped phone conversations from a wire tap, video-camera footage, confidential informants and undercover agents, court records show.

Mr. Cooper's sister, Barbara Cooper, said in a telephone interview that she favors the death penalty for Gooch if he is convicted.

"All of them were living the street life," she said. "If you want to sell drugs and be a big time hustler, that's on you. But you still don't have the right to take somebody's life. My brother used to say "I've got to get myself together, I don't want to live like this.

"He never hurt anybody, and they hunted him down like a dog."

Since the reinstatement of the death penalty in 1976, only two capital murder cases have proceeded to trial in federal court in the District.

In both cases, defendants were given life in prison without parole.

In 2003, a federal jury deadlocked on whether to recommend the death penalty for Murder Inc. gang members Kevin L. Gray and Rodney Moore. Gray was convicted in 19 murders and Moore was found guilty in 10 murders. The deadlock meant both received life in prison without parole.

In the other case, a federal jury in 2004 rejected the death penalty for the "1-5 Mob" leader Tommy Edelin, who was convicted in four murders in the prosecution of the Southeast gang.

In another still pending case in federal court in the District, federal authorities in 2004 filed a notice to seek the death penalty against three defendants charged with killing two American tourists in Uganda in 1999.

1st MS-13 Trial To Reveal Hierarchy (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Law enforcement officials say the MS-13 street gang has wreaked violent havoc in parts of Prince George's and Montgomery counties, committing murders, assaults, rapes and robberies as part of a coldly calculated criminal conspiracy.

Starting this week in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, federal prosecutors will get the chance to prove it.

Opening statements are scheduled to begin tomorrow morning as the first two alleged members of MS-13 charged with racketeering in Maryland go on trial.

DOJ_NMG_0068649

Twenty-two alleged members were indicted on the federal racketeering charges, and three have pleaded guilty to related charges. Prosecutors have filed papers saying they are seeking the death penalty against nine of the remaining 19 defendants.

The sweeping indictment accuses the gang of six homicides and four attempted homicides between April 2003 and June 2005. Eight were in Prince George's and the others in Montgomery.

MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, is far more structured than typical neighborhood street gangs, federal prosecutors say. In a superseding indictment handed up last week, prosecutors allege that MS-13 operates in 10 states and in the District as well as in El Salvador, Honduras and Mexico and has 10,000 members.

In Prince George's and Montgomery, MS-13 members have conspired to commit rape, kidnapping, robbery and obstruction of justice by attacking or intimidating witnesses, the indictment alleges.

Prosecutors have not yet been explicit about the gang's hierarchy and how it operates. That will change during the trial when prosecutors present their evidence, Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said.

To obtain convictions under the federal RICO law -- originally written to target Mafia groups -- prosecutors must show that the crimes committed by MS-13 members were part of an ongoing criminal enterprise, rather than isolated, unrelated acts.

"We need to demonstrate what the organization is, how it operates," Rosenstein said. "I think there will be some revelations as to how the group operates. It's one of the most complex prosecutions we've had in this [federal court] district."

The first trial, of Oscar Ramos "Casper" Velasquez, 21, of Baltimore and Edgar Alberto "Pony" Ayala, 29, of Suitland is expected to last at least six weeks. Neither faces the death penalty.

According to the indictment handed up last week, Velasquez and other alleged Mara Salvatrucha gang members sexually assaulted two juvenile girls at an MS-13 "skipping party" -- in which students ditch school -- on May 12, 2003. Velasquez is accused of having a deadly weapon during that assault.

Velasquez is also charged with helping assault rival gang members outside a Langley Park nightclub in September 2004 and of attending an MS-13 meeting at which dues were collected.

Ayala is charged with giving false testimony before a Prince George's grand jury investigating the May 2004 slaying of Ashley Antonio Urias.

He is also accused of driving with fellow gang members to an apartment building in Fairfax County looking for a rival gang member. The same day, two unnamed MS-13 gang members fired at a group of people sitting outside the Fairfax building, killing one man and injuring two juveniles.

Richard C. Bittner, Velasquez's defense attorney, said his client is "upbeat and confident." Velasquez has no criminal record -- "not even a speeding ticket" -- and knows three of the other defendants only because they all attended High Point High School in Adelphi, Bittner said.

Ayala's attorney did not return phone calls.

Legal analysts said prosecutors will have to not only prove the specific allegations but also convince the jury that the acts were part of an organized criminal conspiracy.

The RICO statute gives prosecutors powerful tools, said Aitan D. Goelman, a former assistant U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York who prosecuted RICO cases against New York City street gangs.

For instance, in the vast majority of criminal trials in state court, prosecutors are not allowed to enter as evidence a defendant's past crimes, his association with a gang or gang activities unless the defendant takes the stand. But the RICO statute allows federal prosecutors to introduce evidence of the gang's activities, even if the defendant does not testify and had nothing do with most of the activities alleged, Goelman said.

"The point of RICO is it's a very heavy hammer, to be used when the pinprick of prosecuting individual members of the group in state court isn't working," said Goelman, now a private white-collar defense attorney in Washington.

In March, one or more of the defendants facing the death penalty is scheduled to be tried. The final trial would end next year if there are no delays, officials said.

Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty against defendants accused of committing murder in the aid of racketeering, murdering a potential federal witness, or using a firearm in a crime of violence.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will decide whether to seek the death penalty for each defendant.

DOJ_NMG_0068650

Potential For Danger At MySpace.com (NSDY)

By Jennifer Barrios, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 25, 2006

MySpace.com offers a place to create personal Web pages and socialize but police say it also provides opportunities for criminals

It's a blog, a community, the online equivalent of an afterschool hangout.

But MySpace.com, the popular site where teens and others can create personal Web pages and hook up with new friends, is also reaching a wider audience of parents, school administrators and law enforcement officials, who increasingly monitor the site for stings and leads.

Much of the time, nothing remarkable happens. Friends hook up with friends, details of teen life are debated and discussed.

But along with the photos of prom outfits and sports logos, some also post troubling messages -- like the MySpace user who earlier this month wrote of plans to bring a gun to Holy Trinity High School in Hicksville. In that case, a mother trolling the site noticed and alerted authorities. The plan wasn't carried out, and there have been no arrests.

Det. Sgt. John Cowie, who heads up the computer crimes section of the Suffolk County Police Department, said his unit uses MySpace and other similar sites to seek out criminal activity in the area.

"It can be a useful tool," Cowie said. "We've seen it in the past where something has happened in the community and the kids are on there talking about it."

Police say they look for more than threats of violence. Pedophiles, too, use social sites to search for victims.

Suffolk Det. Rory Forrestal created a fake profile of a young teenage girl on MySpace, complete with photos, a list of hobbies and even links to other phony teenagers. (The photos are culled from overseas or are computer-altered composites of multiple children.)

His online alter ego receives dozens of solicitations a week, some from adult men looking for more than a new friend.

Last April, Forrestal used MySpace to find David M. Murillo, a 21-year-old from Syosset. They had tips that he was pursuing young girls.

"His profile had tons of 12- and 13-year-old girls on it," Forrestal said. Murillo was arrested after he showed up at a public marina to meet who he allegedly thought was a 13-year-old girl. As the fake teenager, Forrestal wrote to Murillo online saying, "My girlfriend said you are cute." Murillo wrote back saying he was 15.

"That was a MySpace case," Forrestal said. "We would have difficulty making the case without MySpace. It provided wonderful leads."

Scanned for criminal activity

Nassau County Police Department spokesman Det. Lt. Kevin Smith said his department also uses the popular networking site in its investigations.

"There is sometimes criminal activity that is disguised by a MySpace ad or correspondence," Smith said. "We typically scan them, just as we would go through classified ads as well. If we see anything that would look like illegal activity, we would conduct an investigation." Smith declined to go into specifics.

But sites like MySpace are so vast that it's impossible for local police departments to monitor everything. So police and school administrators urge parents to be aware of what their kids are doing in these online communities.

"As a parent and an educator, it's frightening," said Michael Cohen, interim superintendent of the Brentwood schools.

The school district blocks the Web site from its school computers, and one of the district's middle-school principals sent parents a letter last February urging them to be aware of what their children do on MySpace.

Cohen blocked his own children from MySpace, concerned that they would encounter pornography and pedophiles. Because of the way MySpace works, the only way to monitor activity is to create a profile.

MySpace.com, which is owned by Rupert Murdoch's News Corp., is a series of intricate personal Web sites created by teens and others.

DOJ_NMG_0068651

Hemanshu Nigam, chief security officer for MySpace and Fox Interactive Media, said he encourages parents and police alike to monitor the site.

"Law enforcement has to do what it has to do to conduct its investigations," Nigam said. "We're here to help them."

The site's other security measures include blocking public access to the profiles of younger members and encouraging adult supervision.

Nigam, a former Justice Department prosecutor, was hired in April to be in charge of safety and law enforcement issues for the site, which has more than 100 million users. Today the company is launching a new online safety campaign.

'It's a tool for a parent'

Levittown parent Debra Palmer said she considers My Space a useful way to find out more about her children and their friends.

Palmer said she thought about banning her daughter, now 21, and her son, an 18-year-old recent high-school graduate, from the Web site when they were younger but opted instead to monitor their use.

"In one way, it's a tool for a parent," Palmer said. "We found it just to be really an avenue where we can kind of get a grasp on what kids are doing, what they're talking about, what they're getting involved in."

Regulating Love: Lawmakers Cracking Down On Web Dating Industry (LAW)

By Tresa Baldas, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 25, 2006

Several states are cracking down on the online dating industry, proposing new laws that would, among other things, mandate criminal background checks on all those looking for love on the Internet.

To date, New York is the only state that has a law regulating online dating sites, but six other states have introduced similar legislation mainly in the last year. They are California, Florida, Michigan, Ohio, Virginia and Texas.

Lawmakers seeking to regulate the online dating scene claim that the industry isn't doing enough to police itself, and consequently, is putting vulnerable people at risk of meeting up with predators.

Proposed legislation has varied from state to state, with some states wanting to make criminal background checks mandatory, and others wanting online companies to alert surfers upfront that background checks on potential dates have not been done.

FALSE SECURITY?

Attorney Markham Erickson of Holch & Erickson in Washington, D.C., who counsels dating and social-networking sites on legislative and regulatory matters, noted that some of the states' proposals have raised constitutional concerns because of the interstate nature of the Internet.

"It's nearly impossible for a dating service to put state boundaries around the service and comply with a patchwork of state laws," he said.

Michael Marin of Houston-based Vinson & Elkins' Austin, Texas, office, who has represented clients in the online dating industry in recent litigation, said that "[r]ight now if you're a consumer and you meet someone online you can go and pay for a background check.

There's no reason to mandate that." He added that background checks "would create a false sense of security and create a liability for the online dating company."

Last year, Marin successfully defended an online dating company that was sued by a user who allegedly was raped by someone she met on the company's Web site. Marin got the case dismissed, citing the 1996 Communications Decency Act (CDA), which grants broad immunity to Internet companies for content provided by third parties.

Marin is also currently defending Myspace.com in a Texas case involving a 14-year-old girl who claims she was sexually assaulted by someone she met on Myspace, and is seeking to hold the Web site liable. Marin declined to comment on that case. Doe v. MySpace Inc., No. D-1-GN-06-002209 (Travis Co., Texas, Dist. Ct.).

DOJ_NMG_0068652

Marin noted that, with background checks, customers could sue over a date who had been screened but turned out to be dangerous. Those users could argue that the company had falsely represented the person as being safe, he said, and that the criminal background check served as "some sort of stamp of approval" by the company.

Yahoo Personals echoed that sentiment, arguing that criminal background checks are unreliable, incomplete and inconsistent.

"We do not believe that the providers of background checks have at this point developed processes that can meaningfully increase the security we provide our customers today," said Yahoo Personals spokeswoman Kelley Podboy. "The systems available are uneven from state to state as well as county by county."

Not all dating Web sites, however, are resisting background checks. TheBadge.org recently started offering free criminal background checks to paid members. Another site, True, offers its users background checks on felons and married people.

Anita Ramasastry, who teaches electronic commerce at the University of Washington School of Law, said that while the online dating industry is already protected against lawsuits through the CDA, how far that protection goes is the new question. She said that Web sites are now faced with the possibility of liability for harm that occurs not on, but off, the Internet, such as rapes or physical assaults.

"What happens when you go offline ... when the harm was offline? It's sort of a gray area and a novel legal question," said Ramasastry, who favors offering broad protection to the dating Web sites, and letting them police themselves.

But lawmakers argue that the industry is too young and immature for that, and people could get hurt.

"It's like the wild, wild West out there," said Michigan state Sen. Alan Cropsey, who is co-sponsoring a bill that would require online dating services to perform routine criminal background checks on users. "When somebody goes online and says, 'I'm so and so,' they ought to be able to check and say 'Hey, is this name popping up anywhere as far as being a sex offender or a domestic violence offender?'"

DA Sez Feds Won't Hand Over Data (NYDN)

New York Daily News, September 25, 2006

Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes' office has accused federal prosecutors of refusing to turn over key interviews from a past federal probe into a rogue FBI agent now indicted in four murders.

In a sharp Sept. 20 letter to the U.S. attorney's office, prosecutor Noel Downey acknowledged his office received more than 2,000 pages of documents and access to witnesses in the 1994 federal probe into Lindley DeVecchio's relationship with his top Mafia informant, Gregory Scarpa.

DeVecchio, now retired in Florida, has been indicted for allegedly helping Scarpa whack four enemies during the Colombo crime family wars in the late 1980s.

Federal investigators ended their probe in 1996, saying they could not "substantiate" corruption charges against DeVecchio. Among those interviewed was Deputy U.S. Attorney Ellen Corcella, who was handling mob prosecutions in the early '90s. Hynes' office received only a heavily redacted version of Corcella's interview.

"It is inconceivable and troubling that a United States attorney's office would prevent disclosure of a federal prosecutor's ... statement regarding DeVecchio to a district attorney's office investigation investigating DeVecchio's participation in four murders," Downey wrote.

The U.S. attorney's office declined to comment.

DeVecchio has denied any wrongdoing.

Nancie L. Katz

In Tiny Courts Of New York, Abuses Of Law And Power (NYT)

By William Glaberson

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

Some of the courtrooms are not even courtrooms: tiny offices or basement rooms without a judge's bench or jury box. Sometimes the public is not admitted, witnesses are not sworn to tell the truth, and there is no word-for-word record of the proceedings.

Nearly three-quarters of the judges are not lawyers, and many — truck drivers, sewer workers or laborers — have scant grasp of the most basic legal principles. Some never got through high school, and at least one went no further than grade school.

But serious things happen in these little rooms all over New York State. People have been sent to jail without a guilty plea or a trial, or tossed from their homes without a proper proceeding. In violation of the law, defendants have been refused lawyers, or sentenced to weeks in jail because they cannot pay a fine. Frightened women have been denied protection from abuse.

These are New York's town and village courts, or justice courts, as the 1,250 of them are widely known. In the public imagination, they are quaint holdovers from a bygone era, handling nothing weightier than traffic tickets and small claims. They get a roll of the eyes from lawyers who amuse one another with tales of incompetent small-town justices.

A woman in Malone, N.Y., was not amused. A mother of four, she went to court in that North Country village seeking an order of protection against her husband, who the police said had choked her, kicked her in the stomach and threatened to kill her. The justice, Donald R. Roberts, a former state trooper with a high school diploma, not only refused, according to state officials, but later told the court clerk, "Every woman needs a good pounding every now and then."

A black soldier charged in a bar fight near Fort Drum became alarmed when his accuser described him in court as "that colored man." But the village justice, Charles A. Pennington, a boat hauler and a high school graduate, denied his objections and later convicted him. "You know," the justice said, "I could understand if he would have called you a Negro, or he had called you a nigger."

And several people in the small town of Dannemora were intimidated by their longtime justice, Thomas R. Buckley, a phone-company repairman who cursed at defendants and jailed them without bail or a trial, state disciplinary officials found. Feuding with a neighbor over her dog's running loose, he threatened to jail her and ordered the dog killed.

"I just follow my own common sense," Mr. Buckley, in an interview, said of his 13 years on the bench. "And the hell with the law."

The New York Times spent a year examining the life and history of this largely hidden world, a constellation of 1,971 part-time justices, from the suburbs of New York City to the farm towns near Niagara Falls.

It is impossible to say just how many of those justices are ill-informed or abusive. Officially a part of the state court system, yet financed by the towns and villages, the justice courts are essentially unsupervised by either. State court officials know little about the justices, and cannot reliably say how many cases they handle or how many are appealed. Even the agency charged with disciplining them, the State Commission on Judicial Conduct, is not equipped to fully police their vast numbers.

But The Times reviewed public documents dating back decades and, unannounced, visited courts in every part of the state. It examined records of closed disciplinary hearings. It tracked down defendants, and interviewed prosecutors and defense lawyers, plaintiffs and bystanders.

The examination found overwhelming evidence that decade after decade and up to this day, people have often been denied fundamental legal rights. Defendants have been jailed illegally. Others have been subjected to racial and sexual bigotry so explicit it seems to come from some other place and time. People have been denied the right to a trial, an impartial judge and the presumption of innocence.

In 2003 alone, justices disciplined by the state included one in Montgomery County who had closed his court to the public and let prosecutors run the proceedings during 20 years in office. Another, in Westchester County, had warned the police not to arrest his political cronies for drunken driving, and asked a Lebanese-American with a parking ticket if she was a terrorist. A third, in Delaware County, had been convicted of having sex with a mentally retarded woman in his care.

New York is one of about 30 states that still rely on these kinds of local judges, descendants of the justices who kept the peace in Colonial days, when lawyers were scarce. Many states, alarmed by mistakes and abuse, have moved in recent decades to rein in their authority or require more training. Some, from Delaware to California, have overhauled the courts, scrapped them entirely or required that local judges be lawyers.

But New York has no such requirement. It demands more schooling for licensed manicurists and hair stylists.

And it has left its justices with the same powers — more than in many states — even though governors, blue-ribbon commissions and others have been denouncing the courts as outdated and unjust since as far back as 1908, when a justice in Westchester County set up a roadside speed trap, fining drivers for whatever cash they were carrying.

DOJ_NMG_0068654

Nearly a century later, a 76-year-old Elmira man who contested a speeding ticket in Newfield, outside Ithaca, was jailed without even a warning for three days in 2003 because he called the sheriff's deputy a liar.

"I thought, this is not America," said the man, Michael J. Pronti, who spent two years and $8,000 before a state appeals court ruled that he had been improperly jailed.

'Justice in the Dark'

It is tempting to view the justice courts as weak and inconsequential because the bulk of their business is traffic violations. Yet among their 2.2 million cases, the courts handle more than 300,000 criminal matters a year. Justices can impose jail sentences of up to two years. Even in the smallest cases, some have wielded powers and punishments far beyond what the law allows.

The reason is plain: Many do not know or seem to care what the law is. Justices are not screened for competence, temperament or even reading ability. The only requirement is that they be elected. But voters often have little inkling of the justices' power or their sometimes tainted records.

For the nearly 75 percent of justices who are not lawyers, the only initial training is six days of state-administered classes, followed by a true-or-false test so rudimentary that the official who runs it said only one candidate since 1999 had failed. A sample question for the justices: "Town and village justices must maintain dignity, order and decorum in their courtrooms" — true or false?

The result, records and interviews show, is a second-class system of justice.

The first class — the city, county and higher courts — is familiar to anyone who has served on a jury or watched "Law & Order": hardly perfect, but a place of law-schooled judges, support staffs and strict rules. The lower and far larger rung of town and village courts relies on part-time justices, most of them poorly paid, some without a single clerk. Those justices — two-thirds of all the state's judges — are not required to make transcripts or tape recordings of what goes on, so it is often difficult to appeal their decisions.

When they stray badly, the Commission on Judicial Conduct — a panel of lawyers, judges and others — can do little more than try to contain the damage.

Some 1,140 justices have received some sort of reprimand over the last three decades — an average of about 40 a year, either privately warned, publicly rebuked or removed. They are seriously disciplined at a steeper rate than their higher-court colleagues.

The Office of Court Administration, which runs the state court system, makes little pretense of knowing much about what happens in the justice courts. Beyond their names, ages and addresses, it has little information about the justices. Because they are paid by the towns and loosely tied into the court system, "we have limited administrative control, and very, very limited financial control," said Jan H. Plumadore, the deputy chief administrative judge for all courts outside New York City.

The courts also handle money — more than $200 million a year in fines and fees. But the state comptroller's office, which once conducted scores of justice-court audits every year, now does only a handful. When it looked most recently, auditing a dozen courts in May, it reported serious financial-management problems and estimated that millions of dollars a year might be missing from the justice courts statewide.

Norman P. Effman has been the public defender for 16 years in Wyoming County, where he said only one of the 37 justices was a lawyer. In testimony last year, he described the justice courts as a forgotten realm: a "closed door, back of someone's house, in the barn, in the highway department, no record" justice system.

"The reality is," he told a state commission, "if you keep justice in the dark, it stays in the dark."

That commission, which was studying how the court system treats poor people, issued a study in June saying the justice courts remained "a fractured and flawed system." And in recent days, the Office of Court Administration has said it plans to begin addressing some of those failings — for instance, taking steps to double the amount of initial training and to ensure that proceedings are recorded.

But those measures do not address some of the most serious problems: the use of justices who are not lawyers, and the state's weak oversight.

DOJ_NMG_0068655

This is not the first time the justice courts have come under scrutiny. “Probably the most unsatisfactory feature of the administration of criminal law remaining in the state today is the obsolete and antiquated institution known as the justice of the peace,” another state commission concluded.

The year was 1927.

A Record of Trouble

Certainly, there are worthy justices, and defenders of the system say the good far outnumber the bad. Those supporters, chiefly the justices themselves and the local political leaders who often select them, contend that hometown judges know the hometown problems — and the problem people — and can tailor common-sense solutions.

And, they have argued, putting lawyers in charge of all the courts could cost the state tens of millions of dollars.

“It is the most efficient, low-cost method of ensuring that the people of the state receive justice,” said Thomas R. Dias, a town justice in Columbia County who is president of the State Magistrates Association, the justices’ organization.

But the record shows otherwise in hundreds of disciplinary cases — most of them unknown to the public.

In the Catskills, Stanley Yusko routinely jailed people awaiting trial for longer than the law allows — in one case for 64 days because he thought the defendant had information about vandalism at the justice’s own home, said state officials, who removed him as Coxsackie village justice in 1995. Mr. Yusko was not even supposed to be a justice; he had actually failed the true-or-false test.

Outside Rochester, in Le Roy, a justice who is still in office concocted false statements, state officials said, to help immigration officials deport a Hispanic migrant worker in 2003. Although the man had pleaded not guilty to trespassing, the town justice, Charles E. Dusen, issued a court order saying he had been convicted. In an interview, Justice Dusen said he tried to right his wrong after the worker’s lawyer complained. But the man was still deported.

Last December, disciplinary officials disclosed that in a five-year period, a Rochester-area justice had mistakenly imposed $170,000 in traffic fines beyond what the law allowed. And in June, a justice in western New York was disciplined for threatening to jail a man — and warning him to “bring a couple thousand in bail money” — over a complaining phone message the man had left him.

Even the commuter towns around New York City, where the justices are typically lawyers, have endured the system’s abuses.

In Mount Kisco, people who asked for the court’s sympathy were treated to sarcasm: Justice Joseph J. Cerbone would pull out a nine-inch violin and threaten to play. Mr. Cerbone phoned one woman and talked her out of pressing abuse charges against the son of former clients, state records show. But it took eight years, and evidence that he had taken money from an escrow account, before the State Court of Appeals removed him in 2004 after a quarter-century in office.

In interviews, many of these justices disputed the findings against them, saying the Commission on Judicial Conduct was unfair and determined to end the justice courts.

Commission officials say they have no such agenda.

And the agency is struggling itself. Charged with policing all the state’s courts, it can do no more than respond to complaints. Its staff has shrunk by more than half in the last two decades, with just two investigators for the western half of the state.

So commission officials were surprised to learn last year that a western New York justice who had resigned while facing disciplinary charges was back on the bench.

The commission twice disciplined the town justice, Paul F. Bender of Marion, for deriding women in abuse cases. Arraigning one man on assault charges, he asked the police investigator whether the case was “just a Saturday night brawl where he smacks her and she wants him back in the morning.”

But the commission spared him removal in 1999 because he was not seeking re-election. Four years later Mr. Bender ran again anyway, unbeknownst to the commission, for a term that will not expire until 2007.

Robert H. Tembeckjian, the commission’s administrator, said, “Our working assumption is, a judge who resigns while under disciplinary charges by the commission is not going to return to the bench.” But he would not say whether his agency would — or could — take any action against Justice Bender.

DOJ_NMG_0068656

'I'm Not a Lawyer'

A 17-year-old girl had stayed out all night, then fought with her family and wound up facing a harassment charge in court in Alexandria Bay, a busy tourist village on the St. Lawrence River. The justice, Charles A. Pennington, a boat hauler with 23 years on the bench, took her not-guilty plea on a Sunday in 2003.

But when told that the girl had no place to go, the judge did not send her to a women's shelter or alert social service officials, as local justices typically do. He took her home.

"I left the court kind of in shock," a police officer later testified. "I've never heard of anything like this before."

The girl's mother, Keitha Rogers, said in an interview that she was appalled to find her daughter at the home of the justice, then 61, as he sat drinking with another man. "Sure, he can tell the difference between the stern and the bow," Ms. Rogers said. "But what does that have to do with making major judgments about people's lives?"

The judicial conduct commission, which ordered Justice Pennington's removal last fall for this and other lapses, ruled that while there was no evidence he had made any improper advances toward the girl, who left after about an hour, he had shown "extraordinarily poor judgment."

And while Mr. Pennington argued that he had not been drinking, he did not entirely disagree with the findings. "Granted, there is mistakes," said the justice, who resigned before the commission ruled. "I'm not a lawyer."

Neither are most of his peers. And that is pretty much all the state knows about them. Office of Court Administration officials say the only way they usually find out a new justice has been elected is if local officials notify them.

For decades, the agency has asked justices to fill out modest biographical questionnaires, then filed away the answers. Under freedom of information law, The Times obtained questionnaires completed by more than 1,800 current justices; they portray a group that is often poorly educated and poorly paid, even though the law they are dealing with is increasingly complex.

Of those who are not lawyers, about a third — more than 400 — had no formal education beyond high school. At least 40 did not complete high school, though several went on to earn equivalency degrees.

Interviews with more than 60 justices made it clearer who many of these people are: retirees, farmers, mechanics, former police officers and others with flexible schedules or seasonal work. Most look something like Mr. Pennington: white, and graying. At least 30 justices are in their 80's, well beyond the mandatory retirement age, 70, for other New York judges.

Though the justices' pay is often meager — as little as $850 a year — they can set bail, a basic legal safeguard. They hold crucial preliminary hearings in felony cases and conduct trials on misdemeanors. They preside over civil cases with claims of up to $3,000, and landlord-tenant disputes with no dollar limit, including commercial cases involving hundreds of thousands of dollars.

And then there are the powers they simply take.

In what the Commission on Judicial Conduct called "a shocking abuse of judicial power," Justice Roger C. Maclaughlin single-handedly went after a man he decided was violating local codes on the keeping of livestock in Steuben, near Utica. The justice interviewed witnesses, tipped off the code-enforcement officer, lobbied the town board to deny the man approval to run a trailer park, then jailed him for 10 days without bail — or even a chance to defend himself, the commission said.

In an interview, Justice Maclaughlin said the commission seemed to be chasing legal technicalities rather than real justice.

An Essex County town justice, Richard H. Rock, jailed two 16-year-olds overnight without a trial, saying he wanted "to teach them a lesson." They had been accused of spitting at two other people and charged with harassment. Then he sent them back for 10 more days, the commission said, without ever advising them they had a right to a lawyer.

In 2001, the commission punished him and Justice Maclaughlin with censure, the most serious penalty short of removal from the bench. Justice Maclaughlin is now in his 11th year in office. Justice Rock is in his 10th.

In Alexandria Bay, where Justice Pennington presided at a metal desk in a tiny room inside the police building, a quarter-century in office did not seem to deepen his understanding of his role. Just three days after he took home the 17-year-old girl, another case raised fresh questions about his familiarity with the law, or even the world outside his court.

DOJ_NMG_0068657

Eeric D. Bailey, a 21-year-old black soldier from nearby Fort Drum, was facing a disorderly conduct charge after a tussle with a white bar bouncer. Sitting three feet from Mr. Bailey, the bouncer identified him as "that colored man." Mr. Bailey's jaw dropped.

The soldier, who did not have a lawyer, told the judge that the term was offensive. But Justice Pennington said that while certain other words were racist, "colored" was not. "For years we had no colored people here," he said.

The commission had heard worse. After arraigning three black defendants arrested in a college disturbance in 1994, a justice in the Finger Lakes region said in court, "Oh, it's been a rough day — all those blacks in here." A few years before that, a Catskill justice reminisced in court that it was safe for young women to walk around "before the blacks and Puerto Ricans moved here."

In an interview, Justice Pennington said the commission had treated him unfairly. But he may not have helped his case when he told the commission that "colored" was an acceptable description.

"I mean, to me," he testified, "colored doesn't preferably mean black. It could be an Indian, who's red. It could be Chinese, who's considered yellow."

Basic Training

As the blunders, and worse, have piled up over the years, so have the muffled complaints from within the system. Transcripts of the commission's disciplinary hearings, which are usually closed to the public, show that some justices have nearly begged for more training, or any kind of help.

Anthony Ellis, a meat cutter who routinely jailed defendants in Tupper Lake to coerce them into pleading guilty, neatly summed up his insecurities in one closed hearing: "I'm almost like a pilot flying by the seat of my pants."

William G. Mayville, a retired factory worker who turned his courtroom in nearby Fort Covington into a collection agency for local business owners, offered a quietly damning explanation: "I certainly am only a simple man doing a job that, you know, the very best I can do with a limited amount of education that they offered me."

Simple men, and their simple wisdom, are the whole idea behind the justice courts. A 13th-century English institution, the justice of the peace was imported to the colonies in the 1600's along with a fundamental notion: that laymen could settle small-bore cases with practical solutions grounded in local custom or common sense.

But as life, and the law, became vastly more complex by the mid-20th century, several states, including California, New Jersey and Connecticut, created more professional local courts.

In Delaware, where the appointed local magistrates have less authority than New York's justices, the state screens candidates with academic and psychological tests, and starts them off with 11 weeks of training. "It is a reflection of the view that when we're dealing with people's livelihood, when we're dealing with people's freedom, we're going to take this seriously," said the chief magistrate, Alan G. Davis, a lawyer.

In New York, the justice courts have been replaced by state-financed district courts, with lawyer judges, in Nassau County and western Suffolk County. But the last major calls for statewide reform sputtered out in the early 1980's, and the amount of training for justices has not changed. Those without law degrees must take six days of classes at the start. Lawyers do not have to attend, but all justices must take a 12-hour refresher course once a year.

Maryrita Dobiel, who runs the training program for the Office of Court Administration, said the classes provide an introduction to legal principles, but not much more, given a student body with such varying levels of education. "We have to teach to the lowest common denominator," she said. General principles of criminal law, a subject that takes up a semester or more in law school, gets about five hours.

At training's end, justices must score at least 70 percent on a test of 50 questions, all true or false. Those who fail can retake the course, and the test. "We don't decide whether they're qualified to be a judge," Ms. Dobiel said. "The people who have elected them have already made that decision."

The real test comes on the bench.

Several justices have threatened to arrest litigants in small-claims cases, showing they do not understand the difference between civil and criminal cases. Others have told the judicial conduct commission that they disagreed with the constitutional guarantee that a defendant is entitled to a lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0068658

John D. Cox, a quarry manager in Le Ray, near Watertown, summarily jailed people who were unable to pay fines, the commission said. But he received the lightest public penalty, an admonition, in 2002 after he explained that in 22 years in office, he had never been taught that state law allows defendants a new hearing and a lawyer when they say they cannot pay their fine.

The justices do have something of a lifeline: They can call a resource center near Albany where four lawyers field more than 18,000 questions a year. But there are limits on what the center tries to do.

"We tell them what their options are," said the center's supervisor, Paul Toomey. "We don't tell them they're wrong."

Power and Prejudice

Few people who came to his court ever told Donald R. Roberts he was wrong. A strapping former state trooper, he was working as a gas-company truck driver when he was appointed village justice in Malone, near the Canadian border, in 1993. When he was removed five years later, the Commission on Judicial Conduct dispatched him with a stinging description: "a biased, mean-spirited, bullying judge."

It was Justice Roberts who declared that women needed "a good pounding." He had already battled with the county district attorney over his resistance to granting orders of protection.

When a village resident asked that the dentist suing him be forced to come to court to prove his case, Justice Roberts told the man, who had a Hispanic surname: "You're not from around here, and that's not the way we do things around here." The justice did not mention that the plaintiff was his own dentist.

A common argument in favor of New York's justice courts is that local judges know the people and problems that come before them. But that can be a problem itself when justices use those prejudices to favor friends and ride herd over others.

"They have their own little fiefdoms," said Laurie Shanks, an Albany Law School professor. "Some are benevolent despots, but despots nonetheless."

Again and again, the commission's records show, justices have failed to remove themselves from cases involving their own families.

In this department, Pamela L. Kadur may hold a record. As town justice in Root, west of Schenectady, she presided over at least seven cases involving relatives, who often received lenient treatment, the commission said when it ordered her removal in 2003. Justice Kadur heard a speeding case against her son in her own kitchen, then tried to cover up their family relationship in record books, the commission said, by misspelling his last name.

One longtime town justice near Albany let a friend who owned a driving school sit with him at the bench; when the justice ordered anyone to take a driver-training course, only the friend's school was acceptable. Another justice, in Rensselaer County, told a trucker charged with drunken driving that he would not suspend his license because "I can't do that to a fellow truck driver."

Historically, large numbers of the justices have been former law enforcement officers, and lawyers complain that many have unfairly favored the police and prosecutors.

Some justices, unsure of the law, have also come to rely too much on the authorities. Elaine M. Rider, who presided in Waterville, near Utica, fretted that she did not "really have the time to puzzle this out" when a criminal defendant argued that evidence had been seized illegally. So she had the prosecutor write her decision, the commission said.

But one of the most common prejudices on view in the commission's files is far more basic, and it can be found as often in the big-city suburbs that have official-looking courthouses and lawyers on the bench.

In 20 years in office in Haverstraw, north of New York City in Rockland County, Justice Ralph T. Romano drew attention for his opinions on women, state files show. Arraigning a man in 1997 on charges that he had hit his wife in the face with a telephone, he laughed and asked, "What was wrong with this?" Arraigning a woman on charges that she had sexually abused a 12-year-old boy, the justice asked his courtroom, "Where were girls like this when I was 12?"

Across the Hudson, Joseph Cerbone, the Mount Kisco justice with the miniature violin, persuaded a young woman to drop her abuse case against the son of a couple he had done legal work for. She told the commission that while she did not believe the justice's claim that the son was "a decent guy" who had "made a mistake," she had no choice.

"I kind of felt I had no one behind me, no support," she said. "And by getting a phone call from a judge, I felt that maybe I was making a mistake by going through with these charges."

DOJ_NMG_0068659

But the human damage can be much worse in the small communities where the justice is often the most powerful local official.

In 11 years as justice in Dannemora, in the North Country, Thomas R. Buckley had his own special treatment for defendants without much money: Even if they were found not guilty, he ordered them to perform community service work to pay for their court-appointed lawyers, although defense lawyers and the district attorney had reminded him for years that the law guaranteed a lawyer at no cost.

"The only unconstitutional part," he told the commission before it removed him in 2000, "is for these freeloaders to expect a free ride."

He twice jailed David Velie, a 19-year-old charged with a misdemeanor, even though the law required him to set bail. In an interview, Mr. Buckley explained that the young man had been a troublemaker "ever since he was born."

Like many small-town justices, he said many of his decisions were down-to-earth solutions. "You've got to use your own judgment," he said. "That's why they call us judges. The law is not always right."

Some residents say that without the law to protect them, they lived in fear. Debra E. Bordeau, the justice's neighbor, said she went into hiding after he threatened to jail her in a dispute over her dog, which he ordered destroyed.

And Carson F. Arnold Sr., a contractor from a nearby town, was jailed for five days after a woman who knew Justice Buckley complained that Mr. Arnold had threatened her, the commission said. There was no trial. The justice simply told Mr. Arnold to shut up, then sentenced him without bail.

"How many years did he treat people like this?" Mr. Arnold asked in an interview. "How many people did this affect?"

A Culture of Secrets

The feeling of powerlessness often begins at the courthouse door.

Many justices preside in intimidatingly tight quarters, admitting participants one by one. Many have heard testimony, settled claims or ruled in criminal cases without notifying the prosecutor, lawyers or even the people directly involved. Some justices can be very selective, state records show: At a 1999 criminal trial in Kinderhook, south of Albany, Justice Edward J. Williams admitted everyone but the victim's lawyer.

Court sessions may be just as unpredictable — held infrequently or at odd hours, or canceled without notice. In 2004, the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund found that people awaiting trial in Schuyler County in the Finger Lakes were jailed for months simply waiting for court to convene again. A high school student arrested on a minor drug charge in the summer of 2003, it said, was still sitting in jail in October.

But the biggest obstacle of all is pinning down what happens in the courtrooms.

A Rochester poverty lawyer, Laurie Lambrix, said that when she appealed the case of a mother of six — a black woman evicted in 1999 by a white landlord who she said had made racist comments — a justice in nearby Gates told her she could not examine the court file of her own client. "I knew court records were public records," Ms. Lambrix said. "I couldn't believe a judge would be ignorant of that."

She was lucky; at least there were records, which she eventually obtained. In many justice courts, it is next to impossible to reconstruct what happened. Some towns spring for a stenographer or taping system, and some justices try to scrawl notes while they preside. But in some cases, there are not even notes.

When someone does appeal, the law requires that justices write a summary of the case. Justices said in interviews that their decisions were rarely appealed, anyway, and even more rarely overturned.

The Commission on Judicial Conduct, then, remains the last line of oversight for justices, and only for those who have stirred up enough concern to be reported by a prosecutor, lawyer or citizen. But the panel is stretched thin — "persistently and acutely underfunded," as it lamented in one annual report. Its statewide staff, which numbered 63 in 1978 when it began, is down to 29.

Supporters of the justice courts have long maintained that they are no worse than the higher courts, citing commission statistics that show justices are disciplined at about the same rate as their higher-court colleagues. But responding to questions from The Times, commission officials studied the agency's three-decade record and found — to their surprise — that cases against local justices were more likely to result in serious punishments.

DOJ_NMG_0068660

Although the justices make up about 66 percent of all New York judges, they constitute 76 percent of the 147 judges who have been removed from office.

Last year, six justices were publicly disciplined for the second time, more repeat offenders than ever. But Mr. Tembeckjian, the commission administrator, said the agency had no way to keep a closer eye on them.

"It would be in the public interest for the commission to make sure that a judge who was identified as having a problem has corrected it," he said. "But we simply don't have the resources to do it."

Lawrence S. Goldman, the commission's chairman until April, said all justices should be lawyers. His successor, the divorce lawyer Raoul Felder, would not discuss the quality of the justice courts, but predicted that a reckoning was at hand.

"This is something that's going to have to be addressed by the next governor," he said. "There is a controversy here, and this issue has not been addressed for many, many years."

Credit Firms Push To Thwart Fraud (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

MasterCard Inc. and Visa USA Inc. are clamping down on merchants that flout rules aimed at protecting card transactions from fraudsters.

In recent weeks, MasterCard has imposed fines on merchants that haven't met its requirements to keep transactions secure. Starting Saturday, Visa will take aim at the nation's largest merchants with fines that start at $10,000 a month and can rise to $100,000 a month.

The fines are the latest effort by the credit- and debit-card industry to reduce financial exposure -- and bad publicity -- from a round of high-profile security breaches. Cardholders normally aren't responsible for unauthorized purchases, but merchants and banks involved with fraudulent transactions -- both at stores and online -- can find themselves on the hook.

Visa and MasterCard don't fine the merchants directly. Instead, they levy fines against those that process the transactions on behalf of the merchants. Those entities commonly pass on the fines to their merchant customers. In addition to assessing penalties for failing to comply with the rules, Visa and MasterCard also issue separate fines if a noncompliant merchant has a security breach.

Neither Visa nor MasterCard would identify merchants that are violating the rules. But because Visa is honing in on the biggest merchants -- those that ring up more than six million transactions a year -- they likely include some household names. Visa counts 334 merchants in this category; as of Friday, 20 of them were in violation and could face fines if they don't comply by the end of the month, according to the card association. These big merchants represent nearly 50% of Visa's transactions each year.

Visa and MasterCard, which operate the massive card networks, have established comprehensive security rules for banks, merchants and other entities that store, process or transmit cardholder data. Among the rules: Merchants aren't permitted to store data that is contained on a card's magnetic stripe, they must take precautions with people who have access to computer systems and they must restrict access to cardholder information.

Visa has found it difficult to meet its own deadlines. The card association's debit-card processing arm was supposed to validate its security plan at the end of last year, but got final approval from an outside auditor last week. Some 84% of other Visa processors have validated their plans.

"Visa holds itself to the same high security standards as we hold merchants and other processors," said Rosetta Jones, a spokeswoman for Visa. She acknowledged that the processing unit had been behind schedule for validation, but stressed that it had been complying with the other security standards.

MasterCard declined to discuss the amount of fines that have been levied, but indicated that the decision to impose financial penalties is taken as a last resort. "We are not levying fines for noncompliance. We are levying them for noncooperation," said Chris Thom, chief risk officer for the card network.

DOJ_NMG_0068661

Although MasterCard has been issuing fines for more than a year, several industry members said that the levies seem to have accelerated recently and a series have been handed down this month. They estimate that fines have ranged between $5,000 and $15,000. MasterCard declined to comment.

"Visa and MasterCard are paying a lot more attention to this and they should be," said Robert Carr, chief executive of Heartland Payment Systems Inc., a company that processes transactions on behalf of small- and medium-size merchants.

The security rules are particularly daunting for small merchants, who might not be sophisticated about security issues or don't want to spend the money necessary for crucial upgrades to their computer systems. For now, Visa is concentrating its efforts on levying fines for noncompliance by the largest merchants. It expects to tackle the issue as it relates to some smaller merchants beginning next year.

Security has become a top issue in the card industry amid mounting concerns about identity theft. Earlier this year, Citigroup Inc., the nation's largest bank as measured by market value and assets, reissued thousands of MasterCard-branded debit and credit cards after it flagged several hundred fraudulent cash withdrawals at automated teller machines in Britain, Russia and Canada.

Last year some 40 million cards became vulnerable to possible fraud when CardSystems Solutions Inc., a small company that processed transactions for merchants, acknowledged that it had stored customer data in violation of card-industry rules. Retailers also have reported data breaches.

Even Visa isn't impervious. A breach was reported at one of the company's on-site cafeterias last year when someone hacked into the server of the vendor that managed the facility. It was determined that the vendor wasn't complying with Visa rules.

93,754,333 Examples Of Data Nonchalance (NYT)

By Tom Zeller Jr.

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

Less than two years into the great cultural awakening to the vulnerability of personal data, companies and institutions of every shape and size — like the data broker ChoicePoint, the credit card processor CardSystems Solutions, media companies like Time Warner and dozens of colleges and universities across the land — have collectively fumbled 93,754,333 private records. Or at least that's the rough figure the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a consumer advocacy organization in San Diego, has tallied thus far.

An entry from Sept. 7: Chase Card Services, a division of J. P. Morgan Chase, announced that it had begun notifying 2.6 million current and former Circuit City credit card account holders that computer tapes containing their personal information had been inadvertently tossed in the trash.

The bank said it believed the tapes were safely "buried in a landfill" somewhere, but it was nonetheless offering affected consumers the now pro forma consolation prize: one year of free credit monitoring.

Last Thursday, another entry was logged. The Commerce Department announced that between 2001 and the present, 1,137 laptops — or about 4 percent of its total inventory — were lost, missing or had been stolen from its 15 operating units. The largest number, 672, had been in use at the Census Bureau, the department reported, and 246 of those contained "some degree of personal data," although it maintained that a combination of passwords and "complex data formats," among other things, would limit the risk that the information could be misused.

"While we know of no instance of personal information being improperly used, we regret each instance of lost material," Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez said in a statement, "and believe the volume of lost equipment is unacceptable."

•Taking a wider view of things, though, one might say the volume of lost consumer data remains almost comically epidemic. Hackers and sophisticated data thieves are one thing. But in the battle to stop the great hemorrhaging of personal data, the enemy is us.

It was only four months ago, after all, that the United States Department of Veterans Affairs was forced to announce that a laptop and external hard drive containing personal information, including names, Social Security numbers, and dates of birth on roughly 28 million veterans — just shy of 10 percent of the entire United States population — had been stolen from an agency employee's home.

DOJ_NMG_0068662

The equipment was recovered in late June, and in August, two teenagers were arrested in connection with the theft. The F.B.I. has indicated that the data appears to have not been accessed, but practices at the veterans department — where so much sensitive information on so many Americans was being ported to a suburban living room for weekend work — were a study in data nonchalance.

And of course, it's not just a government problem.

Incidents run the gamut: In early June it was revealed that the names, addresses and credit and debit card numbers of some 243,000 customers of Hotels.com were lost to the wind when a laptop holding the data was spirited away by a thief. The device, which belonged to an employee of Ernst & Young, the auditor for Hotels.com, had been left in a locked car. (Well, locking the car was smart, right?)

The names and Social Security numbers — and in some instances medical histories — of some 51,000 current and former patients of PSA HealthCare, a major provider of pediatric home care services for children, were on a laptop stolen from an employee's car on July 15. Computer tape with information on nearly 10,000 employees of the California Department of Mental Health has also apparently gone missing. (The employees were notified by e-mail Aug. 17). And 612 Aflac insurance policy holders were notified on Aug. 11 that a laptop containing their names, addresses, Social Security numbers and dates of birth was pilfered, yet again from an agent's car. (Readers can visit the Privacy Rights scoreboard at privacyrights.org/ar/ChronDataBreaches.htm for more sobering tidbits.)

But a survey of 484 United States-based information technology departments within business or governmental organizations, published in August by the Ponemon Institute, a privacy consulting company, and sponsored by the data security firm Vontu, tells the real story here.

The survey found, among other things, that more than half of corporate laptops contained unprotected sensitive data, that one in 10 laptops is stolen and that 97 percent of those are never recovered. The study also found that 81 percent of firms reported that an "electronic storage device such as a laptop" specifically containing sensitive or confidential information had been lost or stolen in the past year.

If nothing else, the Commerce Department can be comforted by the fact that its loss of 1,137 laptops over the last five years is hardly unusual.

•But the problem is real, said Joseph Ansanelli, the chief executive and founder of Vontu, who has testified before Congress on privacy problems. And it isn't going to be solved by relegating security entirely to passwords and encryption — although that is necessary.

Just as important, Mr. Ansanelli suggested, is simply paying attention, from a policy perspective, to who has access to what data, why, how it's being moved, where it's being moved to — and establishing clear rules to govern it all.

"Only by focusing on understanding where data is stored and where it is going can organizations better protect information and prevent it from being carried or sent insecurely," Mr. Ansanelli said. "Taller fences or more locks on the doors won't help."

And if institutions entrusted to handle personal information don't start getting serious about their stewardship, they may have their hand forced.

"The costs are high to losing customer data, intellectual property or even worse, national intelligence data," Mr. Ansanelli said. "And if organizations do not stop the insanity of data loss, Congress will be forced to act and mandate new protections for all this information."

O.K., just one more: On Aug. 9, the inspector general's office at the United States Department of Transportation reported that a laptop belonging to a special agent working out of Miami was stolen from a government-owned vehicle on July 27 in Doral, Fla. It contained the names, addresses, Social Security numbers and dates of birth — an identity thief's toolkit, in other words — on more than 132,000 individuals.

Perjury Trial Of Ex-SBC Worker Goes To Jury (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

Joann Wiggan is accused of lying to a grand jury looking into investigator Anthony Pellicano.

DOJ_NMG_0068663

Alleging a long pattern of deception, a federal prosecutor Friday urged a Los Angeles jury to convict a former SBC employee of perjury for repeatedly lying about her contacts with a key figure in the Anthony Pellicano wiretapping investigation.

Without linking her directly to the larger case, Assistant U.S. Atty. Daniel Saunders charged that admitted misstatements by Joann Wiggan to a federal grand jury were intentional and clearly aimed at hiding some aspect of her relationship with co-worker Ray Turner.

He has been indicted with Pellicano and others for allegedly providing the private investigator with confidential telephone records used in wiretapping.

"This defendant has changed her story time and time again to fit what she thinks the government can prove," Saunders told the jury as the four-day trial before U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer drew toward a close. "Her credibility is nonexistent."

Saunders said a detailed log of phone calls to and from Wiggan's home, office and cellphones between late 1998 and 2002 proved she was lying to the grand jury when she said she had no contact with Turner and had not begun using her office voicemail until sometime in 2003.

The logs showed more than 1,000 calls from Wiggan's phone numbers to her voicemail, 117 calls from Turner's number to her office voicemail and other calls between numbers assigned to Turner and Wiggan.

The prosecutor also alleged that her lies began even before her grand jury testimony when she told the FBI in an October 2004 interview that she had not spoken to Turner in years. "That is not a memory failure," Saunders said. "That is a coverup."

But Wiggan's attorney, David R. Reed, portrayed the heart of the government's case as its greatest vulnerability, arguing that the phone logs were meaningless without knowing who had made the calls or what the calls were about.

In earlier testimony, Wiggan's son and ex-husband said they had made numerous calls to her office voicemail. And the government's witnesses acknowledged that they had no recordings of the calls or other evidence to establish who made the calls or their content.

"They don't even have one voicemail message from Ray Turner," Reed said Friday. "How can you convict someone when you don't even know what the voicemail message was [about]?"

As his client rocked slowly in her chair, Reed noted that the 52-year-old mother of three had acknowledged mistakes in her testimony before the grand jury. The attorney also reminded the jury that Wiggan herself asked to return to the grand jury early this year to correct her misstatements about not accessing her voicemail before 2003.

"Miss Wiggan had nothing to hide. She wanted to answer all the questions," Reed said of her appearances without an attorney before the grand jury. "Why would she do that if she was really guilty?"

Reed urged the jury to consider that Wiggan had no reason to mislead the grand jury about the telephone calls unless she had been involved in the alleged Turner and Pellicano wiretapping crimes.

And, Reed argued, the government had provided no evidence that they even suspected her of such involvement because they had never searched her home, subpoenaed bank records or taken any of the standard investigative steps that would prove such complicity.

The government, Reed said, had been "stumbling over" the element of intent ever since they charged Wiggan with perjury.

In his rebuttal, prosecutor Saunders said that Reed's arguments were clever but off the mark because Wiggan had been charged with perjury, not aiding Pellicano and Turner in their alleged criminal enterprise.

Even without knowing what the calls were about, Saunders said, authorities had proved Wiggan lied when she was questioned before the grand jury. Whether or not the calls were innocuous, the prosecutor said, "it is the very existence of the phone calls that make her guilty."

The jury deliberations, which began late Friday morning, are scheduled to resume Monday.

greg.krikorian@latimes.com

CIVIL LAW:

US Judge To Rule On 'light' Cigarettes Action (FT)

By Lauren Foster In New York

Financial Times, September 25, 2006

A US federal judge will on Monday rule on whether a tobacco lawsuit can proceed as a class action of tens of millions of smokers of "light" cigarettes. If certified, it could be the largest-ever class action case.

The Schwab claim, filed in 2004 under the federal Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organizations Act (Rico), alleges big cigarette makers defrauded smokers into believing "light" cigarettes were safer than regular ones. Lawyers are seeking as much as $200bn in damages, which would automatically be tripled under Rico.

Tobacco investors are closely watching the suit as it is one of the industry's more important remaining legal risks. The ruling is key for Altria Group, parent of Philip Morris USA, as it is preparing to spin off its 88.1 per cent stake in Kraft Foods.

Monday's decision by District Judge Jack Weinstein will eliminate the legal uncertainty surrounding the case and provide Altria's board with clarity on the legal environment.

Some suspect it is waiting for the ruling before giving the spin-off the green light.

Paul Gallagher, a partner with Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll, the firm representing the smokers, said the Schwab case "has the best practical and legal opportunity to hold the cigarette industry worldwide accountable".

"At the same time the industry was denying cigarettes were bad for you, they were offering lights as an alternative to quitting," he said.

During recent oral argument, Judge Weinstein – who has in the past allowed large-scale aggregated tobacco claims to proceed to trial – focused his questions on whether there was a way to determine the number of smokers that would be in the class and how damages would be calculated.

Judge Weinstein told the courtroom that without a satisfactory model for damages, even if he granted class certification, the claim could not go forward.

Following the hearing, industry watchers said there was a low probability the class would be certified as the plaintiffs had failed to address the four-year statute of limitations or come up with a sound damages model.

But Christine Farkas, analyst at Merrill Lynch, cautioned clients that given Judge Weinstein's "past record in tobacco claims . . . we would not be completely surprised if he certified the Schwab class while requiring further work from the plaintiffs on the damages model."

In addition to Philip Morris USA, the defendants include RJ Reynolds; Brown & Williamson (part of Reynolds American); Lorillard; British American Tobacco; and Liggett.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Disputing Citizenship's Role For Hispanics In Government Service (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Federal employment reports have consistently described Hispanics "as underrepresented in the government compared to the civilian labor force."

The Office of Personnel Management, in a report on fiscal 2005 employment patterns, said Hispanics make up 7.4 percent of the federal workforce, compared with 12.6 percent of the nation's labor force.

But a study by the Government Accountability Office, the congressional auditing agency, questions whether such a gap exists.

The GAO constructed a statistical model, using 2000 census data, to determine whether citizenship and education help explain the disparity in Hispanic workforce representation. The GAO found that:

Â· After accounting for citizenship, Hispanics were nearly as likely as non-Hispanics to be employed in the federal workforce.

Â· When comparing citizens with similar levels of education, Hispanics were 16 percent more likely than non-Hispanics to be employed in the federal workforce as opposed to other sectors in the labor force.

DOJ_NMG_0068665

The GAO selected the two factors because a 1976 White House order and congressional directives restrict hiring for civil service jobs to U.S. citizens (though there are exceptions for some positions) and because the federal workforce contains a larger percentage of occupations that require higher levels of education.

Hispanic leaders, however, said the GAO had gone down the wrong track with its analysis. Democratic and Republican presidents have called for a government that reflects the diversity of the nation, they said, and the goal should be a federal workforce that matches the percentage of Hispanics in the population, not the percentage who are citizens.

Brent A. Wilkes , national director of the League of United Latin American Citizens, called the GAO report "very disappointing." He said, "It has given the folks in the government who have been reluctant to reach out and hire Hispanics the ammunition not to do so by focusing on citizenship."

Hispanic groups have noted that lack of citizenship is not a bar to military service. According to the Pentagon, about 35,000 green-card holders and other noncitizens serve in the military. About 8,000 permanent resident immigrants enlist every year.

Manuel Mirabal , president of the National Puerto Rican Coalition, said: "What this report will accomplish, unfortunately, is that federal agencies will take it to mean that they don't have to do anything, that it is okay. It is not okay."

Gilbert Sandate , who heads the Coalition for Fairness for Hispanics in Government, said the GAO report "minimizes the magnitude and impact of the Hispanic employment crisis and fails to provide a clear assessment of the problems affecting Hispanic employment in the federal workforce."

The GAO, Sandate said, did not consider discrimination as a factor in Hispanic employment. Too many Hispanics in government are clustered at the lowest grade levels, and the percentage of Hispanics at the top of the career civil service appears to be declining, he said.

Last year, the government employed 125,419 Hispanics in full-time civil service jobs, with 557 in "senior pay" positions, according to the OPM. Customs and Border Protection officer and customer-service representative were among the leading occupations in government for Hispanics, data collected by the GAO showed.

In its report, the GAO said it did not analyze whether discrimination against or attitudes toward Hispanics affected workforce representation. The analysis also did not seek to explain differences by grade, pay level, agency and other categories, the GAO said.

A part of the GAO report focused on how the OPM, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and other agencies make workforce comparisons. The databases used by those agencies do not divide the nation's labor force into citizens and noncitizens and, as a result, do not show how citizenship affects federal employment practices, the GAO said.

The GAO recommended that the OPM and the EEOC include citizenship in their annual comparisons on the demographics of the federal workforce and the nation's labor force. In their reviews of the report, the GAO said, the EEOC and the OPM did not comment on that recommendation.

Minority Program At WSSC In Limbo (WP)

By Chris Kirkham

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

A controversial minority contracting program run by the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission died over the summer after the Maryland General Assembly failed to renew it, potentially depriving minority- and women-owned businesses of more than $37 million worth of contracts.

The state Senate did not act because the Montgomery and Prince George's delegations could not agree on whether to strengthen oversight of the program, which critics said was fraught with patronage and unnecessary delays.

Minority- and women-owned businesses have received more than a quarter of the contracting money spent by the commission since the program began in 1979, for such work as construction projects and finding temporary employees.

The program has been at the center of years of upheaval at the Washington area's largest water and sewer utility. There have been charges that the program benefited white-owned companies who hired minority subcontractors, and controversy over delays caused when the contracting office held up projects until minority firms could be found to participate.

The head of the office was ousted last year, and three WSSC board members were asked to resign.

DOJ_NMG_0068666

Companies that benefited from the minority contracting program said it was important to them. The program was designed to make up for years in which firms owned by minorities and women were excluded from the agency's business.

"It's going to be tougher for us because we're not going to be able to get the big projects," said Lilia A. Abron, owner and president of Peer Consultants PC, a civil and environmental engineering firm in Rockville that has worked with the WSSC for several years. "It's going to be more of a challenge, but we're up for it. We've been slugging it out this long."

Abron said minority firms with less experience will be hit the hardest. Her 15 years of working with the WSSC put her firm in good standing as a subcontractor for larger, non-minority contractors. Newer firms without those past relationships will be at a significant disadvantage, she said.

Bills to reauthorize the program until 2010 passed the House of Delegates, but failed to get out of a Senate committee before the end of the legislative session in April. Gloria G. Lawlah (D), head of the Prince George's delegation in the state Senate, said she wanted stricter language in the bill to hold prime contractors responsible for paying minority subcontractors -- even if that meant the program would expire.

"You can always avoid a sunset if you want to, but it's not always meaningful," Lawlah said. "Sometimes when you have nothing, it's going to make us work harder to put something in place" in the next legislative session.

Without the backing of both delegations, the bill could not come up for a vote.

The U.S. Supreme Court has held that any race- or gender-based preferences must be bolstered by evidence showing a historical pattern of discrimination. In the case of the WSSC, a 2005 study showed that disparities still exist between the number of minority contracts awarded by the agency and the number of minority businesses in the area.

"I think it's clear that these programs are still required to advance the cause of diversity and creating opportunities for minority business people overall," said Kenneth E. Clark, president of the Maryland/D.C. Minority Supplier Development Council. "They missed an opportunity to move this program forward."

Wayne R. Frazier Sr., president of the Maryland-Washington Minority Contractors Association, called the state of minority contractors "woeful," noting that few companies have the size or financial backing to compete for major construction jobs.

After learning that the minority contracting program was terminated over the summer, the WSSC board tried to install a temporary program, but Maryland Attorney General J. Joseph Curran Jr. said this month that it would not be legal without enabling state legislation.

Prem P. Agarwal, chairman of the WSSC, said the commission is putting in an auditing system aimed at tracking the money going from prime contractors to minority subcontractors.

Agarwal said the WSSC will lobby to get the minority preferences written into law when the General Assembly meets in early 2007. In the meantime, the WSSC still has a program to help small contractors -- regardless of the race or sex of owners -- but Agarwal said many of the minority firms that have done WSSC work are too large to participate.

Any minority contracts in place before July 1 will not be affected.

"Right now our hands are completely tied, and that makes all of us unhappy," Agarwal said.

No On Proposition 85 (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

A YEAR AFTER CALIFORNIA voters rejected an almost identical proposal, they are being asked again to approve a ballot proposition to require that parents be notified before a minor can have an abortion. A particularly objectionable phrase from the old version has been stripped out, but that doesn't fix the main problem:

Proposition 85 is an unnecessary measure that would do the state more harm than good.

Most adults can agree that the ideal scenario for a pregnant girl is to tell her loving and supportive parents about her situation and receive their guidance and help. That ideal scenario, or something like it, occurs more often than you might think, and without government coercion. The majority of girls do tell their parents. And the younger and more vulnerable they are, the more likely they are to do so.

But there are many less-than-ideal families in which girls do not talk to their parents, sometimes understandably: if molestation by a family member, for instance, led to the pregnancy.

DOJ_NMG_0068667

Proposition 73, last year's parental notification measure, lost by a narrow margin. In an apparent attempt to tilt popular opinion in their favor, the authors of the new measure omitted a phrase from the previous initiative that raised public hackles. It would have embedded into the state Constitution wording that implies life begins at conception.

Although Proposition 85 avoids such a politically incorrect pitfall, it still contains the same troubling provisions. And it remains part of a broader campaign to chisel away at a woman's right to privacy.

By requiring doctors to notify a girl's parents (or seek court permission) before she can end her pregnancy, Proposition 85 interferes with the doctor-patient relationship. The measure would almost invariably delay abortions, and because teens are more likely to find out later rather than sooner that they are pregnant, it could lead to more later-term procedures, which are riskier and more complicated.

For girls who are afraid to report molestation by a family member, the proposition would create an almost insurmountable obstacle. Similar laws in other states have not appreciably changed teen pregnancy or abortion rates. Meanwhile, California's teen pregnancy and abortion rates in the last several years have declined faster than the national average.

Supporters of failed ballot propositions have a way of coming back in the hopes that a change in voter turnout will make the difference. Voters shouldn't be fooled. Proposition 73 was a bad idea last year, and Proposition 85 is a bad idea now. Voters should once again reject the parental notification initiative.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Source Of Outbreak No Easily Solved Mystery (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, September 25, 2006

As the investigation into the nationwide E. coli outbreak in fresh spinach bears down on farms in three California counties, one big question remains.

Whatdunit? What ill-fated combination of biology and farming conspired to create an outbreak in 25 states tied to 173 infections and one confirmed death over the past two weeks?

Two other deaths may be tied to the outbreak, those of an Idaho child and an elderly Maryland woman. Investigations are still underway.

The Food and Drug Administration reported Sunday that the Utah Public Health Laboratory has identified a contaminated bag of spinach from the refrigerator of a patient who became ill after eating some of it. A lab in New Mexico made a similar finding last week.

“We are now on the farms,” said the FDA's David Acheson in a briefing last week. Because the outbreak is nationwide, the bacteria very likely were introduced into the food chain early, says food safety expert Douglas Powell of Kansas State University.

The Escherichia coli bacteria strain behind the outbreak, E. coli 0157:H7, is the most commonly seen cause of dangerous infections from this family of bacteria. Most forms of E. coli are benign or helpful (some help synthesize vitamins) and are endemic to the human gut. The outbreak strain belongs to a smaller family that produces toxins that can tear the intestinal wall and cause kidney failure and death.

Ninety-two people have been hospitalized in the outbreak, 28 with a type of kidney failure called hemolytic uremic syndrome.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimates E. coli 0157 causes 73,000 illnesses a year nationwide, as well as 60 deaths.

Disease experts call the locale where dangerous microbes hide a “reservoir.” For E. coli 0157, the reservoir is inside cattle, which explains why beef and dairy products have long been the source of many outbreaks, Powell says. It also explains why the farm is where a lot of outbreaks begin. Typically in outbreaks, he says, contaminated cattle manure is used as fertilizer, or irrigation water fouled with runoff from dairy farms is sprayed on a field. “Once introduced into soil or seedlings, via irrigation water or compost, E. coli 0157:H7 can contaminate the soil and vegetables grown in it for months,” he says.

DOJ_NMG_0068668

Chlorine washes and a cool processing environment are supposed to knock down any E. coli bugs still on produce. If that protection fails, the microbes can multiply rapidly, contaminating hundreds of thousands of bags of produce.

A more speculative concern is over the possibility of the microbes migrating from the soil into the interior of plants as they grow, says microbiologist Eric Triplett of the University of Florida in Gainesville. Last year, he and his colleagues reported in the journal Molecular Plant-Microbe Interactions that human-disease-causing bacteria such as salmonella can migrate into such plants as tomatoes and alfalfa sprouts. "I don't see why spinach would be any different," he says.

Perhaps 10,000 of these disease bacteria's cells may hide in each gram of plant matter, he says. The concern is that no amount of washing will remove microbes hiding inside the plants, he says.

On the other hand, a 2003 Journal of Food Protection report suggested spinach plants trap most of these bacteria in their inedible roots. That study warned contamination may occur at harvesting, when the roots are cut in the field.

These are interesting laboratory studies but still very speculative, says Mike Doyle of the University of Georgia Center for Food Safety. "We still have to confirm this occurs in the field, and if it does, would it occur at cell numbers that would be of public health significance?" he wrote in an e-mail.

Center Of E. Coli Outbreak Is Also Center Of Anxiety (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

SALINAS, Calif., Sept. 22 — For the last week, on farms up and down the Salinas Valley, a group of invisible men have been looking for an invisible bug.

The men, federal and state health inspectors, have been hunting the source of an outbreak of E. coli bacteria in tainted spinach that has killed at least one person and sickened about 170 others in 25 states. Five companies have recalled products, and while the search has been slow and painstaking, federal officials caution that they may never find the exact source of the outbreak.

Nowhere has the uncertainty been more acute than in the three California counties — Monterey, San Benito and Santa Clara — where the outbreak has been centered. That sense of worry was probably heightened on Friday when the Food and Drug Administration gave the all-clear to spinach produced anywhere but those three counties.

"Everybody is anxious for resolution," said Eric Lauritzen, the Monterey County agricultural commissioner. "And I'm sure the consuming public is as well."

In an industry that is equal parts science and Steinbeck, the halt in the spinach harvest ripples through all kinds of businesses and trades, from pickers left without work to packers left without product to restaurateurs left without ingredients.

The agriculture business is the biggest employer here, and trade leaders say the spinach crisis could cost $100 million if it goes on for a month. Farm officials are concerned about the entire salad industry, which has grown rapidly over the last decade as fresh bagged lettuce and other greens have become popular.

In conversations in the lower Salinas Valley, a fertile, sun-baked strip that runs some 30 miles from Salinas to Soledad, even those whose jobs are far from the fields expressed concern for farmers. And as every day passes, the worry grows that this year's harvest, and maybe those in years to come, have been dealt a crippling blow.

"Anybody you talk to in this valley, the question is, is this going take out anything that's in a bag," said Mike Foster, 35, a firefighter in Chualar, a roadside town outside Salinas. "And how's that going to affect everything else: are people going to stop eating salad mix? Lettuce? Bags of apples?"

Mr. Lauritzen, whose Salinas office sits on Abbott Street, a dusty road where farm-related equipment shops, chemical warehouses and refrigeration companies sit side by side, said he had been on the phone all week trying to answer questions and settle nerves. "I couldn't begin to describe my week," he said wearily.

Some have complained about a lack of concrete information. The authorities have not said which farms they are looking at, though they say there are nine. They also say about 20 inspectors are on the job, but no federal laboratory findings have been released.

DOJ_NMG_0068669

Earthbound Farm in San Juan Bautista, which is believed to have supplied the tainted spinach, acted pre-emptively, saying Wednesday that its plant had been declared clean by a private laboratory.

Mr. Lauritzen said the health of those sickened by the outbreak remained the major concern of those in the agricultural industry. But just down the street sits a reminder of the local impact: River Ranch Fresh Foods, which last Sunday announced a voluntary recall of its salad mix.

In Gonzales, 17 miles southeast of Salinas, packing plants line both sides of the railroad tracks that bisect the valley, and boxes of vegetables line the walls of soaring coolers and refrigerated storage rooms. Residents there say that the recent problems with E. coli — there have been at least eight outbreaks in the valley since 1995 — are a new development in an old business.

"My dad raised spinach his entire life, and I never heard of E. coli," said Joe Miranda, 77, a lifelong resident of Gonzales and a former ranch worker. "I've been in spinach up to here," he said, pointing to his knee, "and I never heard anything like that."

Like many in the valley, Mr. Miranda had heard rumors about the cause of this outbreak — portable toilets being spilled onto crops, or rodents and rabbits dirtying a batch with their feces — but said he suspected that lapses in modern farming techniques, including using unclean irrigation water, had fouled the works. "The way they farm nowadays," he said, "they might just have to start over."

The outbreak has been the lead story in the Spanish-language news media, whose newspapers have described "panic" and television announcers have wondered about the spinach shutdown's effect on Latinos, a group already concerned about pending immigration laws.

"Yeah, we're worried about it," said Robert Gomez, 57, the campus supervisor at Anzar High School, just down the road from the Earthbound Farm processing plant. "Its a low-income area, a lot of families, our families, work there. If they slow down, or lay people off, it's going to hurt us."

In Soledad, where signs announce the town's motto — "Feel the Momentum" — residents say they worry that the federal reaction has been too slow and the news media's reaction too hasty. "I would like to see some data on what E. coli rates are for another two weeks of the year," said Adele Skinner, a retired school worker. "I think it's all been a little overblown."

Her husband, Prescott, sat beside her in the Soledad Bar and Grill, a tavern hidden in the side room of a bowling alley. "To Soledad, farming is everything," Mr. Skinner said, nursing a glass of rosé. "It always has been, and it always will be. They'll come back from this."

That optimism was also in evidence in Salinas, where agricultural leaders had repeatedly assembled to offer their condolences to victims and to plan strategy. On Thursday at the National Steinbeck Center, they announced a new series of farming guidelines, including advanced testing of water and soil, and new machinery. After they spoke, two new spinach harvesters idled outside the center, flanked by two workers decked out in sanitary gear.

By Friday, however, such theatrics had given way to the day-to-day grind of farm life. Tara Mackay, a waitress at the First Awakenings restaurant in Salinas, where farmers often convene before dawn, said her regulars had been in that morning as usual.

"There's not really much to talk about until they figure it out," Ms. Mackay said, adding that she had heard rumors about the outbreak's cause. "But when you hear that sort of stuff, you do kind of think, 'I'll eat broccoli.' "

System Set Up After '93 Outbreak Pointed To Spinach In E. Coli Cases (WSJ)

By Jane Zhang

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Early in this month's E. coli outbreak, state and federal officials were able to single out spinach as the likely culprit thanks to a surveillance system set up after a 1993 outbreak at the Jack in the Box fast-food chain.

The system, coordinated by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, links public-health laboratories nationwide and allows state and federal epidemiologists to quickly compare the DNA "fingerprints" of E. coli bacteria collected from sickened people. Through phone calls and email lists, public-health officials can alert each other about small clusters of cases and hunt for early signs of a nationwide outbreak.

DOJ_NMG_0068670

Wisconsin first alerted the CDC to a cluster of E. coli cases Sept. 8 and posted a genetic pattern. But officials there didn't suspect fresh spinach until Oregon reported findings from six cases there Sept. 13. More cases from other states helped convince federal officials their suspicion about spinach was right. By Sept. 14, consumers were warned not to eat bagged varieties of the vegetable. While 173 people have been reported sickened, some gravely, officials believe the fast-paced detective work helped to reduce the outbreak's spread and saved lives.

"We are finding the large outbreaks when they are still in a small stage and act on it," says Robert Tauxe, deputy director of the CDC's Division of Bacterial and Mycotic Diseases. Before the system was launched 10 years ago, "We only got the big ones after they got big. That's really too late."

A big piece of the system is PulseNet. It links public-health laboratories, which perform standardized molecular DNA tests on bacteria such as E. coli and salmonella. The results are entered into an electronic database and uploaded to the CDC in Atlanta, where lab technicians around the country can compare samples, perform searches and send questions to epidemiologists and regulators.

PulseNet was developed after four people died and hundreds of others were sickened from eating tainted hamburger sold by Jack in the Box Inc. The CDC began to upgrade its communication system for state and federal epidemiologists, who long had depended on phones.

In this month's E. coli scare, Wisconsin received reports of illnesses there and conducted the DNA tests. Then it loaded the genetic patterns into the CDC network and said it thought it was experiencing a statewide outbreak. Dr. Tauxe says the Sept. 8 report didn't initially raise alarms.

Meanwhile, Oregon officials the same day were informed about three E. coli cases in that state. William Keene, senior epidemiologist at Oregon's Public Health Division, says he initially thought it was just a minor outbreak. But that night, Melissa Plantenga, a colleague of Dr. Keene, started interviewing nurses and later talked to a patient. Four days later, a couple of other cases surfaced.

A pattern appeared: Five out of the six victims were women, who tend to eat more salads than men do. And on Ms. Plantenga's 304-question form, five out of six people answered yes to question No. 199 about their recent meals: "fresh spinach (not frozen)."

"It was way out of line," she recalled. A CDC survey in 2002 showed that only 18% of Oregon respondents ate spinach in a given week.

On Sept. 13, Dr. Keene emailed CDC infectious-disease specialist Chris Braden to say Oregon had a cluster of E. coli cases. Dr. Braden, who directs the CDC's surveillance-response team, happened to be on the phone with Wisconsin officials discussing their E. coli cases. Dr. Keene joined the conference call and said the Oregon cases seemed to be linked by spinach. He quickly sent the CDC the DNA fingerprinting data, which matched those of the Wisconsin cases.

CDC officials then alerted the Food and Drug Administration. "We didn't tell them it was definitely bagged spinach," just that it might be, Dr. Tauxe says.

Soon other states were reporting E. coli cases, with spinach as a common element. After an FDA warning Sept. 14, a California company, Natural Selection Foods LLC, recalled its bagged spinach. Two other companies followed.

By Sept. 20, the CDC reported 146 cases, and at least 70 of the victims had eaten prepackaged spinach. The FDA and California sent investigators to Salinas Valley, where much of the nation's fresh spinach is grown.

A bag of Dole Food Co. baby spinach found in New Mexico finally provided the hard proof. Investigators ground the spinach and cultured the bacteria in a lab. By using the PulseNet network, they determined the E. coli organism found in the spinach sample was the same as that in the people who had fallen ill in New Mexico and elsewhere. That bag's packaging information then pointed the way to nine farms in three California counties. Officials hope more bags that test positive will narrow the search. Yesterday, the CDC said Utah officials found one bag in that state.

Voters Get A Say On Land Rights (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068671

LOS ANGELES — Eleven states are giving voters their first chance this fall to override last year's Supreme Court ruling that allows local governments seeking more tax revenue to seize private property and give it to developers.

Thirty state legislatures have passed laws or constitutional amendments since June 2005 to negate or limit the ruling's effect in their states. Voting 5-4, the high court said the Constitution permits state and local governments to condemn a home through eminent domain powers so developers can build hotels, offices or retail centers on the site.

The decision, Kelo v. New London, Conn., raised a public outcry, led by libertarians and conservatives who advocate limited government power. The spate of ballot proposals is being bankrolled largely by libertarian organizations controlled by New York City real estate investor Howie Rich. The groups, Americans for Limited Government and the Fund for Democracy, have donated $4 million to ballot drives in eight states.

"It's about one of the core freedoms that our country was built on," Rich says. "People work very hard to own a small business, a home or property. The government is there to protect the right to that property, not to take it away."

Cities, some environmental groups and property developers oppose the ballot measures. Using eminent domain for commercial projects is proper "as a last resort," says Paul Farmer, executive director of the American Planning Association, a group for urban planners based in Washington. "Working these things out in the legislatures is preferable to the sledgehammer approach of these measures."

Larry Morandi of the National Conference of State Legislatures says momentum is building on these issues and most of the ballot measures could pass.

Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, says, "I'm not sure even Roe v. Wade (which legalized abortion nationwide) got so much of the country saying 'no' the way Kelo did."

The Supreme Court said states can restrict the use of eminent domain under their own constitutions. That triggered lobbying in 45 legislatures and signature-gathering for ballot initiatives.

Louisiana will vote Saturday during its primary on two ballot measures on eminent domain. Ten other states will vote on the issue Nov. 7.

Rich's allies in California, Arizona and Idaho combine eminent domain on the ballot with a separate land-use issue at the heart of the property rights movement. It's a proposal to make governments pay property owners for "regulatory takings" — zoning, height limits or other building restrictions that substantially reduce the land's value. Washington state has a ballot measure on regulatory takings.

"The property rights advocates have exploited Kelo to advance a broader anti-government agenda," says John Echeverria of Georgetown University Law Center.

Seeking Expansion In Urban Areas, Wal-Mart Stores Gets Cold Shoulder (WSJ)

By Kris Hudson And Gary Mcwilliams

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

Cities like Boston might be the best hope for Wal-Mart Stores Inc. to grow in the U.S. For the retail giant, that's a problem.

Last year, Wal-Mart's discussions about opening its first store here, in retail space that was soon to be vacated, spurred public outcry. The retailer eventually dropped its pursuit of the property. "Wal-Mart does not suit the clientele we have in the city of Boston," says Mayor Thomas Menino, explaining his opposition. "They don't pay wages that are sufficient. Their benefit structure is poor. I don't need employers like that in our city."

Mayor Menino has no such qualms about trendier rival Target Corp., which he has been actively recruiting. "It's a different image they have in how they market their product and the appearance of their stores," he says. "That's a lot to do with it, the image of the store."

For years, Wal-Mart, of Bentonville, Ark., thrived in rural and suburban America where land was cheap and local governments didn't interfere. Now Wal-Mart is trying to break into the last areas of the country where it isn't dominant, and the going is tough.

DOJ_NMG_0068672

Wal-Mart is used to opposition, but these antagonists are tougher and better organized than earlier breeds. In the Northeast and America's big urban centers, they've augmented a traditional anti-Wal-Mart message with something more potent: an appeal to urban cultural values. Here, Wal-Mart is a metaphor for the worst of middlebrow America.

After missing out in Boston, the company lost a two-year fight to open in Leominster, in central Massachusetts. Some of the same antagonists are now organizing to block Wal-Mart in adjacent Lancaster.

Officials in Miami prevented Wal-Mart from locating a store amid a 55-acre midtown redevelopment project, on the grounds that its sprawling, suburban aesthetics and low-end appeal didn't conform to the city's architectural and social vision for the project.

"I feel bad for Wal-Mart, but that's their image," says Johnny Winton, the former Miami commissioner who helped plan the project.

Wal-Mart, which responded in writing for this article, says it's committed to starting stores in urban markets and that many towns welcome the resulting jobs and tax revenue. "We know that customers want what we have to offer," the company says in a written statement. "In the end, the customer should have the opportunity to decide where to shop."

Behind Wal-Mart's push into this inhospitable terrain is the onset of middle-age. The company reported a 9.5% increase in annual sales last year, falling short of the double-digit pace it set in nearly all of its 34-year history as a public company. Sales growth at stores open at least a year slowed to a 3.4% gain, far from their 10-year high of 9%, a record reached in 1999.

It faces this challenge both in the U.S. and abroad. Wal-Mart grew into the world's largest retailer by relentlessly cutting prices, putting local retailers out of business while passing on savings to consumers. The company is a powerhouse in Mexico -- where it's the top retailer -- and it's surging in South America, Central America and Canada. Yet Wal-Mart's international operations account for just 22% of its overall sales, and the retailer has found itself hindered in some countries.

Hit by stiff competition from cut-rate retailers, strong unions and labor restrictions, Wal-Mart recently withdrew from Germany after eight rough years, taking a $1 billion charge in the process. In China, Wal-Mart has only 64 stores, or one for every 20 million Chinese. Its expansion, which includes plans for another 18 to 20 stores this year, is subject to the whims of China's Communist Party.

Last year, Wal-Mart applied to open a specialized bank in Utah, pledging to use it for credit-card transactions and accepting deposits from charities, not to open branch banks. That didn't forestall an outcry from critics, bankers and politicians, and in July the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. imposed a six-month moratorium on such applications.

To jump-start sales in the U.S., the company has begun revamping the merchandise and layouts of existing stores to appeal to specific groups, such as African-Americans and Hispanics. It is stocking trendier items such as organic food and designer décor. The move represents a risky departure from the company's successful one-size-fits-all strategy.

Investors are skeptical whether Wal-Mart can continue to rely on U.S. expansion to sustain its growth. Wal-Mart's shares trade at 16.6 times projected earnings, below the ratios notched by rivals Target Corp. and Sears Holdings Corp.

Some on Wall Street would prefer the company tap the brakes on its building plans. New urban stores cost a lot to build and operate, and might not be as successful as other areas, at least initially. Due mostly to local resistance, Wal-Mart says it sometimes takes twice as long to plan, construct and open stores in markets such as California compared with a typical time frame of 18 to 24 months.

Wal-Mart dominates rural America, with 45% of its stores located in rural and semi-rural counties, according to market researcher ACNielsen. The retailer is acting to correct the imbalance: In the 12 months since July 2005, two-thirds of the stores opened by Wal-Mart have been in urban or semi-urban areas, ACNielsen says. Wal-Mart won't provide information about future store openings.

Yet sales gains at new stores, located mostly in urban areas, are lower this year than last, indicating that urban shoppers might be turning up their noses. Joanne Dudevoir, 53, a computer specialist for the Defense Department in Boston, dismisses the company with a wave of her hand. "I don't do Wal-Mart. There's nothing there I need to shop for."

Wal-Mart says it will prosper even in challenging markets if it serves customers well. The company adds that it has a "very disciplined approach" to building new stores. Wal-Mart is on track to expand its square footage in the U.S. this year by 8%, its average over the past six years, adding the equivalent of nearly 40 regional malls. Wal-Mart executives said in June that the retailer has plans for at least another 1,400 U.S. stores, but it has not announced a time frame in which all will be built.

DOJ_NMG_0068673

"With more than 3,900 stores and clubs in the U.S., we represent a small number of retail outlets in the United States and a much smaller percentage internationally," the company says. "We see continued opportunity for growth and we are committed to that growth."

Community opposition to Wal-Marts dates back to the early 1970s, when Vermont passed a law requiring regional planning commissions to consider the environmental and economic impact of large developments.

Opposition has grown more organized in recent years as nonunion Wal-Mart advanced on union strongholds. In California, Wal-Mart's pledge to open 40 supercenters -- massive stores offering general merchandise and groceries -- precipitated a four-month strike of grocery unions in 2003 as rival chains sought to cut labor costs to compete. A year later, Wal-Mart suffered a setback when voters in the Los Angeles suburb of Inglewood decided by a three-to-two margin to reject a proposed Wal-Mart store.

Wal-Mart officials characterize Inglewood as an anomaly, noting that they have won 32 of 39 such public votes during the past two years. The majority of new Wal-Marts face little or no opposition, they say.

Today, politicians and residents use a variety of snares and roadblocks to slow the giant's advance. Recently, the Institute for Self-Reliance, a community activist group based in Washington, D.C., launched a Web site -- www.bigboxtoolkit.com -- where Wal-Mart opponents can gather data to use in public speeches and letters. The organization has helped 30 towns adopt ordinances to block big retailers and advised about 100 others.

The institute supports what it calls "sustainable communities," or those that grow using their own environmental and economic resources. It opposes big retailers, contending they take more from communities than they contribute.

In New York City, which has no Wal-Mart, the company's opponents helped kill proposed stores in Queens and Staten Island. In February, the city council approved plans for a retail center near Yankee Stadium with a proviso that only retailers already operating in the city could locate there. Translation: Wal-Mart need not apply.

Wal-Mart has won some victories on the urban battlefield. In 2004, it won approval to open its first store in Chicago, in a depressed neighborhood on the West Side, which is set to open later this month. The city's alderman responded by passing a law mandating that big retailers pay employees an hourly wage of at least $10 and health-care benefits equivalent to at least $3 an hour.

Chicago Mayor Richard Daley vetoed the law earlier this month and persuaded the council to not override his decision. In Maryland, a federal judge recently struck down a law mandating how much money large employers -- effectively meaning Wal-Mart -- should spend on workers' health-care coverage.

The retailer has had no such luck in Massachusetts, a state that is urbanized, educated and liberal. Wal-Mart operates 47 stores there, as opposed to 106 in Oklahoma, a state with roughly half the population of Massachusetts. In the Bay State, films such as the anti-Wal-Mart documentary, "Wal-Mart: The High Cost of Low Price," are regularly shown in college halls and independent theaters.

Anthony Citrano, a 36-year-old tech entrepreneur who lives in South Boston, describes the company as a "weed" that "drains the life out of other plants" and as a symbol of America's "unsustainable way of living." Mr. Citrano argues that Wal-Mart is a business that grew in an era of cheap oil, which he says is coming to an end.

After Boston Mayor Menino last year pronounced Wal-Mart persona non grata, five Maine towns and the neighboring city of Cambridge put store-size restrictions in place that effectively barred Wal-Mart. Several of the moves were triggered by a mere rumor of Wal-Mart interest.

In central Massachusetts, Wal-Mart's nemesis is businessman Arthur P. DiGeronimo Jr., known as Jay. Mr. DiGeronimo, 54, is a native of Leominster, a city of 41,000 in the rolling hills of central Massachusetts. Business-savvy and well-spoken, he is a community fixture, having run a grocery-store chain started by his Italian immigrant family until its sale in 2004. He now owns a sound and video equipment company.

DOJ_NMG_0068674

Mr. DiGeronimo says Wal-Mart's arrival will hurt the area's nine grocery stores and half-dozen department stores. Driving through the city in his pickup truck, he argues that Wal-Mart won't improve residents' well-being. "It is a question of the quality of life that's become important for a lot of communities," he says.

Mr. DiGeronimo developed his anti-Wal-Mart fervor while running his family's grocery store chain. "He has difficulty with Wal-Mart's method of operation and how they treat their help," says Robert Capobianco, an attorney who has worked for DiGeronimo companies since 1968.

In 2003, Mr. DiGeronimo tapped Mr. Capobianco to represent residents in their fight to stop a proposed 24-hour Wal-Mart in Leominster. They filed a suit against the developer and the city alleging, among other things, that the city didn't adhere to its own application procedures. After two years of wrangling, the defendants agreed to restrictions that in effect shut out Wal-Mart.

During that fight, Mr. DiGeronimo hired anti-Wal-Mart activist Al Norman as a consultant. He had heard about Mr. Norman from a DiGeronimo company manager, who had attended a seminar about how to fight Wal-Mart that was sponsored by one of its wholesaler competitors.

Mr. Norman, a health-care worker, turned a 1993 campaign against a Wal-Mart in his Greenfield, Mass. home into a second career. He recently traveled to Japan to advise a group there. "My fifth international gig," he says.

Wal-Mart's push into communities like Leominster has spawned a tenacious opposition, Mr. Norman says. "What used to be a two or three month turnaround [to get a store approved] can turn into a two-year turnaround and sometimes longer," he says.

Messrs. Norman and DiGeronimo rejoined forces this year after Wal-Mart returned from its Leominster defeat with a 200,000-square-foot store proposal in Lancaster, a neighboring town of 7,400. Patrice Harvey, a mother of two small children, called Mr. DiGeronimo for advice.

Ms. Harvey and her husband John, both 35, didn't actively oppose the Leominster store plan, even though their house is technically within city limits. The second site, by contrast, is directly across from their home. Ms. Harvey says she used to shop at Wal-Mart when her children were small but stopped after encountering Wal-Mart critiques, such as the documentary, "Is Wal-Mart Good for America?" Wal-Mart "doesn't fit the character of the town," Ms. Harvey says.

Wal-Mart says the type of opposition it faces in Massachusetts isn't affecting its plans. "We believe that the customers want to decide for themselves where they work and shop, as opposed to having those decisions made for them by special interest groups with ulterior motives," the company says.

Under Mr. DiGeronimo's guidance, Ms. Harvey put together a group of about a dozen residents who meet at a different member's house each week. The group includes a university computer manager, a software-company office manager and two local businessmen.

Mr. DiGeronimo has been attending the group's meetings where he offers advice. Whenever the discussion veers into Wal-Mart's environmental record or health care practices, he steers it back to local issues: "water, sewer, wetlands and traffic. Those are the only pressure points that can be brought" to bear on town officials, he says he tells them.

He adds: "That seemed to work in Leominster and is working here."

Wal-Mart Grows 'green' Strategies (USAT)

By Mindy Fetterman

USA Today, September 25, 2006

BENTONVILLE, Ark. — Andrew Ruben, vice president of strategic planning for the world's biggest retailer, leans across the table and pleads passionately for consumers to embrace the compact fluorescent light bulb. Though a CFL bulb costs more, it uses 75% less energy and lasts 10 times longer than a regular bulb.

"Tell everyone to buy this light bulb!" he says, his voice trembling a bit. "If we could get every American to change a single light bulb, we'd be doing the world a world of good."

What's sparking Ruben's fervor is a new mission at Wal-Mart: Embrace the Earth.

The $312.4 billion retailing giant has launched an aggressive program to encourage "sustainability" of the world's fisheries, forests and farmlands, to slash energy use and reduce waste, to push its 60,000 suppliers to produce goods that don't harm the environment, and to urge consumers to buy green. Last Monday, for the first time, Wal-Mart reported on its carbon dioxide emissions — the “greenhouse gases” that cause global warming. It said it emits 20.8 million tons worldwide, an amount greater than what's released by an auto company but much less than that released by a major utility company.

DOJ_NMG_0068675

“We asked ourselves: If we had known 10 years ago what challenges we would face today, what would we have done different?” says CEO Lee Scott. “What struck us was: This world is much more fragile than any of us would have thought years ago.”

Already, Wal-Mart has become the world's largest buyer of organic cotton. It introduced “fair trade” coffee at its Sam's Clubs. It began selling some organic foods in the spring and will introduce others this fall. And it is pushing suppliers to use smaller packages to cut waste.

Critics such as WakeUpWalMart call the efforts “green-washing.” They say the efforts are an attempt to polish a corporate image tarnished by controversies over low pay and limited health care benefits for its employees and “anti-big-box” feelings in some towns.

But many environmentalists are ecstatic. Wal-Mart is a very big rock to throw into the pro-environment pond, and its ripples, they say, will be felt across the globe.

“Wal-Mart is a huge player, and they have enormous clout,” says Scott Burns of the World Wildlife Fund, which has 10 employees working with Wal-Mart on several projects, including sustainability of fisheries. “They're sending a very powerful signal that already is having effects on the way people produce products for them.”

Wal-Mart says it will:

•Slash gasoline use by its trucking fleet, one of the largest in the USA, and use more hybrid trucks to increase efficiency by 25% over the next three years and double it within 10 years. That will save $310 million a year by 2015, the company says.

•Buy 100% of its wild-caught salmon and frozen fish for the North American market only from fisheries that are certified as “sustainable” by the non-profit Marine Stewardship Council within three to five years. That designation means areas of the ocean aren't fished in ways that destroy fish populations.

•Cut energy use at its more than 7,000 stores worldwide by 30% and cut greenhouse-gas emissions at existing stores by 20% in seven years. Wal-Mart is the largest private electricity user in the USA.

•Reduce solid waste from U.S. stores by 25% within three years.

The company, second-largest in revenue in the world behind ExxonMobil, has vowed to invest $500 million a year in energy-saving technologies.

It has built test lab stores in Aurora, Colo., and McKinney, Texas, where it is experimenting with everything from wind power to permeable asphalt that lets rainwater seep through parking lots to help refill groundwater aquifers. It wants to build stores that produce 30% fewer greenhouse emissions in the next four years.

And it has reached out to environmental groups, many of which were once highly critical of the company; Wal-Mart has made them part of its in-house planning.

On Climate Change Day in mid-July, it hosted former vice president Al Gore at its corporate headquarters here. “We know that Wal-Mart is not necessarily an easy place to come to,” CEO Scott admits. Yet after Gore showed his global-warming film, An Inconvenient Truth, he got a standing ovation from a crowded Wal-Mart auditorium.

“A lot of organizations in that room had campaigned against Wal-Mart. We were kind of skeptical,” says Paul Rice, founding president and CEO of TransFair USA. The group is the only one in the USA that certifies products such as coffee as “fair trade,” meaning they are bought from groups that pay growers fair wages. “But no one is anymore,” he says.

Wal-Mart isn't pushing sustainability solely out of the goodness of its heart. It has realized that it can make money by selling products that are environmentally friendly. It can make millions selling recycled trash and save hundreds of millions by cutting transportation costs.

It even is actively supporting the idea of a system for companies to “trade” carbon dioxide credits. Wal-Mart believes it can earn lots of credits by saving energy, and it can sell them for millions of dollars to companies that can't. All of those savings will go into keeping prices on its products low, it says.

DOJ_NMG_0068676

Wal-Mart also says it is worried about having enough products, primarily fish and other foods, to sell to consumers in the future. “We set out to do (sustainability) as an obligation, a good-works effort,” says Scott. “But we discovered the truth: The real reason to do this is for the business itself.”

Wal-Mart has formed 14 sustainable value networks made up of employees, suppliers and environmentalists. The groups get together regularly in person or on conference calls to brainstorm how products that don't hurt the environment can be made or bought.

The networks work with Wal-Mart's buyers and suppliers, and the suppliers of its suppliers, to push change all the way down the business chain. “We've never worked this way before,” says Matt Kistler, vice president of product and packaging innovation.

The company is mapping whole product lines to find out where the environment is hurt along the way and how to stop that. “When you hear your words coming out of their mouths, it's amazing,” says Suzanne Apple of the World Wildlife Fund. “These are issues we've been working on for years.”

Manish Kumar supplies frozen fish to Wal-Mart. As with many of the company's 60,000 suppliers across the globe, he says Wal-Mart is his biggest customer. In the four years since he landed the business, he's become the retailer's largest supplier of frozen fish in the USA. That's tens of millions of pounds of fish a year.

The way he does business today is radically different than just eight months ago, when he and other fish suppliers were called to Bentonville for a meeting on buying fish only from sustainable fisheries.

“We didn't even know what the Marine Stewardship Council was. Now, it's all we do. The speed with which things are happening is incredible,” says Kumar, CEO of The Fishin' Co., based in Pittsburgh. Now, he works with 18 fish-processing plants that use only fish accredited by the MSC.

Wal-Mart, the world's largest buyer of fish depending on the species, now sells 10 fish products with the blue MSC label, including wild salmon and pollock.

When you buy strawberries from a Wal-Mart today, they come in packages made not from plastic but from biodegradable corn. Same with Paul Newman's organic salad dressing. And this holiday season, those Sam's Club gift cards you may put in your family's stockings will be made from corn-based PLA (polylactic acid), too.

If you're selling to Wal-Mart, you'd better be thinking about smaller packaging, less packaging and recyclable packaging. Wal-Mart said Friday that it will start “grading” suppliers on how well they do. Less, in this case, is more.

When it cut excess packaging on its private-label line of toys, Kid Connection, the company estimates it saved $2.4 million a year in shipping costs, 3,800 trees and 1 million barrels of oil.

“A 2% reduction in a package's size is worth millions and millions of dollars,” says Kistler, vice president of packaging innovation. “You can get more in a container, more in a boat, more in a truck. The numbers are just amazing.”

Downsizing a product's package is tricky, though. Products are sold on store shelves by volume. Bigger packages get more shelf space and can catch consumers' eyes better.

That was the problem when Wal-Mart started pushing Unilever to downsize its laundry detergents. It was reluctant to lose shelf space.

To compensate, Wal-Mart made All Small & Mighty, Unilever's concentrated detergent that comes in a bottle two-thirds the size of a regular jug of detergent, a “VPI.” That's in-house code for a “volume-producing item.” It got heavy promotion and top space on the end of aisles with lots of signs. It's been a huge success, Wal-Mart says.

The single biggest energy success that Wal-Mart has discovered so far is inside a newly designed refrigerator case. It's LED lights. “Fluorescent lights don't like the cold. LED loves the cold,” says Don Mosley, senior engineering manager of special projects who helped design the energy-efficient mechanical systems Wal-Mart is testing at the lab stores in Colorado and Texas.

Wal-Mart spent about $30 million to develop the refrigerator LED lighting system with General Electric and Royal Philips Electronics. LED (light-emitting diode) lights use semiconductor chips to create energy and emit light. LEDs have been used on digital clocks and cellphone screens but never for such a big item.

“This application will change the grocery industry,” says Charles Zimmerman, vice president of new format development. “One-third of our energy costs come from lighting, and the LED cuts 50% of the cost of lighting.”

DOJ_NMG_0068677

Wal-Mart began using LED lights in its giant, red Wal-Mart signs about two years ago. The life of the lights is much longer, even though they cost more. “It's important that our signs say Wal-Mart and not al-Mart,” laughs Mosley.

The compact fluorescent light bulbs from GE that Wal-Mart is pushing for consumers to buy are beginning to catch on, says Michael Petras, vice president of lighting for GE. “The cost is good, it comes on quicker, the colors are better.”

GE sold $75 million of the energy-saving bulbs in 2005. Sales across the industry are up 20%, while sales of traditional incandescent bulbs have fallen 7%.

Wal-Mart has been doing “sunlight harvesting” through skylights at 2,000 of its stores for about 10 years. For much of the day, the only electric lights used in a store are along the inside outer walls. The rest of the floor is lit by skylights.

Now it's testing wind power in the Colorado store. So far, it's been a failure. “It might be our familiarity with the equipment,” admits Mosley. “When they break, they break pretty good before we realize it.” The company hasn't abandoned wind power yet but isn't blown away by it, either.

WakeUpWalMart, a union-funded group that criticizes Wal-Mart's wages and health care benefits, doesn't believe Wal-Mart is sincere. It says Wal-Mart is just trying to get some good public relations in light of all the lawsuits against the company, including claims of discrimination against female employees and forcing employees to work “off the clock.” Wal-Mart also is being investigated for problems with hazardous waste disposal.

“We don't know whether Wal-Mart's environmental changes are real or a Machiavellian attempt to green-wash a declining public image,” says Chris Kofinis, communications director. “But its long record of irresponsible behavior forces one to be skeptical.”

The charges don't bother Wal-Mart. “I don't respond to that criticism,” says CEO Scott. “We know what our goals are. We think we can have an extraordinary impact on the environment.”

Some environmentalists who are in the company's corner are reserving judgment. Fred Krupp, president of Environmental Defense, says Wal-Mart is “off to a promising start” but will be judged by “the results of its efforts.”

Still, Environmental Defense in July opened its first satellite office near a U.S. corporate headquarters — in Bentonville.

“Wal-Mart has as much or more potential than any other company to change the way the world does business,” says Krupp. “And we intend to be right there.”

Texas-Size Hunger For Power Worries State's Grid Boss (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

Texas electricity customers are living large, and it is beginning to worry the state's grid operator.

By next spring, the state's electricity reserves are expected to dip below safe levels, at times. Grid officials are seeking state permission to devise an emergency program that would prevent possible disruptions by offering customers incentives to cut electricity use quickly.

Texas is among several places in the U.S. faced with the prospect of declining power reserves amid increased electricity use by consumers. Backup power nationwide, while currently adequate, has been in decline after disruptions in energy markets that caused many companies to cancel new power-plant projects in recent years. The two factors have increased concerns that the electricity system in some parts of the U.S. is becoming more frail. The problem is especially acute in Texas because the state has almost no ability to import power from neighboring states.

The Texas grid operator has concluded it is cheaper and quicker to cut use than to build "peaker" generating plants -- small, simple plants that run when needs are greatest. Likely users are retail chains, factories and municipalities that are capable of trimming use by predictable amounts with a 10-minute warning. The plan would roughly double the amount of emergency reductions available to the grid operator at times of special stress.

State and federal grid-safety rules require Texas to keep a cushion of electricity on hand from in-state generators that is equivalent to at least 12.5% of the amount of power being consumed at any given time. On Aug. 17, when the state set a record for peak electricity use, reserves slipped below 10%, far less than the 16.3% minimum reserve that had been projected for this summer.

DOJ_NMG_0068678

"We're looking at lean reserves the next couple of years and might need emergency assistance at any time," said Paul Wattles, spokesman for the grid operator, formally called the Electric Reliability Council of Texas.

Currently, the grid operator has customers it can call on to reduce demand by 1,150 megawatts, equivalent to the output of two large power plants. The latest proposal it has made to the Public Utilities Commission of Texas would add another 1,000 megawatts. Power generators have objected to such programs, in the past, even though Texas had more than 3,200 megawatts of customer load participating in similar programs prior to 2002, when rules changed as the state deregulated its retail electricity market.

After passage of the 1999 law, generators went on a building spree, constructing 26,000 megawatts of plants, a record for any state. But rising demand and retirement of older plants have thinned reserves that exceeded 30% just four years ago.

Since 1980, the average Texas household has doubled its use of electricity, and the number of households has grown. Not only are new houses bigger, most have central air conditioning, and 60% have ceilings that are at least nine feet high, factors that also push up consumption, according to grid officials.

Californians have held electricity use flat since the 1980s on a per-capita basis through investments in energy-efficiency and conservation programs. In 2003, California ranked first among all states for lowest per-capita electricity use, at 6,732 kilowatt hours annually. Texas ranked No. 35 with average annual use that was more than twice as great, at 14,602 kilowatt hours per person.

2 Years Later, What Has Changed? (USAT)

By Anita Manning

USA Today, September 25, 2006

In the fall of 2004, the USA's public health system got a nasty shock. British health regulators suspended the license of vaccine maker Chiron, effectively cutting the U.S. flu shot supply in half on the eve of flu season.

That sparked a scramble for flu shots: Senior citizens stood in line for hours outside clinics and retail stores; busloads of Americans headed north to get vaccine in Canada, where supplies were plentiful; there were reports of vaccine thefts from doctors' offices; and politicians held hearings on Capitol Hill demanding to know what went wrong.

Health experts blamed the shortage, and the resulting period of panic and prioritization of the remaining limited supply, on a shaky vaccine infrastructure that relied on too few manufacturers and 50-year-old technology.

Two years later, what has changed?

•Vaccine is still produced by growing flu viruses in chicken eggs, a process that takes at least six months.

•The stability of the flu vaccine supply, though improved, is still not certain.

•Vaccine delivery, dependent on speed of production and release of lots by federal inspectors, is still sporadic throughout the season.

Yet the flu vaccine landscape has undergone significant reconstruction. Chiron has been bought out by Novartis. GlaxoSmithKline is selling flu shots in the USA, and other companies might soon enter the market. About 30 companies are working on developing technologies that could allow flu vaccine to be used more efficiently and produced faster and in larger quantities.

“The big picture is that a great deal of progress has been made, but we're not done yet,” says Julie Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Flu causes an epidemic every year, striking 5% to 20% of the U.S. population, sending more than 200,000 to the hospital and contributing to the deaths of about 36,000 people, the CDC says. Vaccination is the best way to prevent it, Gerberding says.

If all manufacturers are able to deliver as much as they say they can, there should be ample supply for this fall, she says.

“We'll receive 100 million doses, the largest ever,” Gerberding says.

It could be considerably more than that — or less. GlaxoSmithKline's flu vaccine, Fluarix, was approved by the Food and Drug Administration in August, and four months later the company acquired Canadian vaccine maker ID Biomedical and its Fluviral vaccine.

DOJ_NMG_0068679

Now renamed FluLaval, that vaccine is under review and could get FDA approval for distribution in the USA this week. Last year, GSK made 8 million doses for sale in the USA, but if FluLaval is approved in time for this flu season, the company expects to produce flu vaccine doses in the "mid- to high 20 millions," GSK spokeswoman Jennifer Armstrong says.

That possibility is a two-edged sword that has vaccine experts a little nervous.

"The biggest change this year is the risk of oversupply," says Mark Mlotek, executive vice president of Henry Schein, a vaccine distributor. "Unless we get out the word of how important it is to be vaccinated," there could be consequences.

"Oversupply leads to the other problem, which means manufacturers throwing out doses," Schein says.

If that happens, manufacturers could cut production for the following year or abandon the market altogether, he says, as Parke-Davis and Wyeth did in 2000 and 2002, respectively. "Right now we're in a perfect place with four manufacturers, so if one does have a problem, you have good production," Schein says, but "we have to make sure there's enough demand to keep four manufacturers happy."

If there's anything that public health officials have learned in the past several flu seasons, it's that "we have to prepare for the unexpected," Gerberding says.

Vaccine supply problems have plagued the USA for years as vaccine makers either bailed out of the business, citing increasingly tight regulations that required expensive factory upgrades, or merged with other manufacturers, reducing the number of suppliers.

A 2003 report from the Institute of Medicine noted that the number of companies making all types of vaccine dropped from 25 in the 1970s to five, not counting MedImmune, whose flu vaccine nasal spray FluMist was approved by the FDA in June 2003. Flu vaccine prices have increased in the past couple of years, but profits are low compared with those of many blockbuster drugs. The price doctors pay for flu vaccine is less than $15 a dose for shots and less than $21 a dose for FluMist, the nasal spray vaccine.

New, more reliable vaccine-making technologies are under development, but they're at best five years from being ready for market. "We're essentially making influenza vaccine the same way they did in the '50s," says pediatric infectious-disease specialist Gregory Poland of the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn.

He sees a silver lining in the Chiron debacle of 2004: "That served as a wake-up call. It tended to not only grab the attention of government policymakers but legislators and smaller biotech companies, once money became available."

The failure of the vaccine production and distribution system that led to chaos in fall 2004 raised questions about how well people might be protected in a pandemic.

Flu experts knew the vaccine system was "fragile and vulnerable," says the University of Utah's Andy Pavia, chair of a public health committee of the Infectious Diseases Society of America. But the shortage "hammered home how extraordinarily fragile things were. The people who needed to be able to do something, particularly at the top levels of (Health and Human Services) and FDA, woke up."

Planning for a flu pandemic shifted into higher gear, and HHS has awarded more than $1 billion to speed development of new vaccine technologies and expanded production in the USA.

Novartis is about to begin constructing a plant in Holly Springs, N.C., that will produce flu vaccine by growing the virus in cell cultures, rather than chicken eggs, a process that is "much more reliable" than current methods, says Joerg Reinhardt, CEO of Novartis' Vaccine and Diagnostic Division.

The company is bullish on the vaccine business, he says, but "our decision to enter the vaccine market was not driven by (Chiron's) presence in flu. It's a long-term investment in a business area we think has long-term potential."

Reinhardt says Novartis sees flu vaccine as growth business. "I think the market in the U.S. is still underserved," he says. He notes that the CDC is recommending annual flu shots this year for more than twice as many people as there is vaccine available.

He says the Chiron plant in Liverpool, England, where contamination detected in the flu vaccine prompted British regulators to suspend the company's license in October 2004, has undergone major renovations and manufacturing improvements. "Last year 14 million doses could be produced in Liverpool and sold in the U.S.," he says. "This year, it will be double, and next year the amount will increase."

DOJ_NMG_0068680

"That is a very positive sign," Reinhardt says. "It encouraged us to invest in the U.S. The government is very much behind the campaign, much more than governments in Europe."

The trend is likely to continue, says infectious-disease specialist William Schaffner of Vanderbilt University School of Medicine. "It's clear the (Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices, which advises the CDC on vaccine policy), in concert with the pediatricians and family doctors, have been gradually expanding the list of persons in the risk groups," he says, this year extending the childhood recommendation from ages 6 months to 23 months to include all children 6 months to 5 years old.

That signals a shift in thinking, from a focus on flu vaccination as personal protection to the idea of immunization for the greater public good, Schaffner says.

Flu shots are recommended for babies, seniors and people with chronic illnesses because those people are at risk of flu complications serious enough to cause hospitalization or death.

But the recommendation to immunize healthy children ages 2 to 5 "was based principally on the impact of disease as measured in doctor visits, antibiotics prescribed, health care costs, disruption of home life and the like," Shaffner says. A similar approach is behind the advice for immunization of health care workers and family members of people at high risk, he says.

Vaccinating the healthy can benefit everyone, he says, by reducing disruptions at work or school and building a wall of protection around those who are vulnerable.

"We don't want to give the flu to our patients, to Grandpa Jones or our family member who has diabetes."

The Roadless Rule Takes A New Turn (NYT)

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

You have to wonder when the Bush administration is going to stop ramming its head against the same wall on forest policy.

The Forest Service has been trying for several years to get rid of the "roadless rule" enacted near the end of the Clinton administration to protect millions of roadless acres of national forest from logging and other commercial intrusions. But these efforts, while popular in the timber industry, achieved little traction in the courts and none among the public at large. So last year the administration simply rescinded the old rule by regulatory fiat and replaced it with a less protective rule of its own.

Now that strategy has been derailed, at least for now. Last week Elizabeth LaPorte, a federal district judge in San Francisco, overturned the Bush rule and largely reinstated the Clinton protections.

Her most telling argument was that the Forest Service had flat-out failed to observe the regulatory protocols required of such a major rule change, sidestepped the detailed environmental analysis mandated by law and ignored the potential impacts of the new policy on endangered species.

The administration is likely to appeal the decision, thus prolonging the tiresome legal Ping-Pong that has marked this battle from the beginning. The Clinton rule has twice been enjoined by district court judges in Idaho and Wyoming in response to state and industry lawsuits, but has been upheld at the appellate level by the Ninth Circuit, to which an appeal from this decision must be directed.

It would make more sense for the administration to abandon the fight altogether. The Bush plan's main claim to superiority is that it gives individual governors more say over the national forests within their boundaries than President Clinton's "one size fits all" rule.

Yet the states, for their part, seem greatly to prefer the old Clinton rule. Several of them — including Oregon, Washington, California and New Mexico — actually joined in the lawsuit that led Judge LaPorte to reinstate it, and two others, Maine and Montana, filed supporting briefs. Somewhere in there is a fairly obvious message.

Green Virgin (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

There are plenty of reasons to cock a skeptical eyebrow at Richard Branson's pledge, announced last week in New York in the company of Al Gore and Bill Clinton, that he will devote 10 years and about $3 billion of profits from his Virgin airline and railroad businesses to combat global warming. But we'll give him this much: At least he puts his money where his mouth is.

That's true in more sense than one. What the British entrepreneur mainly plans to do is invest in biofuels such as ethanol or rapeseed through his latest venture, Virgin Fuels. There are serious doubts among scientists whether biofuels can serve as safe and efficient substitutes for current fossil fuels. There are also real questions about the environmental impact -- in deforestation and intensive farming -- of switching to biofuels. And there's the suggestion that Sir Richard hopes to capitalize on a British government mandate that requires all fuel stations to get 5% of their gas from "renewable sources" by 2010.

DOJ_NMG_0068681

But who says you can't do well by trying to do good? Unlike advocates of the Kyoto Protocol or similar top-down, tax-and-spend regimes to reduce global warming, at least Mr. Branson sees private-sector investment and technological innovation as the best way to improve the environment. That's strikingly similar to the plan the Bush Administration put forward earlier this year in Sydney through the Asia-Pacific Partnership on Clean Development and Climate, a collaborative effort between rich and poor countries and business and government, to develop cleaner energy sources.

At the time, the partnership was denounced by the usual environmentalist suspects as a conspiracy by big business and the Bush Administration. Now that Sir Richard has put his brand on it, everyone says it's cool. Well, fine. We wish him well, er, good.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Letter To Bush Culminates In Major Pontiac Drug Raid (FREEP)

By Frank Witsil

Detroit Free Press, September 25, 2006

Residents of some of Pontiac's drug-plagued neighborhoods expressed some relief Friday after a two-day drug sweep -- initiated by a letter to President George W. Bush -- netted dozens of suspected drug dealers.

Authorities said the operation, which began Wednesday and ended Thursday with 69 warrants and about 30 arrests, was the culmination of three months of undercover detective work by local police and federal agents.

The federal agents got involved after a letter from a Pontiac resident eventually got forwarded from Bush to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

About 40 Pontiac police officers and 15 DEA officers executed search warrants and made arrests on Huron, Baldwin and Sanford streets. Armed officers busted down doors and nabbed suspects. During one foot chase, a sergeant pulled a hamstring.

"But, he got the guy," Pontiac Police Chief Val Gross said Friday.

One street, Monroe, is known for its drug activity, residents say.

Joe Smith, 35, was on Monroe to pick up a friend Friday. He said he'd tried to rent a house in the neighborhood until he saw drug deals going down.

"After 9 p.m., the dealers come out," Smith said.

Tobby Farrington, 35, said he lives off Huron and was aware of the busts.

"I think it really does help the neighborhood," Farrington said, adding that any sweep should be combined with drug rehab programs.

Gross downplayed the role that federal agents had in the raid, dubbed Operation Takedown.

Instead, the police chief said, he decided it was time to respond to complaints about drug dealing and to send a message to dealers that -- even in tough economic times -- the Police Department would act aggressively to arrest criminals. One of the dealers was so brazen, Gross said, that on Wednesday he tried to sell cocaine to a uniformed SWAT officer.

In total, police identified 64 people -- some as young as 15 -- suspected of distributing narcotics, Gross said. Officers also confiscated two machetes and a handgun.

"Drug dealing is a problem we're going to deal with," Gross promised.

Gross said that the department routinely rounds up drug dealers, prostitutes and people who hire them, but that this was one of the bigger operations in a few years.

"It allowed us to make it bigger," Gross said, of the help from the federal agents.

Still, DEA spokeswoman Carolyn Gibson said that the federal agents got involved because a concerned citizen wrote a letter.

She said the author wrote in the letter that he was concerned about drugs in the area and described it as a 24-hour "candy store" for drug dealers and users.

DOJ_NMG_0068682

It's proof, she added, that sometimes, one person makes a difference.

The typed letter, which took an unusual path to law enforcement agents, was not publicly released, and neither was the name of its author, identified only as a Pontiac resident. Gibson said the letter and name are being held in confidence to protect the person who sent it.

Bush Letter Cited In Michigan Drug Sweep (WT/UPI)

By United Press International

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

Dozens of suspected drug dealers were arrested in a Detroit suburb this week in an operation that originated with a letter to U.S. President Bush.

The sweep by Pontiac police and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration was aimed primarily at cocaine peddlers and resulted from a letter sent to the White House by a resident who described her neighborhood as a "candy store" for drug addicts, the Detroit Free Press said.

The DEA told the Free Press the letter got federal agents involved, although the identity of the writer will remain confidential.

Police officials said the DEA's involvement helped them expand the undercover operation and resulted in the arrests of 64 people.

IMMIGRATION:

Frist Expects Dems Will Fight Border Bill (USAT)

USA Today, September 25, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said he would seek passage of legislation to tighten border security but predicted Democrats would try to block passage. Jim Manley, a spokesman for Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, said Frist's move is an attempt to cover up his failure to pass more comprehensive immigration legislation. “The Senate spent almost a month debating and then passing tough and smart immigration reform that included border security, but Republican obstructionism has prevented us from completing that bill,” Manley said.

Frist led a bipartisan effort this year to pass a broad immigration proposal that included provisions for a “guest worker” program and ways for many of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to work toward legal status and citizenship. House Republicans opposed it as too lenient on illegal immigrants.

Frist, R-Tenn., said on ABC's This Week that he will push ahead this week with a narrower bill favored by House Republicans that would require the building of a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexican border. “If you're going to address immigration reform, you have to first and foremost secure our borders,” he said.

Specter objects to part of terror trial deal

Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter said he “vigorously” disagrees with one part of the Republican agreement on rules for the interrogation and trial of suspects in the war on terrorism. Specter, R-Pa., objects to a provision that would allow legal counsel and access to the courts only for those detainees selected by the Pentagon for prosecution. Other terrorism suspects could be held indefinitely without a hearing. “The Constitution says when you can suspend the writ of habeas corpus, in time of rebellion or invasion. And we don't have either. So that has to be changed, in my opinion,” Specter said on CNN's Late Edition. He scheduled a hearing on the issue for today.

The bill lists acts that would constitute war crimes, including torture, rape, biological experiments and cruel and inhuman treatment. President Bush is pushing Congress to put the agreement into law before adjourning for November's elections.

McCain says Bolton needed at U.N.

Sen. John McCain urged quick confirmation of John Bolton as U.N. ambassador, saying he is needed to talk back to “two-bit dictators” such as Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez. McCain, R-Ariz., joined lawmakers from both parties in condemning Chávez's speech last week at the United Nations in which he called President Bush “the devil.” McCain said on CBS' Face the Nation that Bolton is “smart, he's tough, he will respond to these guys.” Bolton has been in the post since President Bush gave him a temporary appointment during a Senate recess in August 2005. Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., has promised a "bruising fight" on Bolton. He and other Democrats say Bolton bullied subordinates in his previous job at the State Department. Republicans such as Sen. George Allen of Virginia have said a strong U.S. hand is needed at the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0068683

Border Bills Come Down To Last Minute (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate will begin considering a series of House bills this week aimed at strengthening border security and toughening enforcement of immigration laws, but given the cool reception the measures are getting from many senators, it appears unlikely that much of the legislation will pass.

The bills, which include proposals to fence a third of the U.S.-Mexico border and allow state and local police to enforce immigration law, have raised hackles in the Senate for both political and policy reasons, and senior Republicans, as well as Democrats, have indicated they are not likely to support them.

With one week left before Congress adjourns, time is short to pass any immigration bills. The outcome will rest in part on closed-door decisions that committee chairs and Senate leaders make early this week. The fate of some of the legislation could be decided as early as today.

House Republicans have promoted their legislation as a necessary step before other immigration issues, such as establishing a guest worker program, can be addressed.

But with elections in November, many in the Senate see the House effort as little more than a campaign ploy.

One Republican Senate staffer pointed out that the House had not set aside money to fund its fence legislation. Approving the fence "just provides them with the 30-second ad they need" to show voters they have been tough about border security, said the staffer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on the matter.

Lawmakers who support the broader immigration overhaul passed by the Senate and backed by President Bush — which includes enforcement, a guest worker plan and a program to deal with illegal immigrants — say the House emphasis on enforcement alone will do nothing to deal with the difficulties that illegal immigration creates.

"You build a fence 10 feet high, 20 feet high, 100 feet high, it won't solve our problems," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Both chambers have passed separate immigration bills that the House has refused to negotiate with the Senate, leaving the bills languishing. The House instead held national hearings in the summer to win public support for its enforcement-only approach.

When Congress reconvened this month, House leaders took parts of their original legislation, which had triggered huge street protests, and repackaged them into the smaller bills that are before the Senate now.

One of the House measures, criminalizing border tunnel construction, has a good chance of passing. But stiff challenges confront the others, including the proposed 700 miles of border fencing and two bills that would circumvent Supreme Court decisions preventing the indefinite detention of immigrants and would expand the ability of low-level immigration officials to quickly deport people without a court hearing.

Bush said last week that he would sign fence legislation into law, but many observers doubt Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has enough support to end debate on the bill and bring it to a vote. Frist did not take an important procedural step Friday toward that end — a sign many took to mean that he lacked the backing to do so.

If Frist cannot persuade enough senators to agree to vote on the measure, the legislation will die.

On Sunday, he said he hoped to get a vote on border security legislation this week, but he did not sound optimistic.

"We can't have 2 million people coming to this country illegally this year. We've got to secure our borders…. Right now I've got a feeling the Democrats may obstruct it," Frist said on ABC's "This Week."

Twenty-three Republicans and most Democrats backed the Senate bill, and many of them oppose not only a border barrier, but the House's move to push their enforcement-first agenda in bits and pieces.

DOJ_NMG_0068684

What's more, Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho) want to add an agricultural guest worker program to the fence bill to help farmers in need of workers. "There is simply no reason AgJOBS has not been enacted, and no reason it could not be passed now," they wrote Frist on Friday. "Farmers across this country have every reason to be angry and frustrated."

House leaders are pushing to have their other immigration bills added to spending legislation for the Department of Homeland Security, which must be passed, at a stage when the Senate would be unable to debate or change them.

That tactic has angered senators who support broad immigration overhaul. Senior senators from both parties, including Reid and Republican Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, have indicated their opposition to attachment of House bills to funding legislation.

"I don't see how we can deal with immigration on a piecemeal basis," Specter said last week.

The chairman of the House Homeland Security Appropriations Committee, Rep. Harold Rogers (R-Ky.), has said he expects such opposition to keep some House bills from going forward.

Although the decision to attach the bills rests largely with Rogers' Senate counterpart, Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), there probably will be strong debate when the committee meets to decide the issue today.

nicole.gaouette@latimes.com

*

Times staff writer Jim Puzzanghera contributed to this report.

Immigration Work Force Fights Corruption (WP/AP)

By Pauline Arrillaga, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

OTAY MESA, Calif. -- Under the glare of the port lights, federal agents watched as the GMC Yukon approached the immigration booth. Two years of legwork _ interviewing sources, listening to wiretaps and watching just as they were watching now _ had led to this. Aurora Torres, the suspected smuggler, was behind the wheel.

Weeks earlier, agents had heard her on the telephone with her contact.

"Are you going to invite me to the movies tonight?" she asked. "It's going to be four tickets."

"Right at 12," a man responded. "If I can't make it, I'll send you a 9-1-1."

He hadn't made it on that particular day, but tonight everything was going as planned.

Just after 4 a.m., the Yukon eased to a stop at inspection Lane 8 at the Otay Mesa Port of Entry, a byway for travelers heading from Mexico into California. An immigration officer approached. After a brief exchange, the Yukon was admitted into the United States.

Nothing unusual _ but for the 11 illegal immigrants sitting inside in plain view.

Torres was arrested. Then agents moved in to take their final suspect into custody.

"Tickets," investigators had concluded, was code for vehicles loaded with undocumented migrants. "Right at 12" was a reference to a work schedule, the midnight to 8 a.m. shift. The clues, they believed, pointed to the secret of Torres' success.

The inspector from Lane 8 was on break when a half-dozen agents approached. "Are you Mike Gilliland?"

He was an ex-Marine with 16 years under his belt at U.S. Customs, but Torres allegedly knew him as something else. Her contact. The one she referred to as "una cosa segura." Translation: A sure thing.

___

A dilemma confronts the nation's immigration work force, one that goes far beyond sealing borders to would-be terrorists, drug smugglers and undocumented migrants, one that is particularly unsettling in a post-Sept. 11 world.

How do you secure the homeland if some of those guarding the gates are dishonest?

Consider: On the California border, at least nine immigration officers have been arrested or sentenced on corruption-related charges in the past 12 months. One of those convicted of smuggling in illegal immigrants turned out to be an illegal immigrant himself, who had used a fake birth certificate to get hired by the Border Patrol.

DOJ_NMG_0068685

On the Texas border, at least 10 officers have been charged or sentenced in corruption schemes over the past year, including four Border Patrol agents _ all assigned to the same highway checkpoint _ who admitted taking money to let both drugs and migrants pass.

The numbers are a snapshot, but the picture is clear. There's no shortage of "sure things" among U.S. immigration workers.

More than 600 criminal probes have been launched this fiscal year of immigration employees nationwide, according to internal affairs investigators at the Department of Homeland Security and Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Complaints range from smuggling, bribery, extortion and fraud to sexual misconduct, assault and theft of government property. The accused, past and present, manned border crossings, highway checkpoints, airports. Others sat behind desks in places like Orange County, Calif., and Fairfax, Va., charged with taking bribes to provide naturalization papers or work permits to ineligible applicants.

Though the cases involve only a fraction of the overall immigration work force, some question whether the government is doing enough to root out corruption in the ranks.

"After the next attack, when they find out that an employee was bribed by a terrorist or bribed by a spy, it's going to be too late," said Michael Maxwell, an ex-police chief who headed internal affairs at U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS), the agency that adjudicates visa, naturalization and asylum applications. "In fact, I think it is too late."

In February, Maxwell resigned as director of the USCIS Office of Security and Investigations and sought whistleblower protection after he began complaining to Congress about what he describes as rampant corruption that's going unprobed.

After Maxwell's office was established in 2004, he asked the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general and the Office of Professional Responsibility at Immigration and Customs Enforcement to forward pending inquiries involving USCIS workers.

He wound up with a backlog of 2,771 complaints. One-fifth were criminal allegations, he said, including more than 100 accusations of bribery.

"It's outrageous, absolutely outrageous, how little attention is being focused on this issue when you look at the ramifications on national security," said Maxwell, who informed Congress that complaints included some allegations of employees providing material support to known terrorists or being influenced by foreign intelligence services. While declining to publicly provide details, he cites as one example the case of an Iraqi-born U.S. citizen whose background indicated he'd been trained by "multiple foreign intelligence agencies" but nevertheless was hired by USCIS to review asylum applications. The employee has since resigned.

"Remember, one officer can grant citizenship at the time of his choosing at the place of his choosing to the person of his choosing _ with impunity. So if he wants to give Osama bin Laden U.S. citizenship, he can," Maxwell said. "I can't tell you how many times I heard senior management say ... `Every allegation will be investigated.' Well, guess what, it's not being investigated."

Although the agency disputes that claim, some cases suggest laxness.

Take the case of Robert Schofield, a USCIS district office supervisor in Fairfax, Va., and a federal immigration officer for 30 years. Schofield was arrested in June, accused of illegally granting residency and issuing naturalization certificates to more than 100 unqualified immigrants. A Chinese citizen also was charged for allegedly brokering deals between Schofield and Asian immigrants.

However, over the last 10 years, "numerous" allegations of bribery involving Schofield and immigration applicants have been reported, an agent with the inspector general's office said in a court affidavit. The agent didn't provide specifics, but said Schofield was once demoted for "conduct unbecoming a government employee" and also accused of making $36,000 in unauthorized purchases on his government-issued credit card.

Schofield has been placed on indefinite suspension without pay, said USCIS spokesman Chris Bentley, who declined further comment on Schofield's employment history because of the pending criminal case. Schofield's lawyer did not return Associated Press messages seeking comment.

Then there's Lizandro Martinez, a Customs officer who admitted that for 2 1/2 years he took bribes to allow vehicles crammed with marijuana through his inspection lane at the Progreso International Bridge in Texas. Martinez, who owned a half-million-dollar home outfitted with a movie theater, was paid $10,000 per vehicle. He faces up to life in prison at his scheduled October sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0068686

Martinez had a host of disciplinary problems during his 14-year career, including threatening to retaliate against a police officer who stopped him for speeding, an official with the Office of Professional Responsibility testified during the case. In 1998, inspectors found 1,300 pounds of cocaine in a truck that crossed through Martinez's lane; the driver stated he had been told to use that particular lane.

Investigations brought disciplinary actions: counseling, an oral reprimand, a 14-day suspension. At one point, according to testimony, Martinez was fired but then reinstated after the union stepped in on his behalf. Still another proposed removal was mitigated to a 30-day suspension.

Jim Tomsheck, newly appointed as assistant commissioner for internal affairs at Customs and Border Protection, declined to discuss the Martinez case, although he said legal battles can hinder the dismissal of problem employees who, for whatever reason, were not charged criminally.

He added that managers are examining ways to ensure that those officers are dealt with administratively, and "are removed from the front line ... and can't continue to contaminate the work force."

Part of the problem is a lack of resources.

The Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General and the Office of Professional Responsibility at Immigration and Customs Enforcement share responsibility for investigating criminal misconduct among a total of 72,000 immigration employees _ with 309 investigators.

"Their plates are constantly full," DHS Inspector General Richard Skinner said of his agents, adding that an average of 15,000 allegations against government employees and contractors pour into the office each year. "No, it is not enough people. ... We have cases that we opened three years ago that we're still pursuing."

Others question whether the investigative structure makes sense. It's not clear, for example, whether Customs and Border Protection has the authority to conduct criminal probes of its own employees, who include Border Patrol agents and front-line Customs officers. The majority of criminal investigations of immigration employees involve CBP workers.

Tomsheck said his agency was in the process of building a small corps of investigators "so that we can stay actively involved in policing our own work force." However, Traci Lembke, acting director of the Office of Professional Responsibility, said those investigators are authorized only to handle administrative _ not criminal _ issues.

In response, CBP issued the following statement: "We are working with ICE on all of these issues. We all agree how critical this is to the mission of DHS."

___

It's noon. A muggy day at the Otay Mesa port of entry just outside of San Diego. Eleven lanes are clogged as far as the eye can see with cars, motorcycles, SUVs and vans ferrying folks from Tijuana to schools, jobs and stores in California.

Weaving in and out of the smog jam is a Customs officer, holding a shepherd mix by the leash to sniff out contraband. As cars creep toward the inspection booths, automated scanners register license plates in a computer. Then other Customs officers ask for identification, pop trunks, inspect spare-tire compartments, peer down air vents. If anything seems out of place, vehicles are sent to secondary inspection for a more thorough examination.

This is what port director James Hynes calls "layered screening," every step intended to catch smugglers but also make it more difficult for a corrupt officer to operate under the radar. Other measures include bans on personal cell phones and pagers, which have been used to alert smugglers what inspection lane an officer is working, and unscheduled lane rotations.

"We want lots of eyes and ears out here to layer our capability and be random, flexible and unpredictable. That's our success in the war on drugs. That's our success in alien apprehensions. And that's also our success in maintaining integrity," Hynes said, standing not far from Lane 8, the one Mike Gilliland was working the morning he was arrested.

Hynes and other immigration brass insist corruption is a priority _ but combating it is a challenge, because smugglers are aggressive about targeting and luring in officers. They'll post lookouts just across the border and, using binoculars, zero in on inspectors with perceived vulnerabilities.

Are they tired? Lazy? Flirtatious with women?

DOJ_NMG_0068687

Greed is an obvious motivator. Migrants paid upward of $4,000 each to pass through Gilliland's lane at Otay Mesa, investigators said, adding that smugglers use the guarantee of a "sure thing" to demand higher rates. Gilliland's cut was alleged to be $1,500 a head.

"That adds up. Really, really quickly," said FBI agent Andrew Black, who heads the San Diego Border Corruption Task Force.

In Gilliland's case, with as many as four vehicles coming through a night, each one sometimes packed with 10 people or more, it could have added up to a $60,000 profit in a single shift _ about the equivalent of an entire year's salary as an inspector with Customs and Border Protection.

There are other, more complex, reasons seemingly good agents go bad. In some past cases, corrupt agents conspired with friends or family members. Others cite growing discontent with the job, and the relative ease with which a dirty employee can operate.

"We don't do anything, just clear the way, and we get 300 (dollars) per head," ex-Border Patrol agent Eric Balderas said in a wiretapped phone call last year. He's awaiting sentencing in a California corruption case.

Balderas admitted conspiring with fellow agent Oscar Ortiz to allow illegal immigrants into the country. Ortiz was sentenced in July to five years in prison for smuggling at least 100 immigrants, at times transporting them in his Border Patrol truck.

A Mexican citizen, Ortiz used a fake U.S. birth certificate to get hired by the Border Patrol, prompting the agency to re-examine its employees' backgrounds. His attorney, Stephen White, said Ortiz was disenchanted with a job akin to "putting a Band-Aid on an open wound."

"A lot of times there's nothing that they can do," White said. "People just come and they can't stop it."

At sentencing, Ortiz told the judge: "I was blind."

Port director Hynes finds such explanations difficult to swallow. What separates a good agent from a bad one is "what integrity you carry when you get up in the morning," he said. "A guy like Gilliland or others? They sold their integrity, and over time we'll get them."

Most border agents "are honest, hardworking and do a fine job," added FBI agent Black. "However, the ones that are corrupt are really in a position to do this country a lot of harm. They don't know who's going through, and they don't know what's going through. That's the danger."

A convicted felon was among those smuggled through Gilliland's lane the day he was arrested, court documents said.

With the case pending, FBI agents and prosecutors declined to go on record with theories of why Gilliland supposedly turned. Court records allege he worked with Torres and one other female smuggler.

Gilliland, meanwhile, maintains his innocence.

"I've got nothing to hide," he told The Associated Press from his home in Chula Vista as his wife, also a Customs and Border Protection employee, stood by his side.

For now, Gilliland is under house arrest, an electronic monitor clasped to his ankle. The government uniform and badge are gone, and what ultimately becomes of his career and reputation will be decided in a courtroom.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House-Senate Disagreement Could Halt Defense Bill (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) -- in a showdown with Senate Republicans -- has vowed he will not bring a major defense policy bill to the chamber floor this week unless Senate negotiators add a federal court security bill and a controversial House anti-illegal-immigration measure, senior House leadership aides say.

The last-minute confrontation is pitting the House's most powerful member against Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner (R-Va.), who has said he will not add extraneous measures to the annual defense authorization bill unless they can garner unanimous support from Democrats and Republicans alike. House leadership aides are emphasizing the court measure, which would bolster the protection of judges in the aftermath of the shooting of a judge in Atlanta and the killing of a judge's family in Chicago.

DOJ_NMG_0068688

The court measure has bipartisan support and is being pushed by Hastert and Sen. Richard J. Durbin (Ill.), the Senate Democratic leadership's second in command. It authorizes additional funding for U.S. marshals to protect the judiciary, increases penalties for crimes against federal judges, bolsters protections for jurors, and funds security enhancements at state courthouses. Those provisions were included in the Senate's version of the defense policy bill at Democrats' insistence. But support for the measure has begun to fray after House members added a provision that would allow judges to carry concealed weapons.

The real controversy, however, lies with the immigration measure and Hastert's insistence that Warner accept both provisions as a package. The Community Protection Act passed in the House overwhelmingly last week, 328 to 95, but it has garnered opposition from Latino organizations and civil liberties groups.

It would allow the indefinite detention of some illegal immigrants who are protected from deportation by political asylum laws. That provision has garnered interest in the Washington area, with its large community from El Salvador and violence among Salvadoran gangs. The bill also would expedite the removal of immigrant criminals, denying them some court access, and would broaden the definitions of gang violence to facilitate detention and deportation.

Senate Democrats and the American Civil Liberties Union have said the measure would expand such definitions so broadly that it could hurt legal immigrants, who would be whisked out of the country with little recourse. Warner has deferred to Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Carl M. Levin (Mich.), the Armed Services Committee's ranking Democrat, in refusing to accept the package on the defense policy bill. With only a week left before Congress recesses for the fall campaigns, a showdown could jeopardize the measure's passage.

"The speaker is not going to let the bill move until these critical security items get in," said Ron Bonjean, Hastert's spokesman.

House GOP aides are urging Durbin to bring Senate Democrats into line on the issue. But Durbin spokesman Joe Shoemaker said the Senate minority whip is feeling no real pressure. The addition of the concealed-weapons provision has soured Durbin on the court security bill, and the immigration bill is garnering strong Democratic opposition, he said.

Army's Top Officer Signals Pentagon Budget Revolt (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Army's top officer withheld a required 2008 budget plan from Pentagon leaders last month after protesting to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld that the service could not maintain its current level of activity in Iraq plus its other global commitments without billions in additional funding.

The decision by Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, is believed to be unprecedented and signals a widespread belief within the Army that in the absence of significant troop withdrawals from Iraq, funding assumptions must be completely reworked, current and former Pentagon officials said.

"This is unusual, but hell, we're in unusual times," said a senior Pentagon official involved in the budget discussions.

Schoomaker failed to submit the budget plan by an Aug. 15 deadline. The protest followed a series of cuts in the service's funding requests by both the White House and Congress over the last four months.

According to a senior Army official involved in budget talks, Schoomaker is now seeking $138.8 billion in 2008, or nearly $25 billion above budget limits originally set by Rumsfeld. The Army's budget this year is $98.2 billion, making Schoomaker's request a 41% increase over current levels.

"It's incredibly huge," said the Army official, who, like others, spoke on condition of anonymity when commenting on internal deliberations. "These are just incredible numbers."

Most funding for the fighting in Iraq is supposed to come from annual emergency spending bills, with the regular defense budget going to normal personnel, procurement and operational expenses, such as salaries and new weapons systems.

DOJ_NMG_0068689

About $400 billion has been appropriated for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars through emergency funding measures since Sept. 11, 2001, with the money divided among various military branches and government agencies.

But in recent budget negotiations, Army officials argued that the service's expanding global role in the U.S.-declared war on terrorism — outlined in new strategic plans issued this year — as well as fast-growing personnel and equipment costs tied to the Iraq war, have put intense pressure on its normal budget.

"It's kind of like the old rancher saying: 'I'm going to size the herd to the amount of hay that I have,' " said Lt. Gen. Jerry L. Sinn, the Army's top budget official. "[Schoomaker] can't size the herd to the size of the amount of hay that he has because he's got to maintain the herd to meet the current operating environment."

The Army, with an active-duty force of 504,000, has been stretched by the Iraq and Afghanistan wars. About 400,000 have done at least one tour of combat duty, and more than a third of those have been deployed twice. Commanders have been stepping up their complaints about the strain, saying last week that sustaining current levels will require more help from the National Guard and Reserve or an increase in the active-duty force.

Schoomaker first raised alarms with Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in June after he received new Army budget outlines from Rumsfeld's office. Those outlines called for an Army budget of about $114 billion, a $2-billion cut from previous guidelines. The cuts would grow to $7 billion a year after six years, the senior Army official said.

After Schoomaker confronted Rumsfeld with the Army's own estimates for maintaining the current size and commitments — and the steps that would have to be taken to meet the lower figure, which included cutting four combat brigades and an entire division headquarters unit — Rumsfeld agreed to set up a task force to investigate Army funding.

Although no formal notification is required, Army Secretary Francis J. Harvey, who has backed Schoomaker in his push for additional funding, wrote to Rumsfeld early last month to inform him that the Army would miss the Aug. 15 deadline for its budget plan. Harvey said the delay in submitting the plan, formally called a Program Objective Memorandum, was the result of the extended review by the task force.

The study group — which included three-star officers from the Army and Rumsfeld's office — has since agreed with the Army's initial assessment. Officials said negotiations have moved up to higher levels of the Bush administration, involving top aides to Rumsfeld and Rob Portman, director of the White House Office of Management and Budget.

"Now the discussion is: Where are we going to go? Do we lower our strategy or do we raise our resources?" said the senior Pentagon official. "That's where we're at."

Pressure on the Army budget has been growing since late May, when the House and Senate appropriations committees proposed defense spending cuts for 2007 of $4 billion to $9 billion below the White House's original request.

Funding was further complicated this summer, when the Pentagon was forced to shelve plans to start a gradual reduction of troops in Iraq because of an increase in sectarian violence in Baghdad.

Because of those pressures, the Army in July announced it was freezing civilian hiring and putting a moratorium on new weapons contract awards, among other cost-cutting measures, such as personnel travel restrictions.

Schoomaker has been vocal in recent months about the need to increase funding in war spending bills to pay for the hundreds of tanks and armored fighting vehicles that need to be repaired, or "reset" in military parlance, after heavy use in Iraq.

He has told congressional appropriators that he will need $17.1 billion next year for repairs, or nearly double this year's appropriation — and more than four times what it was costing just two years ago. According to an Army budget document obtained by The Times, Army officials are also planning for repair requests of $13 billion in 2008 and $13.5 billion in 2009.

In recent weeks, however, Schoomaker has become more emphatic in public on overall budget shortfalls, saying that current funding is not enough to pay for Army commitments to the Iraq war and the global strategy drawn out in the Pentagon's mission planning documents.

"There's no sense in us submitting a budget that we can't execute, a broken budget," Schoomaker said at a recent address in Washington.

Steven M. Kosiak, a military budget expert at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, an independent Washington think tank, said that despite widespread recognition that the Army should be getting more resources because of war-related costs, its share of the Defense Department budget has been largely unchanged since the 2003 invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0068690

Kosiak cautioned, however, that a good portion of the new money the Army needs is not directly tied to the war, but rather to new weapons it wants to buy, particularly the $200-billion Future Combat System, or FCS, a new family of armored vehicles that will eventually replace nearly every tank and transporter in the Army inventory.

"This isn't a problem one can totally pass off on current military operations," Kosiak said. "The FCS program is very ambitious — some would say overly ambitious."

Even with Rumsfeld's backing, any request for an increase could force a conflict with the Office of Management and Budget, which has repeatedly pushed the Pentagon to restrain its annual budget submission.

"Year after year there were attempts to raise the ceiling, but year after year OMB has refused," said a former Pentagon official familiar with the current debate. "The difference this year is the Army has said that if a raise in the ceiling isn't going to be considered, they won't even play the game."

Added the senior Army official: "If you're Rob Portman advising the president of the United States and duking it out with the [Secretary of Defense], it's a pretty sporting little event."

Army officials insisted that Schoomaker's failure to file his 2008 Program Objective Memorandum was not intended as a rebuke to Rumsfeld, saying the defense secretary has backed Schoomaker since the chief of staff raised the issue with him directly.

Still, some Army officials said Schoomaker has expressed concern about recent White House budget moves, such as the decision in May to use $1.9 billion out of the most recent emergency spending bill to fund border security, including deployment of 6,000 National Guard units at the Mexican border.

Army officials said $1.2 billion of that money came out of funds originally intended for Army war expenses.

"The president has got to take care of his border mission, he needs to find a source of funds so he can play a zero-sum game, he takes it out of defense," the senior Army official said. "But when he takes it out of defense, the lion's share is coming out of the outfit that's really in extremis in the current operating environment in the war."

Rumsfeld has not set a new deadline for the Army to officially submit its budget plan. The Army official said staffers believe they can submit a revised plan by November, in time for President Bush to unveil his 2008 budget early next year.

Congress Is Winding Down, But Much Is Left Undone (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 24 — A Congress derided as do-nothing has a week to do something, and the prospects are cloudy.

Procrastination, power struggles and partisanship have left Congress with substantial work to finish before breaking for the elections. The fast-approaching recess and the Republican focus on national security legislation make it inevitable that much of the remainder will fall by the wayside.

At best, it appears that just 2 of the 11 required spending bills will pass, and not one has been approved so far, forcing a stopgap measure to keep the federal government open. No budget was enacted. A popular package of business and education tax credits is teetering. A lobbying overhaul, once a top priority in view of corruption scandals, is dead. The drive for broad immigration changes has derailed.

An offshore oil drilling bill painted as an answer to high gas prices is stalled. Plans to cut the estate tax and raise the minimum wage have floundered, and an important nuclear pact with India sought by the White House is not on track to clear Congress. New problems surfaced over the weekend for the annual military authorization bill. And numerous other initiatives await a planned lame-duck session in mid-November or a future Congress.

“It is disappointing where we are, and I think Republicans need to be upfront about this,” said Representative Jack Kingston, Republican of Georgia and a member of the House leadership. “We have not accomplished what we need to accomplish.”

Given the practical and political realities, Republicans have chosen to concentrate on legislation emphasizing their security credentials, like the bill governing interrogations and trials of terrorism detainees, a National Security Agency surveillance program, and spending on the Pentagon and the Department of Homeland Security.

DOJ_NMG_0068691

"With obstruction from the Democrats at an all-time high, we have focused on four security issues in an effort to enact some solid, substantive accomplishments," said Eric M. Ueland, chief of staff to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, who is stepping down at the end of this session.

While Republicans prefer to blame Democrats for the backlog, intramural fights and sharp differences between House and Senate Republicans have been chief impediments to major legislation. The recent fissures over terrorism detainees and how far to go in changing immigration law are just the latest and most public examples of serious policy differences among Republicans.

"I've seen some of that lately," Mr. Frist said recently as he pondered whether Republican opposition would block a proposal for a 700-mile border fence — the chief piece of immigration-related legislation still standing after a broader measure fell victim to Republican disputes. Because of reservations from Democrats and Republicans who favor the broader bill, Mr. Frist is having trouble rounding up enough votes for a showdown over the fence this week.

Circumstances have changed in Washington from the days when Republicans were famous for party discipline. President Bush, weakened by his sliding popularity, has been unable to hold sway over Congress. The Republican leadership in the House and the Senate is in transition and lacks the muscle of Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader. Republican lawmakers, many facing their most serious electoral opposition in years, are fending for themselves.

"We have no central core of political authority driving things in Washington," said James A. Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University. "Individuals and expressions of individual will by committees, and also by strong people like John McCain, have dominated, and the result is internal fighting."

Democrats have made no secret of their intention to try to brand this Congress as worse than lackluster. They said their case was made for them last week as the Senate, despite time running out, did next to nothing on the floor for three days in order to clear procedural obstacles to debating the fence legislation.

"When we say this is the most do-nothing Congress in the history of our country, this isn't just flippant," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader. "This is true." Besides denouncing the legislative output, Democrats are mounting an effort to chastise Republicans as failing to conduct sufficient oversight of the war in Iraq.

Republican leaders dispute the notion that this has been an unproductive session, pointing to legislation on bankruptcy, class action, highway spending, energy policy and pensions, as well as to two Supreme Court confirmations. And they say they already plan to be back on Nov. 13 to finish whatever remains at the end of the week.

"This session of Congress is not over," Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the second-ranking Republican in the Senate, said Friday. "We are not finished with our work, and some of these issues are still in progress. What we are going to do Friday or Saturday is to take a timeout."

Democrats have been happy throughout the year to stand almost united in both the House and the Senate against many of the Republican initiatives, forcing the majority to find enough votes to pass legislation from its own membership. That has often forced major concessions from the leadership. In other cases, Republicans in the House and the Senate have simply been unable to find common ground.

"In the 26 years I have been here," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, "I don't think I have ever seen so much tension between the House and the Senate, and it is all among Republicans."

The immigration measure was a notable example as House Republicans refused to entertain the bipartisan Senate bill that took a comprehensive approach to the flood of illegal immigrants. Earlier, a push for a formal budget plan collapsed because of irreconcilable differences over spending between House and Senate Republicans.

A House-Senate Republican feud over the handling of a pension measure, which ultimately passed, left a collection of tax breaks in limbo despite nearly unanimous support in Congress. Those tax benefits included a deduction for college tuition costs and a research and development tax credit for businesses. The leadership has been reluctant to bring the benefits to a vote independently because they could be used to help advance more contentious legislation, like the cut in the estate tax sought by Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0068692

A new struggle between rank-and-file Republicans and the leadership was threatening to engulf the must-pass spending measure for domestic security. Lawmakers were insisting that a provision allowing Americans to bring back cheaper prescription drugs from Canada be added to the bill even though House leaders and the pharmaceutical industry oppose the plan.

And on Sunday, a spokesman for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois said that Mr. Hastert was insisting that provisions increasing security at the federal courts and allowing for the deportation of gang members be added to a pending Pentagon policy bill despite Senate objections.

"The speaker is not going to let the bill move until these critical security items get in," said the spokesman, Ron Bonjean.

Hopes Sag At Prospects For Lame Duck (RC)

By Tory Newmyer

Roll Call, September 25, 2006

With the clock running out on this Congress, corporate lobbyists are fretting over their legislative wish lists and holding out little hope that unfinished business will be taken up during the impending lame-duck session.

K Streeters aren't ready yet to call any of their priorities dead, but they are tempering any optimism with the realization that in a bitter post-election season, both parties likely are going to resist compromise on long-stalled items.

"I don't have high hopes for much of significance, but we'll keep trying," said Dan Danner, the top lobbyist for the National Federation of Independent Business.

Of course, the big question mark that's confounding estimates about the shape of the lame duck is the outcome of the midterm elections.

Observers predict that if Democrats can retake one or both chambers, they will block action on all but the must-pass spending bills. Other legislative business would be deferred to the next Congress, when Democrats would be able to flex their new power.

But even if the Republicans survive with a majority that's narrowed — a very real possibility on both ends of the Capitol, K Streeters say — Democrats could make life difficult for the GOP.

"Lame ducks can be tricky," said Ed Kutler, a lobbyist with Clark & Weinstock. "You want to make sure you understand the potential universe of issues and be ready for any last-minute actions."

That means that lobbyists must stay plugged in with staffers to make sure that no issues suddenly catch them off guard.

"This is a situation where there is a lot going on under the radar," said Michael Johnson, a lobbyist with the OB-C Group. "It is a very full platter for people on K Street. While the media and leaders are focused on security, there are a host of other matters still in play."

The White House has kept its focus on a streamlined agenda of national security items. After securing a hard-fought win last week on the issue of interrogating and prosecuting suspected terrorists, Bush administration officials are now trying to wrap up work on port security and wiretapping legislation.

Beyond that, one Republican lobbyist said, "We're not hearing them pushing for anything else."

With the lame-duck session likely to be relatively short, lawmakers are primed to leave town with a long list of top business priorities still on the table.

Chances for legislation to rein in home lending giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, for example, have brightened in recent weeks as newly installed Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson has indicated a willingness to compromise with lawmakers. But lobbyists close to the issue said a resolution of the issue during the lame duck is unlikely. This view was echoed by a senior GOP Senate aide.

Likewise, a comprehensive rewrite of a decade-old telecommunications law has stumbled near the finish line. And while telecom lobbyists said they were not ready to pronounce the end of the bill's run, most acknowledge that its chances are dim.

"If it happens, it will likely be a very narrow video franchise bill," which would allow phone companies to bypass the current patchwork of state and local regulations to roll out video service that competes with cable television, said Stephanie Silverman of Venn Strategies. The broader measure has been sidelined by the controversy over "net neutrality," the fight that pits Internet service providers against many Web-based businesses, Silverman said.

DOJ_NMG_0068693

The Business Roundtable is still pushing a health information technology bill and a package of competitiveness items from its Tapping America's Potential campaign, spokeswoman Jennifer Handt said.

In the meantime, Danner said the small-business lobby has its fingers crossed for an estate tax repeal and a bill to create small-business health plans.

And the list goes on. The National Association of Manufacturers backs the NFIB on ending the estate tax, and adds to its top priorities a bill to expand oil drilling in the Gulf of Mexico and an extension of the research and development tax credit. Jay Timmons, a top lobbyist for the group, said he hopes lawmakers can tackle the items this week.

While all signs point to a quick exit from the Congressional overtime session, corporate types who hope for a last-minute miracle point to the doggedness of their legislative champions as reason to hold out hope.

After toiling for two years to advance their causes, lobbyists say, these lawmakers will fight to the end, reaching deep in their bags of procedural tricks before giving in to the notion of starting over from scratch in the next Congress.

Several lobbyists pointed to Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) and his push as Senate Judiciary chairman to advance a bill establishing a trust fund for victims of asbestos-related illnesses. That drive effectively has been dead since the bill failed in the Senate on a procedural vote early this year. But some who back the bill said the Pennsylvania Republican will make a final dash at passage.

"Specter is intent on doing everything he can to move the legislation," Timmons said.

But while several lobbyists said they are determined to never saying never, others said the closing months of the year already are shaping up to be quiet.

"Nobody's hiring between now and the election," lobbyist Roy Coffee said. "It's very quiet on that front, but it gives everyone a chance to go about their business development in an organized way between the end of the session and the election."

Recent trends on K Street back up that assertion, proving that the slower pace of business for lobbyists tracks the downshift in Congressional activity typical of the months leading up to an election.

In the past two cycles, elections caused two out of three stumbles in the otherwise robust growth record of the influence industry. The third dip was prompted by a clampdown on non-national-security legislation after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The top 100 lobbying firms saw their revenue growth slow during the final six months of both previous cycles, according to figures gathered from PoliticalMoneyLine.com. During the final six months of 2004, when control of both the Senate and White House were up for grabs, the total take for the top firms actually dropped, from $337.9 million to $337 million.

Several lobbyists said they already are looking past the lame-duck session, working to drum up new business for next year and help existing clients prepare for the 110th Congress.

"There's a fair amount of chatter from people planning for next year," one lobbyist said. "They're talking about new projects."

Round 2 For Rumsfeld: In For The Long Haul (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Donald Rumsfeld is a man hitting milestones: Already the youngest and oldest person to be secretary of Defense, he is closing in on becoming the longest-serving.

And like his predecessors with long tenures — he surpassed Caspar Weinberger in length of service Friday and will pass Robert McNamara, the current record-holder, in December — Rumsfeld finds himself increasingly enmeshed in controversy and battling critics.

A generation ago, the Vietnam conflict was known derisively as "McNamara's war," named for its chief architect and most ardent public defender. In a series of behind-the-scenes books and a Senate debate this month on a resolution demanding his resignation, Rumsfeld is the policymaker blamed most for military missteps in Iraq — a war that has lasted longer and cost more dearly than Bush administration officials predicted at its start.

DOJ_NMG_0068694

"He's going to be McNamara II," says Michael O'Hanlon, co-author of Hard Power: The New Politics of National Security, a book being published next month that discusses the leadership of Rumsfeld and others. "He's going to be the brilliant guy who came in from corporate America with the slicked-back hair and did a lot of useful things on second- and third-tier issues he worked on, but botched the No. 1 challenge, when Americans were putting their lives on the line."

Even some of Rumsfeld's friends worry that he has stayed too long.

"I've cautioned everybody that four years is enough in that particular job," says Melvin Laird, now 84, secretary of Defense in the Nixon administration and a friend of "Rummy" since both were House members from the Midwest in the 1960s. Stay longer than that, he says, and it's hard to sustain leadership of the Pentagon and relations with a demanding Congress.

"You kind of wear out yourself," Laird says.

Rumsfeld has been Defense secretary for five years and eight months in the Bush administration and 14 months in the Ford administration. The average tenure of the 21 men who have headed the Pentagon is less than three years.

He dismisses public criticism by members of Congress and some retired generals with the crackling self-confidence and antiquated interjection — "Heavens to Betsy!" — that have become familiar at Pentagon briefings and the subject of satire by late-night comedians.

Significantly, his relationship with President Bush seems unimpaired, presumably because the two men express agreement on the wisdom of invading Iraq and the need to stay the course there. At the White House, spokesman Tony Snow says flatly that a forced departure of Rumsfeld "is not going to happen."

During the Abu Ghraib prison scandal two years ago, Rumsfeld disclosed later, Bush twice turned down his offer to leave.

Americans are split on that question. In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Sept. 15-17, 46% said Rumsfeld should resign; 44% said he shouldn't. The survey of 1,003 adults has a margin of error of +/—3 percentage points.

At 74, Rumsfeld — who declined to be interviewed for this story — gives no signs of being ready to retire. "Do you, Mr. Secretary, intend to serve the president until the next election?" Talal Al-Haj, U.S. bureau chief for Dubai-based Al-Arabiya TV, asked in an interview in April. At the time, several ex-generals had sparked headlines by urging that Rumsfeld be replaced.

"I intend to serve the president at his pleasure," Rumsfeld replied.

"So by the next election you will be the longest-serving secretary of Defense, sir."

"That remains to be seen," Rumsfeld said dryly.

For his part, McNamara doesn't seem concerned about losing his record to Rumsfeld as the longest-serving Pentagon chief. "I thought he was the first, the longest. I thought he had passed mine," McNamara says when asked about Rumsfeld's pending landmark. He laughs when told he still holds the record, at least until Dec. 28. Long experience in the job isn't always a good thing, McNamara says, but he believes it has been for Rumsfeld.

At 43, Rumsfeld was appointed to the job by President Ford. He returned to the post 24 years and five presidents later. "In his case," McNamara says, "the long time is desirable because he's learned in the first term some things that he applied in the second."

McNamara declines to discuss what those lessons might be, though, or parallels with his tenure. Now 90, he lives at Washington's Watergate complex with his wife, Diana, and still maintains an office downtown. He recently recovered from breaking his neck in a fall.

Eagle Scouts, corporate chiefs

The two men share some striking similarities, starting with their distinctive hairstyles, wire-rim glasses and a vigor that defies their ages. Both were Eagle Scouts in their youth who became wealthy corporate chiefs as adults — McNamara at Ford Motor, Rumsfeld at the pharmaceutical giant G.D. Searle & Co.

Both entered the Pentagon with a business executive's eye. McNamara instituted a decision-making process known as systems analysis, consolidated programs to spur efficiency and reduce rivalries among the branches of the armed services and developed tools for long-range planning.

Rumsfeld returned to the Pentagon for his second tour of duty determined to transform the U.S. military into a leaner, more agile and technologically sophisticated force. O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, credits Rumsfeld with pushing resistant military leaders to adopt reforms, among them a more flexible deployment plan for U.S. troops based around the world.

DOJ_NMG_0068695

But Rumsfeld's insistence on a "lean" Iraq invasion force — smaller than what military planners initially proposed — is blamed for many subsequent problems, including the failure to control the looting and disorder that followed Saddam Hussein's ouster. Some of Rumsfeld's broader efforts for Pentagon transformation were sidelined in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks in 2001.

Since then, Rumsfeld, like McNamara, has been increasingly consumed by the prosecution of a war that has demanded growing numbers of ground troops and stoked opposition from Congress and the American public.

"It's very hard for both men to say they're wrong," says Paul Hendrickson, author of a 1996 study of McNamara and Vietnam called The Living and the Dead: Robert McNamara and Five Lives of a Lost War. "But if there are similarities, there is a glaring dissimilarity. McNamara lost faith in the war he was prosecuting. Rumsfeld seems to me a true believer in this war."

History at high speed

Another difference: Years passed before insider accounts dissected the decision-making of policymakers in Vietnam. The Pentagon Papers, a classified Defense Department history of the war, wasn't published in The New York Times until 1971, three years after McNamara had left office and at a time Laird was directing a dramatic drawdown of U.S. troops. David Halberstam's The Best and the Brightest was published a year later. Neil Sheehan's seminal A Bright Shining Lie followed in 1988, more than a dozen years after Saigon fell.

This time, Rumsfeld is still at the Pentagon and the war in Iraq is raging as a crush of books is being published with detailed accounts of decision-making inside the Bush administration, including at the Pentagon. The portraits they paint generally haven't been flattering.

The best-selling Cobra II: The Inside Story of the Invasion and Occupation of Iraq, by Michael Gordon and Bernard Trainor, details what they see as a series of strategic miscalculations. The book, published last spring, says Rumsfeld's insistence on invading with a lean force and his refusal to plan in detail for an eventual occupation "played havoc" with military planning and opened the door to the violent insurgency U.S. forces now battle.

Another best-seller, Fiasco: The American Military Adventure in Iraq, published last month, builds a similar case. While the U.S. commander, Gen. Tommy Franks, and others bear some responsibility, author Thomas Ricks concludes, "ultimately, however, the fault for the lapse in the planning must lie with Rumsfeld, the man in charge."

As the war has dragged on, Rumsfeld has become a polarizing figure with the American public. In July 2002 — after the 9/11 attacks and before the Iraq invasion — two-thirds of Americans surveyed by USA TODAY/Gallup said they had a favorable impression of Rumsfeld. Just 15% had an unfavorable one.

By last April, three years after the invasion and at a time some retired generals began airing their complaints, 57% of those surveyed viewed Rumsfeld unfavorably; 37% saw him favorably. His standing has rebounded a bit since then, to 41%-45% favorable-unfavorable in the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll.

In contrast, Americans have a decidedly positive view of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, a fellow Cabinet member who also vigorously defends Bush and the war. In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken in August, Americans viewed her favorably by more than 2-to-1.

Friends in high places

Rumsfeld retains powerful allies. Vice President Cheney, then a congressional fellow hired by Rumsfeld at the Nixon White House for his first real job, is a close friend. The two men and their wives have bought summer homes 2 miles from one another in bucolic St. Michaels (pop. 1,121) on the Eastern Shore of Maryland.

Even though Rumsfeld served four terms in the House and tested the waters for the Republican presidential nomination in 1988, he has failed to maintain broad political support on Capitol Hill. "I think both Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney don't have much respect for Congress," says Connecticut Rep. Christopher Shays, one of a few Republicans who have called for Rumsfeld to step down. "And the way they treat us, it shows."

Rumsfeld has become a prime defender of war, a symbol of its miscalculations and a lightning rod for its critics. Last month, in a speech to the American Legion in Salt Lake City, he cited those who once hoped to negotiate with Hitler. Noting

DOJ_NMG_0068696

"similar challenges in efforts to confront the rising threat of a new type of fascism," he asked, "Can we truly afford to believe that, somehow or someway, vicious extremists can be appeased?"

Anti-war Democrats who took offense at his comments then forced a day of debate this month on a resolution calling for him to go.

Seventeen Democratic senators lined up to castigate his leadership; 10 Republicans spoke in his defense. Sen. Barbara Boxer, who first proposed a resolution, said later that a new Defense secretary would make a difference even with the same president in charge.

"Each of us brings a different perspective — just a fresh face, fresh ideas, someone not married to the path we've taken, someone who doesn't have all that baggage," the California Democrat says.

She argues Rumsfeld should be held accountable. "He still has culpability for the things that he's said, for the advice he gives the president and most important for the results on the ground," she says.

Sen. Jeff Sessions, who defended Rumsfeld on the Senate floor, calls the Defense secretary a "brilliant" man who has "wrestled with a host of challenges." Rumsfeld's problem, the Alabama Republican says, is that he has become a target for those "dismayed and disappointed" about the course of the Iraq war.

In any case, his tenure should be up to the commander in chief, Sessions says: "The president has confidence in him."

The resolution was tabled on a party-line vote, and Rumsfeld insists he's not affected by the furor. "Oh, goodness," he said two weeks ago when a radio interviewer asked about calls for his resignation. "You know, history will decide all of that. It's politics time in Washington, D.C." The criticism, he said dismissively, "goes with the territory."The three secretaries of Defense who have served the longest have also encountered controversy.

McCain Wants Bolton Confirmed Quickly (AP-Y)

AP, September 25, 2006

Sen. John McCain on Sunday urged quick confirmation for John Bolton as U.N. ambassador, saying the nominee is needed to talk back to "two-bit dictators" such as Venezuela's president.

McCain, R-Ariz., joined lawmakers from both parties in condemning Hugo Chavez's speech last week at the United Nations in which the Venezuelan called President Bush "the devil."

"I would say that this is an argument to get John Bolton confirmed as our U.N. ambassador," McCain said on CBS' "Face the Nation." "He's smart, he's tough, he will respond to these guys. And he could talk back to these two-bit dictators who have the airfare to New York."

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee this month was expected to approve along party lines Bolton, whom Bush appointed temporarily to the post last year over opposition by Democrats and a few Republicans.

But the vote was postponed after Sen. Lincoln Chafee, R-R.I., who faced a tough primary contest against a conservative Republican, said he had more questions. Chafee won that election.

McCain urged Democrats to support Bolton's nomination and branded Chavez "despicable."

"He aspires to be this generation's (Fidel) Castro. I think the people of Venezuela ought to look at the standard of living in Cuba before they would embrace such a thing," McCain said.

Millions Of Seniors Facing Medicare 'Doughnut Hole' (WP)

By Christopher Lee And Susan Levine

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Millions of older Americans are confronting a temporary break in their Medicare drug coverage this month that will require them to pay the full cost of their prescriptions or face the painful prospect of going without.

This is the "doughnut hole" in the new Medicare drug benefit that began in January, and advocates for seniors say there is nothing sweet about it. Some seniors knew nothing of the coverage gap until they were hit with a bigger drug bill, advocates say.

"Virtually everyone who calls to say they've been denied coverage, they're shocked," said Robert M. Hayes, president of the Medicare Rights Center, a nonprofit that helps seniors navigate Medicare. "Trying to explain that this is the way the program was created by Congress angers folks who think it makes no sense. Many people feel blindsided."

DOJ_NMG_0068697

The coverage gap was one of the most contentious elements of the 2003 legislation that created the new benefit. It ends federal payments for a person's drug purchases once an annual spending limit is reached, resuming them only after the beneficiary has spent thousands of dollars out of pocket.

Proponents saw the unusual setup as a way to provide some help to all beneficiaries, and substantial help to those with catastrophic drug costs, and yet not break the bank in a federal program that is expected to cost hundreds of billions of dollars over the next decade.

Nine months into the program, as more and more seniors reach the threshold that puts them in the gap, many see it as a headache -- or worse.

Frances Acanfora, 65, had been paying $58 for a three-month supply of her five medications. But this month the retired school lunchroom aide learned that her next bill would be $1,294. She had entered the doughnut hole.

"It's not my fault that I take this medicine," the Brooklyn resident said. "I've got to take it. And they make a limit. That's not fair."

After talking to her doctor, Acanfora decided to temporarily stop taking a drug as part of her treatment for breast cancer. She hopes to obtain some free samples of eye drops for her glaucoma. Three other medicines -- for high cholesterol, diabetes and osteoporosis -- cost $506.62, which Acanfora put on her credit card.

"I pay a little bit at a time," she said. "What am I going to do? I need it. . . . Sometimes, just to think about it, I cry."

About 3 million of the 23 million Americans who receive the Medicare drug benefit are expected to reach the gap this year, officials said. That is fewer than half the 7 million cited in a 2004 report by the nonprofit Kaiser Family Foundation, which Medicare chief Mark B. McClellan called outdated.

A few more-expensive plans have no doughnut hole, and low-income beneficiaries can receive extra help from Medicare that eliminates the gap. Under the standard plan, however, the government picks up the bulk of drug costs only until the beneficiary and the government together have spent $2,250 for the year. At that point, beneficiaries must pay 100 percent of costs until they have spent a total of $3,600 of their own money. Then the federal subsidy resumes, paying 95 percent of any additional expenses.

Beneficiaries must continue to pay premiums averaging $24 a month, even in months when they are on their own. The calculation starts anew every year.

At Iona Senior Services in the District, Chris DeYoung's phone keeps ringing. On the other end are Medicare beneficiaries who have suddenly fallen into the gap and are looking for ways to climb out. DeYoung, Iona's community outreach coordinator, has only a few tips: mail-order pharmacies, diligent comparison shopping, purchases from Canada.

"For most of them, they're not going to get out of it this year," he said. "I don't think everyone really appreciated the doughnut hole, or they thought it'd be narrower than it is."

Georgetown retiree Maria Laurence, who says she selected an AARP-affiliated drug plan without doing much research, now pays "a fortune" for nearly half a dozen prescriptions. One drug went from about $84 for a three-month supply to $670.56 -- more than $7 per pill.

"It was such a shock. I had no idea," she said. "It's just a hard pill to swallow, no pun intended."

Even with the doughnut hole, most beneficiaries are better off financially than they were before the drug benefit was created, when many seniors had to fend for themselves all year long.

McClellan said seniors in the coverage gap should continue to use their Medicare drug cards to get the prices negotiated by their plans. They also can apply for prescription-assistance programs run by many states and pharmaceutical companies, he said. And they can call Medicare at 800-633-4227 for information and help.

"There are lots of places to go to get lower-priced drugs, to get additional help with your drug costs," he said.

Mark Merritt, president of the Pharmaceutical Care Management Association, stressed that the majority of seniors will not reach the gap. Many who will could delay it by more than two months by switching to generic drugs and using mail-order pharmacies, he said.

"There's been a lot of hand-wringing about it and very little information about what people can do to stay out of it," said Merritt, whose organization represents companies that administer drug benefit programs for employers and health insurance carriers.

DOJ_NMG_0068698

Another thing seniors can do is choose their drug plans more carefully for 2007 when the open enrollment period begins Nov. 15. Susan Knight, director of the Senior Health Insurance Program in Anne Arundel County, said she and other workers will begin visiting centers and programs for seniors next month, the start of what is likely to be another major marketing season for companies offering prescription coverage.

Many Democrats in Congress, long critical of the gap, are not waiting until then. They dubbed last Friday "doughnut hole day," saying it was when the average Medicare beneficiary would reach the gap. They and their supporters criticized the policy at dozens of events last week, airing grievances from seniors in public forums and delivering edible doughnut holes to the office of at least one House Republican.

"This gap does not have to exist," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.).

Clarice Wansley, 67, a retired county administrator who lives in Hattiesburg, Miss., fell into the doughnut hole in June. Her drug bills went from $184 a month to $387 for the eight medications she takes for cancer, heart trouble, seizures and other ailments, she said.

She paid on her own for the past few months, but recently her doctor told her she needed yet another drug, one that costs $239 a month. Now she doesn't know what to do.

"I'm not destitute, but I can't pay that and buy gasoline and food and pay the mortgage," Wansley said. "I'm scrambling around trying to find help."

Dan Wojehowski, 47, of Smyrna, N.Y., takes six drugs for disabling depression and severe back problems. Last year he was able to get five of them free through drug companies' patient-assistance programs. But when the Medicare benefit started, many of those programs sent people there instead. Wojehowski began paying $53 a month for most of his drugs. Next month, his first in the doughnut hole, he will have to pay $341.

Wojehowski, who knew about the gap, plans to continue with two medications but not the others.

"I just can't afford to buy them," he said. "Every time somebody in Washington says what a wonderful benefit this is, I think they have to look a little closer."

Medicare Refund Mixup Part Of Larger Tangle (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 24 — When Medicare mistakenly sent premium refunds to 230,000 people who had signed up for prescription drug coverage, the Bush administration said the error had resulted from a rare “computer glitch.” But government records and interviews with federal officials show it was the latest example of a strained, often dysfunctional relationship between two of the government’s biggest programs.

For more than a year, officials who run the two programs, Social Security and Medicare, have struggled to mesh their computer systems so that Medicare premiums are correctly withheld from Social Security checks, and low-income people get the extra help to which they are entitled. The problems are compounded because this information is collected and used by scores of private Medicare drug plans, each with its own procedures and computer systems.

Lawmakers worry that similar problems will occur as millions of people sign up for new drug plans starting on Nov. 15.

Several recent surveys, including one by J. D. Power & Associates, the market research company, suggest that three-fourths of the people getting drug coverage through Medicare are satisfied with it. But officials predict that many beneficiaries will switch plans to lower their drug costs or get better coverage.

Under the 2003 Medicare law, people who sign up for drug coverage can pay premiums once a month on their own, or they can have the money withheld from their Social Security checks, just as basic Medicare premiums have for years been deducted from such checks.

Since the drug program began on Jan. 1, hundreds of thousands of beneficiaries have reported problems in getting the government to carry out their instructions to start or stop the withholding of premiums. Drug plans have repeatedly complained to Medicare officials that premiums have not been properly withheld and that beneficiaries have been upset.

DOJ_NMG_0068699

Medicare officials say Social Security and its computer systems bear much of the responsibility. And Social Security says the data it receives from Medicare is often full of errors and does not match the information it already has. Without a perfect match, Social Security officials say they cannot order the Treasury to change the amount of a person's Social Security payment.

The commissioner of Social Security, Jo Anne B. Barnhart, and the Medicare administrator, Dr. Mark B. McClellan, discussed the problems with the Senate Finance Committee behind closed doors on Sept. 7. After the briefing, lawmakers said they did not fully understand the interaction between the two agencies.

"There seems to be greater confusion, not less," Senator Gordon H. Smith, Republican of Oregon, said after listening to the officials' explanations.

In an interview, Beatrice M. Disman, a Social Security official who has been with the agency for more than 40 years, said: "What the public has to understand is that Social Security is at the end of the trail. We rely on information provided by Medicare."

Medicare, in turn, relies on its own files and on information supplied by beneficiaries and the drug plans in which they enroll. Drug plans often must contact beneficiaries to resolve discrepancies in data compiled by the two federal agencies.

Social Security and Medicare officials said they were working hard to solve the problems, which Dr. McClellan cataloged in a recent letter to Commissioner Barnhart.

"In the past," Dr. McClellan wrote, "my staff has felt that significant concerns they have expressed have not been taken into account by Social Security." For example, he said, Social Security officials established "technical details of the data exchange" in 2004 without fully considering requirements of the new law or concerns expressed by Medicare officials at the time.

In his letter, Dr. McClellan complained about "the unnecessary complexity" of the system devised by Social Security, which performs "more than 40 edits" on each transaction requested for a Medicare beneficiary.

Ms. Disman defended these "quality checks," saying: "We may have information that a person is in the ABC plan. Now Medicare tells us to withhold premiums for the XYZ plan. We have to verify that."

Some Medicare beneficiaries change plans frequently, and drug plans are continually sending fresh information to Medicare. But in his letter to the Social Security Administration, Dr. McClellan said: "We have only been allowed to submit data to your systems for about 10 business days out of each month. Because of your system design, S.S.A. will not process transactions outside of that window."

Constance S. Beskind, 80, of Westport, Conn., said it had taken her five months to get Social Security to stop withholding premiums for her drug coverage, provided by Humana. "It was a nuisance," said Ms. Beskind, who takes drugs for osteoporosis and high blood pressure. Humana told her that Social Security was responsible for the problem, she recalled.

In Craigsville, W.Va., Alma L. Boggs, a 55-year-old nurse who is on Medicare because of a disability, had the opposite problem. Social Security stopped withholding her premiums with no explanation.

"I have yet to learn why they stopped," said Miss Boggs, who takes 10 prescription drugs. "When I called the local Social Security office, the operator would not discuss it. She told me to call Humana. The company told me that Social Security quit paying the premiums on its own. It's been a mess."

Federal officials have discovered four types of problems.

Some beneficiaries asked that premiums be withheld from their Social Security checks, but the government did not act on the requests, so beneficiaries owe several months of premiums. In other cases, Social Security continued to withhold premiums after beneficiaries told the government to stop the deductions. In some cases, the government withheld premiums but failed to send the money to insurers, as it was supposed to do. Finally, some beneficiaries who switched plans are still having premiums for the original plan withheld.

In a bulletin to insurers, the administration described the situation: "When a beneficiary changes plans, Medicare sends the updated request to Social Security. In some cases, these requests were not accepted due to data differences. As a result, some beneficiaries are seeing inaccurate premiums being withheld from their Social Security payments."

In late August, the administration notified tens of thousands of beneficiaries that they had received improper refunds of premiums and would have to return the money to the government. The letters said the problem had resulted from "a processing error" in Medicare computers.

DOJ_NMG_0068700

Officials at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services developed a "strategic communications plan" to play down the mistake.

"Our messaging will strive to maintain public confidence in C.M.S. and its systems, despite the recent error, and to deter any negative generalizations about Medicare or the Part D program," which covers prescription drugs, the plan said.

New Coalition Urges More Money For FDA (USAT)

By Rita Rubin

USA Today, September 25, 2006

Industry, consumer and patient groups and the last three secretaries of the Health and Human Services department are joining forces to lobby for more money for the Food and Drug Administration.

Former HHS secretary Tommy Thompson and Michael Jacobson, executive director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, a Washington, D.C.-based consumer group, are to announce the creation of the Coalition for a Stronger FDA at a news conference today.

The FDA is part of HHS, and "former secretaries probably understand the problem better than anybody else," Thompson, HHS secretary in President Bush's first term, said Sunday.

Donna Shalala, HHS secretary in the Clinton administration, echoed Thompson. "As former secretary, I know how swamped they are and how difficult it is for them to get their work done," she said Sunday.

William Hubbard, who retired last year after 14 years as associate FDA director and nearly 30 years with the agency, serves as the coalition's senior adviser. Hubbard noted that its members, including the Biotechnology Industry Organization and the Consumer Federation of America, are "relatively strange bedfellows." But, he said, "they all converge at the same place, and that is that FDA has to be strengthened or we're all going to suffer."

The group's launch comes just three days after an FDA-commissioned Institute of Medicine report called for "substantially increased resources" in funds and personnel to improve the agency's drug safety efforts.

The report concluded that the FDA needs to pay more attention to the safety of drugs once they are on the market, a move that requires both increased funding and regulatory authority. Among the report's recommendations:

•Congress should amend the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act to require that product labels carry a special symbol for their first two years on the market, when side effects not seen in relatively small pre-approval studies are likely to begin showing up. In addition, FDA should restrict direct-to-consumer ads during that time.

•The FDA should evaluate all new safety and effectiveness data about a new molecular entity — a brand-new active ingredient — within five years of approval.

•The agency needs both the authority and the resources to ensure that drugmakers conduct promised studies after their products are approved. The FDA needs to be able to require labeling changes to reflect new safety information.

Public Service Academy (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Advocates of a federally funded public service university get an "A" for effort, although results are incomplete.

Last week, proponents scored a victory in their quest to create a U.S. Public Service Academy modeled after the nation's military service academies: They persuaded a bipartisan group of senators and House members to sponsor legislation to establish and fund the school.

"Today is an exciting day," Chris Myers Asch, a Teach for America veteran who is leading the effort, wrote in an e-mail to supporters. "Almost exactly one year ago . . . I wrote the first sentence of a mission statement for a national public service university. Today, we are on the verge of introducing the Public Service Academy Act in the U.S. Congress."

Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), along with Reps. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) and James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), have agreed to introduce the legislation this week, Asch wrote. The bill follows a petition drive and grass-roots lobbying effort led by Asch and more than 40 supporters, including former senator Harris Wofford (D-Pa.) and former education secretary Richard Riley.

DOJ_NMG_0068701

Proponents envision the school offering an all-expenses-paid education to 5,000 undergraduates. Its liberal arts curriculum would emphasize leadership development, analytical thinking and service to others, with requirements for summer service internships and a year of study abroad. Graduates would be required to work five years in public service. They could choose from jobs in local, state or federal government; law enforcement; public health; education; or nonprofit organizations.

Asch and Shawn Raymond, a fellow Teach for America alum, came up with the idea after watching the bureaucratic failures in the response to Hurricane Katrina, as well as government errors before and after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. They estimate the cost of an academy based in Washington at $205 million annually.

Asch conceded that, at this late date, the bill has no chance before this session of Congress closes at the end of the year. "But it is an important step," he wrote. "We soon will have a bill with a name and number, and we can begin building support for the bill nationwide."

Constitution 101 A Federal Mandate (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

Training for federal employees now includes a congressionally mandated tutorial on the Constitution that must be completed by this week.

The brainchild of Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, the Internet class closely follows Constitution Day -- a commemorative also legislated by Mr. Byrd to celebrate Sept. 17, 1787, as the day when the nation's founding document was signed in Philadelphia.

"Constitution Day gives us opportunity to pause and consider the larger purpose behind our professionalism, and the nobility underlying our efforts," said Daniel Sutherland, officer for civil rights and civil liberties, and George Tanner, chief learning officer, in an e-mail to all Department of Homeland Security (DHS) employees.

"As Secretary [Michael] Chertoff has stressed, DHS's strategic mission 'is no less than this: protect America, while fostering the values of liberty, privacy, and opportunity we all hold dear,'" the e-mail said.

Unlike most federal training, the 25-minute tutorial does not include a test at the end.

"It's just more of Byrd's pork," says one DHS employee. "How will my supervisor even know I completed the course when there is no test?"

Mr. Byrd is never without his copy of the Constitution, which he carries in his coat pocket and often refers to during Senate debates. On his Web site promoting Constitution Day, Mr. Byrd says the Constitution "embodies the vision of the Framers, their dream of freedom. ... But we cannot defend and protect this dream if we are ignorant of the Constitution's history and how it works."

The 37-page tutorial begins with a historical review and includes a brief summary of the amendments.

"The First Amendment addresses the rights of freedom of speech and the press; the right of peaceful assembly; and the right of petition. It also addresses freedom of religion, both in terms of prohibiting the Congressional establishment of religion and protecting the right to free exercise of religion," the tutorial said.

"The Second Amendment addresses the right of the people to bear arms. The Third Amendment prohibits the government from using private homes as quarters for soldiers without the consent of the owners. The Fourth Amendment guards against unreasonable search and seizure of property without a specific warrant or a 'probable cause' to believe a crime has been committed."

A second DHS employee called it a "waste of time" but completed the course. "It was stuff I learned in high school," he said.

"When we raise our hands and stand by the flag and swear to support and defend the Constitution against all enemies both foreign and domestic ... it's a good idea that we already know what the Constitution is all about," the first employee said.

The lesson concludes with an excerpt from President Reagan's Jan. 11, 1989, farewell address: "Almost all of the world's constitutions are documents in which governments tell the people what their privileges are. Our Constitution is a document in which 'We the People' tell the government what it is allowed to do. 'We the People' are free."

Familiar Battles (USNEWS)

DOJ_NMG_0068702

By Liz Halloran And Bret Schulte

U.S. News and World Report, September 25, 2006

The battle over a woman's constitutional right to medically end her pregnancy has convulsed the nation for more than a generation. But since the U.S. Supreme Court's 1992 decision to reaffirm Roe v. Wade, at least one thing has remained constant: If pregnancy threatens a woman's life or health, she can't be prevented from seeking a legal abortion.

That assurance is now on shaky ground. When the U.S. Supreme Court reconvenes next week after its summer break, justices will be asked to decide whether health risks alone should guarantee women access to controversial late-term abortions, typically-though rarely-performed when pregnancies have progressed beyond 20 weeks.

That, in and of itself, is significant-"one of the key cases of the term," says Leonard Leo of the conservative Federalist Society. But when the court considers the constitutionality of Congress's Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003-which has no exception for a mother's health-it will also shine a light on the emerging dynamics of the newly formulated and deeply divided panel. And the most closely watched jurist won't be Chief Justice John G. Roberts or his fellow sophomore, Justice Samuel Alito, but Justice Anthony Kennedy, on whose vote these decisions will most likely turn.

If one person will define this high court term after the past year's unprecedented upheaval (Chief Justice William Rehnquist's death, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement, and the first new justices in more than a decade), it will be Kennedy. With O'Connor gone, he is the lone swing justice, a moderate conservative whose vote is seen as up for grabs by both the liberal and conservative wings of the court.

"We all live here, but this is Justice Kennedy's world," appellate lawyer Carter Phillips said at a recent court preview. How Kennedy reconciles deference to Congress and its partial-birth ban with respect for stare decisis, or settled law, in the area of women's health is key to the outcome. In the 1992 Planned Parenthood v.Casey decision that reaffirmed Roe, he voted to affirm the right to abortion and required a health exception. But he later wrote an impassioned defense of a Nebraska late-term-abortion ban that lacked one.

Kennedy's vote is likely to figure prominently in other consequential cases justices will hear: a challenge to high school affirmative action programs that use race to assign students, and an effort by states, cities, and environmental groups to force the administration to address global warming.

Court watchers are predicting that, with a split court, Roberts will lead with restraint. Lawyer Thomas Goldstein expects "slow change." Beth Brinkman, who has argued 20 cases before the high court, is watching to see how both Roberts's and Alito's approach to the law will be affected by careers largely spent in the executive branch.

At 51, Roberts has time to shape his court. "The chief is not thinking about one year," says Neal Devins, law professor and director of the Institute of Bill of Rights Law at the College of William and Mary. "This is a court that's ultimately going to be defined by the 2008 [presidential] election. Rather than get a half a loaf today, he's more apt to make the court less visible now and advance his agenda down the road."

All Laptops Present And Accounted For? Um, We'll Get Back To You On That . . . (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Back in July, after a Department of Veterans Affairs laptop loaded with personal information on millions of vets and active-duty military personnel was stolen, other agencies revealed security breaches.

So House Government Reform Committee Chairman Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and ranking Democrat Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) wrote 17 Cabinet-level departments and agencies to ask whether they had experienced any similar incidents.

Of the 14 that have responded so far, either in whole or in part, the Commerce Department looks far and away the worst, owning up to the loss of more than 1,000 agency computers.

But what about the three departments that have not responded? Do they have bigger problems? And these three would be . . .? Treasury, Defense, and Health and Human Services. Oh, well -- none of them has sensitive information about Americans.HP as a Leader on Espionage?

DOJ_NMG_0068703

Lots of chuckles on the Hill and at regulatory agencies over a Sept. 19 letter from Hewlett-Packard Vice President Gary Fazzino to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). The letter urges Frist to push passage of the Telephone Records and Privacy Protection Act of 2006, which is intended to protect the personal information of consumers and employees.

"HP has long been an industry leader on privacy," Fazzino wrote, and the company "believes responsible companies have an obligation to advance consumer and employee rights to have personal information safeguarded."

Meanwhile, a House committee is investigating HP for authorizing an extensive spying operation on people inside and outside the company, looking for leakers. The company is alleged to have planted false documents, followed its board members and reporters, watched their homes and obtained phone records of directors, reporters and spouses.

Keep that up and it won't be "an industry leader on privacy" much longer.This Season's Revolutionary Fashion

And now, a sure-fire way to test airport screeners.

Yes, it's the "Hizbullah Messenger Bag," a snappy-looking shoulder bag advertised by a group called the Revolution Junkies on e-commerce Web site CafePress.com. (The site's standard disclaimer says its merchandise "does not necessarily reflect the opinions and views of CafePress.com.")

"Resist Israeli tyranny!" the product's ad says. "Show your support of the resistance with this versatile and durable messenger bag!"

The polyester bag comes in yellow (Hezbollah's color) and features what looks like the group's logo in the center -- Hezbollah in Arabic with an AK-47 in a raised-high fist.

"From school, to carrying your laptop, to a hip alternative diaper bag, our versatile, spacious messenger bag is practically all you need to get you through every stage of your life," the ad says, "and look hip doing it."

Just putting the fun back in fundamentalism. Yours for only $27.99. Comes with adjustable two-inch strap.FDA's License to Spend

The Food and Drug Administration, burdened by budget and staff cutbacks at its food safety office, is scrambling to find the source of the E. coli-contaminated spinach.

But a consumer group finds that the FDA has still been able to spend taxpayer dollars to celebrate its 100th anniversary. According to budget documents, it has spent: $6,800 on tablecloths; $18,000 for 45 flags for flag-raising ceremonies here and at field offices; $30,306 for "banners for airports and backdrops for media interviews"; $2,240 for miniature sewing kits; $7,750 for focus-group testing of the centennial poster; and $8,500 for "replicas of FDA Inspector Badges."

Maybe they should be spending more on real inspectors and less on fake badges.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

'A total maniac'

We had hoped that conservative commentator Laura Ingraham would be the one to finally provide a rare peek into President Bush's mountain-biking world, which for whatever reason rotates in secrecy.

Mr. Bush invited the popular syndicated Washington-based radio host along for this past Saturday's two-hour-plus bike ride atop the dusty trails of the Secret Service training facility in suburban Maryland -- although, as usual, there wasn't a single sighting of the presidential trekkers.

"Of course it was OTR," Miss Ingraham told Inside the Beltway afterwards, feeding us the presidential code for "off-the-record."

Mr. Bush's two additional biking partners that day included White House economic adviser Ed Lazear and White House photographer Paul Morse. So is everybody off-the-record?

"He is a total maniac on the bike. Unreal," one of the cyclists (we are forbidden to say which one) told this column, referring to the commander in chief.

Bell gets DSL

DOJ_NMG_0068704

Some 130 years after Washingtonian Alexander Graham Bell was issued U.S. patent No. 174,465 in 1876 for "Bell's Improvements in Telegraphy" -- better known today as the telephone -- his great-grandsons Edwin S. Grosvenor and Hugh Muller anxiously opened the door last week to the inventor's mountaintop home overlooking Baddeck Bay, Nova Scotia, and welcomed in the DSL technician.

"Finally getting DSL, I can't wait," beamed the 74-year-old Mr. Muller, who spends summers on the mountain. "We've been waiting a long time up here."

Bell, no doubt, would be impressed with today's Digital Subscriber Line, which carries high-speed information over ordinary copper telephone lines and into homes and offices.

"He'd suffer 'DSL Overload,'" guessed Mr. Grosvenor, 51, of Bethesda, whose great-grandfather co-founded the National Geographic Society in 1888. "He loved to read the encyclopedia whenever he could. Imagine if he had the access to the world that the computer now provides. He'd be reading [online] all of the time."

Bell, quite surprisingly, had a love-hate relationship with the telephone, notes Donna Johnson of nearby Baddeck's Alexander Graham Bell National Historic Site of Canada. "While the telephone provided his fortune, Bell refused to have one in his home office. He considered it a distraction," she said.

"He believed that phones should only be for outgoing calls," explained Mr. Muller.

Bell's descendants, many of whom still reside in Washington (his granddaughter, Dr. Mabel Grosvenor, a retired pediatrician and the last surviving family member to have known Bell personally, turned 101 in Washington this summer), still own Canada's Beinn Bhreagh Hall, a sprawling mansion Bell completed in 1893 and soon thereafter moved into permanently.

Bell died there in 1922 (seeking privacy, he fled Washington, considering its social life too stuffy and intrusive), but not until his "Silver Dart" airplane took to the air as Canada's first-ever powered flight, and his cigar-shaped hydrofoil boat -- Bell designed a fleet, actually -- set a world marine speed record.

Today, the teacher, scientist and inventor is buried in a family plot alongside his wife, Mabel Hubbard, in a grassy meadow above their Canadian home. As Mr. Grosvenor noted, his great-grandfather picked the grave site after lying down in various places until finding the best view.

Patron Maggie

One week after her celebrated visit to Washington, former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher has stuck another feather in her cap: she's now Lady Thatcher, patron of the Heritage Foundation.

The conservative think tank's board of trustees has just handed Mrs. Thatcher the title by proclamation.

"We are lucky to have such a special relationship with a special woman who helped change the course of history," says Heritage President Ed Feulner, delighted that the Washington foundation he heads is the only institution where Mrs. Thatcher has agreed to serve as patron.

"Lady Thatcher epitomizes the very ideals and values for which the Heritage Foundation fights," adds Nile Gardiner, a former Thatcher aide and director of Heritage's new Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom. "She is widely revered as one of the greatest political leaders of our time and has played a huge role in the advancement of freedom and liberty across the world."

Progress On Judicial Ethics (WP)

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

THE FEDERAL judiciary took two steps last week to improve the public's perception of the standards of conduct for federal judges. First, a commission headed by Supreme Court Justice Stephen G. Breyer issued its report on the handling of misconduct allegations against judges. Separately, the Judicial Conference -- the administrative arm of the court system -- revised the rules governing educational junkets for jurists that get funded by private, sometimes ideologically tinged organizations. Both developments are positive. But the judiciary needs to do more.

The Breyer commission report found that in the vast majority of cases the judiciary did a reasonable job of policing itself. In all but the highest-profile cases of alleged misconduct, the panel found, the courts effectively weeded out meritless complaints by disgruntled litigants -- botching cases only about 2 percent of the time. The trouble is that this figure skyrocketed in those cases that command wide public attention.

DOJ_NMG_0068705

The commission found that of 17 high-profile cases, nearly 30 percent -- five -- were not handled properly. Some were dismissed too blithely, others resolved without giving the targeted judges the ability to respond to the allegations. Such incidents have a corrosive impact on the public's view of the judiciary and have fed dangerous calls by members of Congress for intrusive investigations of judges. So it is imperative to make the system work better when it matters most. It's not clear that the report's recommendations -- which amount to enhancing consultation, education and advice -- will help much.

The judiciary's move on educational seminars is likewise constructive -- but not sufficient. There's nothing wrong with judges going to private educational seminars. But the appearances created when judges accept all-expenses-paid vacations from foundations that also fund litigation before them is awful. The Judicial Conference, which had previously weakened the rules to make this easier, announced last week that it would require that organizations paying for judicial travel disclose who is funding those trips. It also will require judges to disclose trips promptly. This will create more transparency -- but it doesn't address the central problem. In fact the solution is easy: When judges go to school, the judiciary ought to pay their way.

Routine Testing For The AIDS Virus (NYT)

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

Federal health officials took the right step last week when they recommended that all teenagers and all adults up to the age of 64 be tested for H.I.V. infection when they receive routine medical care. This welcome effort to remove barriers in the way of widespread testing offers the best hope to reduce the stubborn persistence of H.I.V. infections in the American population.

Long after the AIDS epidemic burst onto the American and international scenes, it is a public health scandal that some 40,000 Americans are still newly infected each year; that a quarter of those with the disease, or some 250,000 Americans, don't even know they are infected; and that more than 40 percent of those who find out they are infected are tested only because they are already seriously ill.

Surely it would be better for every infected individual to learn of his status as early as possible, so as to plan the best course of treatment and avoid spreading the infection. And surely it would be better for community health if hidden chains of transmission could be detected and interrupted to slow the spread of infection.

In the early days of the AIDS epidemic, the disease carried such a stigma that people shied away from being tested lest they be socially ostracized or suffer discrimination. Patient advocacy groups pushed hard for policies to limit how testing was done and make sure all patients were counseled on the ramifications, both good and bad, before consenting to let their blood be tested. But times have changed. New treatments make it valuable to learn whether someone is infected. Health officials have shown that they can be trusted to keep test results confidential. And AIDS seems less stigmatizing.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, which issued the new recommendations, urged that testing remain voluntary. Its most controversial proposal was that patients no longer be counseled extensively in advance about the pros and cons of testing and asked to sign a separate consent form. Oral notification and consent would suffice.

Some patient advocates worry that doctors will shortchange the oral consent process. But requiring a separate written consent for H.I.V. testing beyond the general consent forms signed by patients all too often scares patients away from a test that would help them. A similar policy has greatly reduced the infection rate in newborn children. It is time to apply that approach more broadly.

OTHER NEWS:

Construction Job Market's Still Robust (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Though new home sales have plummeted 20% from a year ago, U.S. construction employment is still up 3%. But the solid jobs news might not last.

DOJ_NMG_0068706

"The trend has got to be sharply downward. The drop in home building has greatly exceeded my expectations," says Kenneth Simonson, chief economist for the Associated General Contractors of America. "I can only imagine that the August numbers stayed high because houses are still being finished, that were started" earlier.

More than 7.52 million U.S. workers were employed in construction in August on a seasonally adjusted basis, up from 7.31 million in August 2005 and 7.46 million in January, according to the Labor Department. Construction employment is a million above 1999.

The job market is being supported, in part, by a surge in commercial and public works projects. But residential construction hiring also rose in July and August. The national numbers obscure regional differences. In California, where the housing market is slowing, construction employment slid by about 4,000 in August. Still, in Arizona, where the housing market is also cooling, employment is up.

"In our area, commercial (building) is looking good, and there's nothing in sight that's going to affect us drastically," says Jack Eberhard, owner of Careers in Construction and Development in Aurora, Colo.

Eberhard can't find enough cost estimators and project engineers.

In an interview earlier this month, Richmond Federal Reserve Bank President Jeffrey Lacker cited construction employment as one reason he's not overly concerned that the housing market could fall too hard.

Some workers can move from residential to commercial projects. But highly specialized workers, such as framers, who build the wood frames for houses, could have more trouble making a switch.

"When things slow down, you don't necessarily let everybody go: You cut back on hours," says Dave Seiders, chief economist for the National Association of Home Builders. He says it's a bit early to see the impact of the slower market, but he expects job losses.

Home builders are carrying a 6.5-month inventory of unsold homes, according to the Commerce Department. Publicly traded builders such as Toll Bros. have been selling land or deciding not to exercise options to purchase land as the market slumps.

Alex Hannigan, whose Orlando firm Hannigan Homes builds eight to nine custom houses a year, is starting to see signs of softening employment as large home builders retrench.

"We are now seeing some subcontractors calling us and looking for work," Hannigan says. "The Wall Street companies are taking it on the chin at the moment."

With no inventory, Hannigan is breaking ground on new homes. He expects the market to have corrected by the time construction is done in 12 to 14 months.

This Winter, Cost Of Heating Homes Is Forecast To Drop (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, September 25, 2006

NEW YORK

With the first chill of autumn in the air, some homeowners are cranking up their heat for the first time since this spring. Many will get a pleasant surprise when they look at their bills: They may be slightly lower.

Since last year at this time, the price of natural gas at the wellhead has plunged 47 percent, and the wholesale price of home heating oil is down 20 percent. If prices were to remain close to these levels - and if the winter is not overly cold - homeowners could save as much as $250 compared with last year, some energy analysts estimate.

"This is the equivalent of a major tax cut - almost the same as right after 9/11 when the government sent checks to everybody," says Dennis Jacobe, chief economist for the Gallup Organization in Washington. "What's nice is that it particularly helps middle- and lower-income people who were hurt the most when prices were soaring."

If consumers feel more comfortable with their energy bills, this could help retailers in the coming holiday period - already forecast to have only modest gains. Lower energy prices might also help offset some of the downturn in housing sales and auto sales, says Mr. Jacobe. "It increases the chances of a soft landing," he adds.

DOJ_NMG_0068707

But prices could snap back quickly if a hurricane hits the Gulf of Mexico or the winter turns out to be fierce, energy experts warn. The Energy Information Administration (EIA), for example, in making its forecasts, is assuming that January will not have the moderate temperatures of the winter of 2006. "Last winter was the warmest on record," says Neil Gamson, an economist at EIA.

In its September forecast, EIA predicts consumers will pay 10 percent less for natural gas but will see their consumption increase by 7 percent. The result would be a 4.4 percent reduction in spending for 64 million households - about half of all residences that require heating.

The EIA's estimate for the nation's 9 million heating-oil customers is not as optimistic. It estimates prices will rise 9.2 percent and consumption will increase 6.2 percent, for a total increase in expenditures of 16 percent.

EIA will update this forecast on Oct. 10 when it issues its official winter forecast.

Many variables affect whether consumers see any savings, industry representatives warn. For example, natural-gas utilities typically start buying their supply in March or April. The purchases continue through the summer with the gas going into storage.

"You can't just take prices today or the past week and assume customers will save 40 or 50 percent," says Paul Wilkinson of the American Gas Association in Washington. "We know for the first six months of the year, prices were actually higher than they were for first six months of last year."

Indeed, for the first six months, the price of natural gas was $7.05 per thousand cubic feet (MCF), compared with $5.91 per MCF last year. However, after hurricane Katrina snarled production in the Gulf of Mexico, natural-gas prices soared to $15 per MCF. It's now down to $4.65 MCF on the spot market.

Weighing on the market is a substantial inventory, now at 3.1 trillion cubic feet, which is 13.4 percent above the five-year average. "We should hit an all-time record on storage," predicts Mr. Wilkinson.

Complicating the weather forecast this year is a weak El Niño, the current and trade-wind pattern in the Pacific that affects weather in the US. Typically, an El Niño creates more rain in the Southwest and Southeast and on the East Coast, but the correlation is less certain during a weak pattern, says Ken Reeves, director of forecasting at AccuWeather in State College, Pa.

For low-income people, the prospect of energy-price reductions, or even stability, is welcome. Last year, 6 million households applied for grants under the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP). "Lower prices are better for low-income people than an increase in LIHEAP funding," says Mark Wolfe of the National Energy Assistance Directors' Association. Natural-gas users could save $200 to $250 this winter if the weather cooperates, he estimates.

Some consumers doubt the lower prices are here to stay. In Franklin, Mich., Frank Zaski says he thinks the price dip is temporary, and he doesn't expect it to affect him. Last summer, his utility, Consumers Energy, had stored natural gas. As a result, it didn't have to pay higher rates after the hurricanes in the Gulf of Mexico. In fact, its rates were the second lowest in the US, according to the utility. This summer it again stored natural gas, but it missed out on the sharp drop. "It kind of irons it out," says Mr. Zaski.

Users of home heating oil may not see the same savings as natural-gas users, because the price of oil has not fallen as far. "We're about where we were pre- Katrina," says John Huber of the National Oilheat Research Alliance in Alexandria, Va. After peaking this summer at $2.05 a gallon, the wholesale price of heating oil has dropped to about $1.65 a gallon.

Falwell Acknowledges Clinton Comment (AP-Y)

By Dena Potter

AP, September 25, 2006

The Rev. Jerry Falwell acknowledged on Sunday saying that if Hillary Rodham Clinton were the Democrats' presidential nominee in 2008, it would motivate conservative evangelical Christians to oppose her more than if the devil himself were running.

Falwell said in a telephone interview that his comments to several hundred pastors and religious activists at the "Value Voter Summit" conference were "totally tongue-in-cheek."

"I certainly hope that Hillary is the candidate," Falwell said at a breakfast session Friday in Washington. "I hope she's the candidate, because nothing will energize my (constituency) like Hillary Clinton," he said. "If Lucifer ran, he wouldn't."

DOJ_NMG_0068708

Clinton press secretary Philippe Reines said Sunday, "Working for someone who believes in the Golden Rule, we're not going to engage in such vitriolic discourse — but it seems that a new low has been reached in demonizing political opponents."

Falwell told the AP that he did not intend to demonize the former first lady. "That was totally tongue-in-cheek and everyone in the building knew that and everyone laughed," Falwell said.

Falwell said religious conservatives do not favor Clinton for several reasons, but mostly because she is pro-choice on abortion, "the cutting-edge issue for social conservatives."

"I just think that she has enough of a record before our people now to bring most of them to the polls," Falwell said.

The Rev. Barry Lynn, director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, said, "I don't know why Jerry Falwell always has to drag politics into the gutter."

Lynn, whose advocacy group scrutinizes the religious right and was monitoring last week's conference, added, "Maybe the devil made him do it."

Attendees also were assured during the prayer breakfast that God would preserve a Republican majority in Congress.

Falwell would not say what he thought would happen in 2008 if Clinton were not the nominee.

"In '08, I think that's too far ahead to know what's going to happen in the domestic and foreign policy issues," Falwell said in the interview.

"In my opinion, the big issue then will be what the big issue is today, and that is national security and the war on terrorism at home and abroad. I don't think anybody doubts that the Republicans have a better record and a better commitment to national security than the Democrats do," Falwell said.

His remarks were first reported in Sunday's Los Angeles Times.

Christian Conservatives Look To Re-energize Base (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 24 — Openly anxious about grass-roots disaffection from the Republican Party, conservative Christian organizers are reaching for ways to turn out voters this November, including arguing that recognizing same-sex marriage could also limit religious freedom.

Just two years after many conservative Christians exulted that their voter turnout efforts had pushed President Bush to re-election, organizers say their constituents are disengaged.

“There is disillusionment out there with Republicans,” said James C. Dobson, founder of the conservative Christian broadcaster Focus on the Family and the most influential voice in the movement. “That worries me greatly.”

At an election-season Values Voters Summit held here by the allied Family Research Council, some conservatives debated whether “maybe losing the Republican majority would teach us a lesson and get our movement back on track,” in the words of Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana.

Mr. Pence argued that in the end, Republicans were still preferable to Democrats. Like many arguments, though, his was about picking the lesser of two evils.

“My first inclination was to sit this one out,” Dr. Dobson said in an interview, adding that he had changed his mind when he looked at who would become the leaders of Congressional committees if the Democrats took over.

Some were candidly gloomy.

“At the grass roots, among ordinary people, the enthusiasm is not there, and unless that changes in the next five or six weeks, the Republicans aren’t going to make it” to retain control of Congress, said Paul Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation and a founder of the modern conservative movement.

In addition to voicing more general complaints, Christian conservatives say President Bush and Republicans in Congress have not lived up to their expectations about advancing new abortion restrictions or a proposed constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0068709

Even in this crowd of nearly 2,000 Christian conservative activists, some balked at one tactic recommended to turn out church voters. In a workshop, Connie Marshner, a veteran organizer, distributed a step-by-step guide that recommended obtaining church directories and posing as a nonpartisan pollster to ask people how they planned to vote.

"Hello, I am with ABC polls," a suggested script began.

Some attendees complained that the script seemed deceptive, Ms. Marshner said in an interview afterward. She said that such disguised calls were a common campaign tactic, that it was just a suggested script and that she never recommended answering a direct question with a lie.

Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, who played host to the conference, said he was "upset" to learn of her instructions and condemned any deception.

The Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of the liberal group Americans United for Separation of Church and State, called the tactic "disgraceful" and "a desecration of the church."

Several organizers at the event lamented that opposition to same-sex marriage, a major catalyst for Christian conservative turnout two years ago, had lost some of its emotional resonance. Massachusetts remains the only state to recognize same-sex marriage. Sixteen states have passed constitutional amendments banning such unions, and eight courts have ruled against the idea.

"Sometimes success brings complacency," Mr. Perkins said.

To revive some of the emotions around the issue, several organizers said they were taking up the argument that legal recognition of same-sex marriages would cramp the free expression of religious groups who consider such unions a sin — an idea much discussed at the conference.

"That is an issue that wasn't around two years ago and one that is absolutely moving to the very forefront," said the Rev. Donald Wildmon, founder of the American Family Association, a conservative Christian broadcaster and advocacy group.

Although that idea may seem far-fetched to many liberal or secular-minded voters, legal scholars across the political spectrum agree that authorizing same-sex marriages could present legal questions for some religious groups. A Roman Catholic group in Massachusetts, for example, recently stopped offering children for adoption rather than provide them to gay couples.

At the Values Voters conference, Mr. Perkins played a preview for an October telecast to Christian broadcasters that dramatized the conflicts in stark terms. He interviewed parents who are suing the town of Lexington, Mass., because its public school assigned their 7-year-old son a book called "King and King," about two princes who marry.

"Get involved as the Lord leads before religious liberty is lost forever," Mr. Perkins warned in the trailer.

Others looked abroad. In a pre-election letter to 2.5 million supporters, Dr. Dobson is breaking away from his traditional field of child psychology to argue that foreign terrorists are a threat to families.

The Rev. Jerry Falwell, founder of the Moral Majority, looked ahead to 2008 and the possibility that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton might be the Democratic presidential candidate. Ms. Clinton's nomination, Mr. Falwell said to laughs, would arouse even more evangelical opposition than Lucifer's.

Free Trade At The Fore Of Races (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Jack Davis remembers the night he left the Republican Party over free trade: Nov. 17, 2003, after he paid $2,000 to meet Dick Cheney at the upscale Park Lane Restaurant in Buffalo, N.Y.

Davis, a furnace-parts manufacturer and lifelong Republican, had hoped to convince the vice president that their party's free-trade policies hurt workers. He never got the chance. And after Davis started sharing his views with reporters at the event, he said, Cheney's staff ordered him to leave.

Within weeks, Davis had become a Democrat; ended his support of the libertarian Cato Institute and the conservative Heritage Foundation; and started a group, Save American Jobs, to toughen trade barriers.

Now Davis is a Democrat challenging four-term Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) and calling for restrictions on foreign goods. And Reynolds, who leads the committee that coordinates election strategy for House Republicans nationwide, is spending unexpected time and money defending his western New York seat as Davis attacks him for supporting trade agreements he says are "hammering the middle class."

DOJ_NMG_0068710

With wages stagnating for many Americans, trade has become a significant campaign factor this fall in parts of New York, Pennsylvania, Georgia and other states. In Ohio, Michigan and North Carolina, where manufacturers continue to shutter plants and cut jobs, free trade has become a major issue of campaigns.

In Michigan, Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow, who is seeking reelection, recently ran a TV ad highlighting her effort to create a "trade prosecutor" to investigate unfair foreign competition.

In Ohio, Republican Sen. Mike DeWine and his Democratic challenger, Rep. Sherrod Brown, have repeatedly sparred over trade, with Brown calling for "fair-trade" policies that hold foreign companies to U.S. workplace standards.

In North Carolina, Republican Rep. Robin Hayes, a textile heir, is under attack from his opponent, a former textile worker, for supporting the Central American Free Trade Agreement last year. Hayes cast the deciding vote.

In Reynolds' district, some of the largest manufacturers — Eastman Kodak Co., Ford Motor Co. and Delphi Corp. — are cutting back. Davis blames competition abroad for the job losses and wants tariffs against countries that have flooded U.S. markets with cheap goods.

Reynolds, who also supported CAFTA — the major trade deal of the current Congress — aired a TV ad this month saying his opponent's tariff proposal was "really a tax increase on families, raising the cost of everything."

Recently, Reynolds brought Virginia Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte, a fellow Republican and chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, to the district to meet about 50 dairy farmers and to showcase his efforts on their behalf. But the farmers complained about trade, and they wanted to know what Reynolds was doing to help them compete against foreign companies.

"He hasn't really answered the question of what he's going to do to make free trade fair trade," said farmer Kathy Youngers, who attended the meeting but has not decided whether to vote for Reynolds.

Davis may have a better chance of persuading voters than in 2004, when he ran against Reynolds on a similar trade platform and lost by 12 percentage points. Although polls indicate concerns about the economy are easing, many people are still anxious and may be open to an appeal based on tougher trade policies, said Wendy Schiller, an associate professor of political science at Brown University.

In Ohio, Brown, who led House opposition to CAFTA last year, appeared in a recent TV ad in front of a factory with a "Plant Closed" sign on its fence. "My opponent supported the trade agreements that cost us these jobs. He says it's just business — I say it's wrong," Brown says.

DeWine says he pushed "fair-trade" legislation including tariffs on foreign steel and measures returning profit from the sale of illegally dumped foreign goods to U.S. companies. But he also defends free-trade deals that he says create jobs by increasing exports.

"These agreements bring foreign trade barriers down for U.S. goods," he said in a statement last week. "U.S. tariffs were already low, and these trade agreements level the playing field" by lowering the tariffs imposed on U.S. exports.

Reverberating in some campaigns is last year's CAFTA fight.

In Georgia, Republican challenger Max Burns faults Democratic Rep. John Barrow for voting against CAFTA. At a campaign appearance, Burns waved letters from officials at a local Jockey International Inc. plant pleading for CAFTA. But Barrow said Jockey was an example of how CAFTA failed workers. In July, Jockey announced plans to relocate to Central America, laying off 203 Georgia workers.

In upstate New York, engineer David Curry, 64, lost his job when a steel-parts manufacturer downsized its staff six years ago, and said he planned to vote for Democrat Jack Davis because Davis opposed free trade.

"It has changed western New York dramatically," Curry said. "Used to be blue-collar and proud, and now it's just the Rust Belt."

Don't Make Me Say I Told You So: It's A Bump, Not A Surge (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068711

The ink on my Sept. 18 column warning against overreaction to new polling and alleged "surges" had not yet dried when USA Today released its newest Gallup Poll, predictably asserting the existence of an alleged Republican surge. Others quickly joined the chorus.

First, let's stipulate that recent polling has shown some improvement in Republican numbers, whether it's in the president's standing or the generic ballot. President Bush's job approval numbers bottomed out earlier this year and have been inching up for a couple of months.

That's the good news for Republicans, and any good news is better than bad news. But if you look at presidential job approval and the generic ballot, it is awfully difficult — no, actually, it is impossible — to conclude a dramatic surge has occured or is under way. That doesn't mean it won't happen, only that it hasn't occurred so far.

The USA Today/Gallup poll found Bush's job ratings among all adults at 44 percent approve/51 percent disapprove. That's an improvement from an Aug. 18-20 USA Today/Gallup survey that showed the president's ratings at 42 percent approve/54 percent disapprove. So, Bush's approval is up 2 points and his disapproval is down 3. Clear enough.

A Bloomberg/Los Angeles Times poll showed the same thing, and it's a development worth noting. But remember, Bush's disapproval was still at 51 percent in the USA Today poll and 52 percent in the Bloomberg/L.A. Times survey, and the improvement in Bush's numbers is still modest. It's not as if the public has suddenly changed its evaluation of the president. A majority of Americans still disapprove of his performance, and that's not a good place to be for the Republicans going into a second midterm election.

In evaluating presidential job approval ratings, Gallup actually reports two additional sets of numbers, one based on three-poll rolling averages and a "smoothed approval" estimate, based on work done with a consultant, Yale professor Don Green.

Both reports show a slow but steady increase in Bush's job approval from a stretch in May, when it bottomed out in the low 30 percent range, to now, when it is around 40 percent. They show no surge, however, and Gallup Poll Editor in Chief Frank Newport wisely notes that after years of doing polling, he pays less attention to the results of a single survey and more to trends and patterns.

Now we get to an even bigger problem for those who want to see a surge in the USA Today/Gallup numbers — the generic ballot.

Far too much has been made of the USA Today/Gallup poll's finding that the generic Congressional ballot is tied at 48 percent among "likely voters." Unfortunately, some observers have compared that number to previous Gallup generic ballot numbers, proclaiming incontrovertible evidence of a surge.

However, Newport told me recently that the Sept. 15-17 USA Today/Gallup survey is the first one this year that screened for "likely voters." Previously, Gallup reported either on registered voters or "regular voters." Regular voters and likely voters are not identical, Newport said, since different questions are used to identify both subsamples.

So, if you must compare apples to oranges, go right ahead and compare "regular voters" to "likely voters." Just remember that it's not kosher.

If you look at Gallup's registered voters going back almost three months, you will find that the current 51 percent Democratic/42 percent Republican generic ballot in mid-September is almost identical with Gallup results from Aug. 10, July 30 and July 9. So the only "surge" among registered voters appeared in a dramatic narrowing of the generic in a single Aug. 18-20 poll. But that single survey is an outlier, and the USA Today/Gallup generic hasn't really moved in months.

Interestingly, less than 48 hours after the USA Today/Gallup poll became public, a CBS News/New York Times survey was released. While it reported on the opinions of adults, rather than registered or likely voters (who usually are more Republican), the CBS News/New York Times survey found the president's job approval at 37 percent, "virtually unchanged" from August. Moreover, the poll found Democrats with a 15-point advantage in the generic ballot, 50 percent to 35 percent.

Does all of this mean terrible news for Republicans, since they have been hoping for a surge? Not necessarily.

It's odd that there hasn't been more comment about the difference between the USA Today/Gallup registered voters and likely voters generic ballot results. While the poll showed Democrats with a 9-point advantage among registered voters, the generic ballot was even among likely voters.

DOJ_NMG_0068712

With all of the talk about Democratic enthusiasm and Republican division, I would not have thought there would be such a large gap between the two samples.

Elections are won and lost by actual voters, not by hypothetical voters. So, if Democrats don't beat the GOP on turnout on Election Day, the generic ballot among all adults won't matter at all.

Hawaii Senator Wins Tough Primary Battle (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

HONOLULU, Sept. 24 -- Sen. Daniel K. Akaka, who has served in Congress for 30 years, beat back a challenge from Rep. Ed Case in Hawaii's Democratic primary.

Case conceded the race just before 6 a.m. Eastern time Sunday, when returns showed that he trailed 55 percent to 45 percent with all but one precinct reporting.

The GOP nomination went to former Vietnam prisoner of war Jerry Coffee, who pulled out of the race because of health reasons. Republicans have three days to name a replacement candidate.

"I want to thank Hawaii for supporting me all these years," Akaka, 82, said Saturday night. "It has been a tough campaign for me."

Case, 53, trailed in every county, including those in his own 2nd District, and did not win on any of Hawaii's islands. Democratic-leaning Hawaii has never unseated an incumbent member of Congress. It became a state in 1959.

In the governor's race, former state senator Randy Iwase won the Democratic nomination over Hawaiian activist William Aila Jr. Iwase will take on Gov. Linda Lingle, who secured the GOP nomination and is expected to easily win a second term.

A Senator Bets On Party's Clout In Pennsylvania (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

An endangered Republican like Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania could always comfort himself with this: The political winds may be blowing the Democrats' way this year, but the Republicans retain some formidable structural advantages.

Like money: Mr. Santorum, the third-ranking Republican in the Senate leadership, has had a significant fund-raising advantage over his Democratic challenger, State Treasurer Bob Casey, which means more money for television advertising.

Or the Republicans' near-legendary voter turnout operation: the 72-hour program, tested and proven (to the Democrats' despair) in the 2002 and 2004 elections, which moved coordinators into Pennsylvania more than a year ago to prepare for Nov. 7.

Not to mention the bully pulpit of the White House: even a politically beleaguered president can shape the terms of political debate, as President Bush demonstrated anew with his focus on terrorism in recent weeks.

As the midterm campaign enters its final six weeks, these Republican fortifications will be tested around the country, but arguably nowhere as much as in Pennsylvania. Mr. Santorum has lagged behind Mr. Casey in opinion polls for nearly a year now, at times by double digits; his seat has become the Democrats' best hope for one of the six seats they need to regain a Senate majority.

Republican strategists say they have seen some signs in recent days of an improving political climate for their party nationally, which they hope is translated — soon — into individual races. But few are willing to declare a turning point in the battle for the House and Senate; both parties are waiting to see if the Republicans' traditional advantages kick in.

Here in Pennsylvania, with every new poll, the question arises: Can Mr. Santorum, with all his resources, change the dynamics of this race?

So far, the answer is not fundamentally. One of the latest independent surveys, the Keystone Poll released last week, showed Mr. Casey retaining the lead, with the support of 45 percent of registered voters, to Mr. Santorum's 38 percent. The race, experts say, has tightened since spring, and Mr. Casey's unfavorable ratings have climbed.

But G. Terry Madonna, who heads the Keystone Poll at Franklin & Marshall College, noted that Mr. Santorum had been unable, so far, to improve his own standing significantly.

"He gets, on average, about 40 percent of the voters," Mr. Madonna said. "He's been able to knock Casey down just a tad, but he's been unable to go up himself."

DOJ_NMG_0068713

The Keystone Poll showed Mr. Santorum still lagging significantly behind Mr. Casey in the Philadelphia suburbs, a critical battleground. A poll for The Philadelphia Inquirer, released yesterday, showed Mr. Casey with a 10-point lead.

Neil Newhouse, Mr. Santorum's pollster, counters that the Republicans are clearly gaining ground — and have the time and the resources to gain more. "It's a single-digit race," Mr. Newhouse said. "And he has a financial advantage going into the last six weeks of this race. Anybody who would, at this point of the campaign, count him out, I think is making a serious mistake."

Still, Mr. Madonna and other experts say the latest poll ratings are noteworthy because Mr. Santorum has already run substantial television advertising. According to an analysis of data gathered by the Campaign Media Analysis Group, the Santorum campaign and supporting groups overwhelmingly outspent the Casey forces in television advertising between late May and mid-September.

Mr. Santorum has run some positive commercials — former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York praises him in the latest — but the advertising wars have grown increasingly harsh in recent weeks. Like other endangered Republicans this year, who are fighting general discontent with the Bush administration and a Republican-controlled Congress, Mr. Santorum is trying to turn this race into a choice, not a referendum. And he needs to portray Mr. Casey — still undefined to many Pennsylvanians — as an unacceptable choice.

One of the most contentious Santorum advertisements opens in a room that is literally smoke-filled, with a group of cigar-smoking men (who are actors) playing cards, and clearly up to no good.

"Meet Bob Casey's campaign team," the announcer intones, citing unnamed developers and businessmen who have contributed to Mr. Casey and are now under investigation. Only when the camera pans back is it clear where the men are meeting — behind bars.

The advertisement was described as misleading by Factcheck.org, the nonpartisan monitor at the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania, which noted that none of the men cited currently work for Mr. Casey, and that some had contributed, in past campaigns, not only to Mr. Casey, but also to Mr. Santorum.

Mr. Casey, in an interview, described the advertisement as a sign of "desperation" in his opponent. "It sent me a real signal that he feels he's in trouble, that he can't win this on his record or on his vision for the future," Mr. Casey said.

Mr. Santorum's advisers defend their advertising and say they plan more spots on Mr. Casey's donors and his ethics, as well as his rapid ascent through elective offices. "We're just starting to paint a picture for people of the Bob Casey they need to know about," said John Brabender, Mr. Santorum's media adviser.

The Casey campaign is running tough spots of its own. One recent advertisement featured a woman taking Mr. Santorum to task for suggesting, in his book "It Takes a Family," last year, that in some families both parents work because of choice, not necessity. "He doesn't understand how hard it is in order to make ends meet," says the woman, Debbie Balcik, talking directly into the camera, explaining her anger. "I'm not like a U.S. senator. I can't vote my own pay raise."

Another focuses on Mr. Santorum's voting record — or, as the announcer puts it, "a 98 percent voting record with George Bush" and "a record that hurts Pennsylvania."

The air war has only recently been fully engaged in Philadelphia, the most expensive market in the state and one that reaches 40 percent of the voting-age population. Casey campaign officials said they husbanded their money this summer, and did not try to match the Santorum campaign's spending, so that they could go toe to toe with the Republicans this fall.

"Did the race tighten over the time frame when Santorum and the Republicans were exploiting their cash-on-hand advantage? Yeah," said Jay Reiff, Mr. Casey's campaign manager. "But not now. We can match them now going down to the wire."

They recently got some help from Gov. Edward G. Rendell, the Democrat who recruited Mr. Casey to enter the Senate race. Far ahead in his own race for re-election, Mr. Rendell announced in recent days that he was raising money to help Mr. Casey keep pace.

Republicans, in the end, are hoping to make the Senate race tight enough that a superior turnout operation can make the difference. The state has been a high priority with the national party from the start, given the challenge to Mr. Santorum and the competitive races facing several Republican House members there. Republicans are keenly aware of the challenge they face in the Philadelphia suburban counties, particularly with Mr. Rendell on the ticket.

DOJ_NMG_0068714

"We have a Democratic governor running who's good at this," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, alluding to Mr. Rendell's prowess at turnout. "And we've been preparing for the past 16 months."

Many Democrats also suggest that the sheer intensity of their voters will go a long way toward matching the Republicans' structural advantage. "People are anxious to vote, and they're anxious to vote for change," Mr. Casey said. "They know a good turnout and a good vote means we can chart a different course." He added, "The intensity is like none I've ever seen in our state."

Antiwar Democrat In Connecticut Adds Planks To Platform (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

At a center for the elderly in Hamden, Conn., last week, Ned Lamont spun through his regular stump speech, touching in about 10 minutes on his ambitions to legislate universal health care, cut back the federal deficit and limit the influence of lobbying in Washington.

Halfway between his victory in the Democratic primary and his rematch with Senator Joseph I. Lieberman in the general election, Mr. Lamont is trying to articulate positions on a variety of domestic issues, from education to transportation to jobs.

But in the end, Mr. Lamont, a former cable executive who has presented himself as a fiscal conservative, cannot help but return to the centerpiece of his campaign.

"I'm in this race because I think it's time we start investing in the United States of America again," he told the Hamden crowd, alluding to the war in Iraq as a symbol of "bad choices."

The friendly audience, filled with graying voters, rewarded the line with loud applause. Then, their questions came quickly and precisely:

Would he oppose privatization of Social Security? Absolutely.

Does he support gun control? Yes.

Should President Bush be impeached? No.

And does he favor term limits?

"Eighteen years seems just about the right amount of time to me," he said, generating laughter with the obvious reference to his opponent's three-term tenure in the Senate.

As Mr. Lamont, a political novice but for a few years on the Greenwich Board of Selectmen, seeks support from a broader array of voters in November, he is trying to make the case that he has the intelligence and credentials to serve in the Senate.

He is also expanding his portfolio of positions. As Mr. Lieberman continues to attack him for running a "one-issue" antiwar campaign, many voters still do not know Mr. Lamont's views on the full range of issues he would confront in the Senate if he defeats Mr. Lieberman, who is running on his own line as an independent, and the Republican candidate, Alan Schlesinger, who polls say is far behind.

Last week, Mr. Lamont spent his days presenting his health care plan at colleges and community health centers.

Earlier this month, he released an education proposal, which calls for more prekindergarten and after-school programs.

He spends much of his time talking to voters about the loss of local jobs and about transportation problems, saying more should be done to build up the railways and ports, to help address both problems.

Still, there are a handful of things Mr. Lamont seems unsure of. In an interview earlier this month, when asked whether he would roll back the president's tax cuts, he waffled about whether he would undo the whole package or just the cuts for the wealthiest Americans. (Last week, he said the tax cuts should be undone for those with income of more than $200,000.)

In style and substance, Mr. Lamont, as a newcomer to statewide campaigning and national politics, has both an asset and a liability.

Some voters are eager to chat at length when he fires a handful of questions back at them.

Others are wary of somebody who is still shaping his views and lacks government experience. Mr. Lamont is trying to counter that by focusing on his business résumé, telling anyone who will listen that his work experience will help him accomplish plenty in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0068715

Although much of the race has centered on the war in Iraq, the Senate committee on which Mr. Lamont says he is most interested in serving is the Finance Committee.

"I've met a payroll, I know how to sit in a room and negotiate with people based on priorities — that's what you do every day in business," he said, responding to a man who asked what gave him the confidence he could work in Congress.

Pointing to a federal deficit estimated at $400 billion, Mr. Lamont is fond of saying on the campaign trail, "We talk about the death tax, but what about the birth tax?" The implication is that government deficits burden future generations.

So what would he do to help reduce the deficit? Stop spending millions of dollars each day in Iraq, he says, curb tax cuts and streamline health care programs like Medicare and Medicaid. Mr. Lamont also complains frequently about earmarks, the special appropriations designated by individual members of Congress for pet projects. He calls them wasteful and lobbyist-driven.

In a state where manufacturing employment has shrunk over the past several decades, Mr. Lamont's campaign fliers also frequently mention jobs, which he says have been driven from Connecticut to the South and overseas in recent years.

He says he would have backed the North American Fair Trade Agreement, but would have opposed its counterpart, the Central American Fair Trade Agreement, because it did not provide for enough regulation to protect the rights of workers.

Last week, Mr. Lamont also emphasized universal health care. Under his plan, all employers would be required to provide a basic level of health insurance or else pay into a federal program.

Mr. Lamont also says that the federal government should do more for "preventative care," paying for routine checkups and expanding federally financed community health centers.

Like many other Democrats in Connecticut and other states, Mr. Lamont hopes that the issue of health care will galvanize voters. It is also another way to contrast himself with Mr. Lieberman, who generally opposes the imposition of broad "mandates" on employers, saying they would sink small businesses.

Mr. Lamont says the government should take an "incremental" approach, rather than creating a single-payer system right away, and he favors allowing companies to save money by buying into large insurance pools.

"What we have now is broken," Mr. Lamont said last week after visiting a health care center in Willimantic. "People say we can't have better coverage until we have more efficient health care, but I think you can't have more efficiency until you have better coverage."

Mr. Lamont still bristles at the notion that he is a liberal, joking to reporters that he should never be portrayed as "Lefty Ned." But on many domestic issues, he is clearly to the left of Mr. Lieberman, who is widely viewed as a centrist. For example, Mr. Lamont favors legal recognition of gay marriage, although he says it should be left to individual states to decide, while Mr. Lieberman favors allowing civil unions.

Mr. Lamont, who frequently invokes his volunteer work at a public school in Bridgeport, also has tried to focus on education in recent weeks, saying he would push to increase the amount of money allocated for college grants, in part by reducing spending on the war.

As he chatted with students at the University of Connecticut in Storrs the other day, he suggested that the rate for repaying student loans should be tied to an individual's income, but he did not offer details on how to accomplish that.

Mr. Lamont has also criticized the No Child Left Behind laws, a centerpiece of Mr. Bush's education agenda. He says he initially thought the legislation, which forces schools to test students annually and provides harsh penalties for schools that do not consistently improve, was good because it provided for greater accountability. Now, he says, he believes the laws overuse testing and unfairly restrict leeway for individual teachers.

But if an opponent might denounce that as a flip-flop, Mr. Lamont portrays it as evidence of his common-sense adaptability.

"I don't know why in politics it is a high crime and misdemeanor to change your mind," he said recently, repeating a line that has popped up with more frequency in his talks lately. "In business, you look at the facts and if you have to change, you do."

Allen Struggles To Alter Message (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068716

Sen. George Allen, his re-election campaign bruised from a month of gaffes and setbacks, is on the defensive and on the attack.

Conservatives are frustrated with the Virginia Republican who once seemed an optimal choice for a 2008 White House bid and say he's given free publicity to his Democratic opponent James H. Webb Jr.

"This hasn't been the campaign he expected to run, to be sure," said former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III, a Republican.

Still, Mr. Gilmore thinks Mr. Allen will win re-election if he can keep the conversation focused on the successful conservative record he built as governor in the 1990s, such as abolishing parole, reforming the welfare system and creating educational standards that have received national accolades.

"Our Republican Party has got to get its message straight, and we have to go back to our conservative roots," Mr. Gilmore said.

Mr. Allen, a longtime favorite son of Virginia politics, is not used to playing defense. As the son of famed NFL coach George Allen, he played quarterback at the University of Virginia. He later ran successful political campaigns as a change agent, someone who would bring "positive ideas" to reform government and challenge the status quo.

But now, he's spent a month apologizing for calling an Indian-American man "macaca" and for his past display of the Confederate flag.

Conservative blogger Dean Barnett issued a scathing review of a recent "Meet the Press" debate between Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb.

"For conservatives wishing for Allen to retain his seat, their best hope is that Virginians were otherwise occupied this morning or that the state's NBC outlets were having technical difficulties," he wrote on the blog hughhewitt.townhall.com, calling the senator's performance "dreadful."

Mr. Barnett called Mr. Webb a "nimble and effective" debater and said he is baffled by Mr. Allen's choice to attack Mr. Webb for an article he wrote in 1979 questioning the role of women in the military.

Mr. Allen's campaign has hammered Mr. Webb, with support from female Naval Academy graduates who say the article encouraged sexual harassment. Mr. Barnett said Mr. Allen is acting like a liberal.

The senator defended his argument last week on Fox News, saying, "It's not an issue of women in combat. It's an issue of how you treat women."

Mr. Allen has repeatedly told voters that he "made a mistake" by using the word "macaca," which he says he made up. It is considered a racial slur in some European cultures.

After that incident, Mr. Allen told a group of educators from historically black colleges and universities that he regretted not learning earlier in life that the Confederate flag was a racist symbol.

Many who know Mr. Allen think the multiple apologies are odd, because he is not a man who apologizes for speaking his mind.

As governor, he said to fellow Republicans about Democrats controlling the state legislature: "Let's enjoy knocking their soft teeth down their whiny throats."

At a debate last week hosted by the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Allen lashed out at a television reporter who asked whether he had Jewish heritage, saying such "aspersions" had no place in the debate.

However, Mr. Allen, who was raised a Christian, later revealed that his mother's father was Jewish and said she told him for the first time earlier this year.

"Allen has been on the defensive now for more than a month, and that's not where an incumbent who had a double-digit lead should be," said Mark J. Rozell, a political science professor at George Mason University.

When Mr. Allen started his re-election tour, he held a 20-point lead and promised voters that he would work to strengthen the U.S. border and make the federal tax cuts permanent. He now has a lead of a few points in most polls.

Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform said Mr. Allen should run on the fiscal conservatism that helped him gain record popularity as governor.

DOJ_NMG_0068717

"He's got a very solid record in Virginia," Mr. Norquist said. "Allen has run as a person who won't raise your taxes, and he's voted against tax cuts in every case."

Republican activist Tucker Watkins in Southside Virginia said Mr. Allen will be OK because the Virginia voters have long memories. "He's been here over and over since he was governor, and he never forgets what he promised us," Mr. Watkins said.

Everyone's Jewish (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Strange doings in Virginia. George Allen, former governor, one-term senator, son of a famous football coach and in the midst of a heated battle for reelection, has just been outed as a Jew. An odd turn of events, given that his having Jewish origins has nothing to do with anything in the campaign and that Allen himself was oblivious to the fact until his 83-year-old mother revealed to him last month the secret she had kept concealed for 60 years.

Apart from its political irrelevance, it seems improbable in the extreme that the cowboy-boots-wearing football scion of Southern manner and speech should turn out to be, at least by origins, a son of Israel. For Allen, as he quipped to me, it's the explanation for a lifelong affinity for Hebrew National hot dogs. For me, it is the ultimate confirmation of something I have been regaling friends with for 20 years and now, for the advancement of social science, feel compelled to publish.

Krauthammer's Law: Everyone is Jewish until proven otherwise. I've had a fairly good run with this one. First, it turns out that John Kerry -- windsurfing, French-speaking, Beacon Hill aristocrat -- had two Jewish grandparents. Then Hillary Clinton -- methodical Methodist -- unearths a Jewish stepgrandfather in time for her run as New York senator.

A less jaunty case was that of Madeleine Albright, three of whose Czech grandparents had perished in the Holocaust and who most improbably contended that she had no idea they were Jewish. To which we can add the leading French presidential contender (Nicolas Sarkozy), a former supreme allied commander of NATO (Wesley Clark) and Russia's leading anti-Semite (Vladimir Zhirinovsky). One must have a sense of humor about these things. Even Fidel Castro claims he is from a family of Marranos.

For all its tongue-in-cheek irony, Krauthammer's Law works because when I say "everyone," I don't mean everyone you know personally. Depending on the history and ethnicity of your neighborhood and social circles, there may be no one you know who is Jewish. But if "everyone" means anyone that you've heard of in public life, the law works for two reasons. Ever since the Jews were allowed out of the ghetto and into European society at the dawning of the Enlightenment, they have peopled the arts and sciences, politics, and history in astonishing disproportion to their numbers.

There are 13 million Jews in the world, one-fifth of 1 percent of the world's population. Yet 20 percent of Nobel Prize winners are Jewish, a staggering hundredfold surplus of renown and genius. This is similarly true for a myriad of other "everyones" -- the household names in music, literature, mathematics, physics, finance, industry, design, comedy, film and, as the doors opened, even politics.

But it is not just Jewish excellence at work here. There is a dark side to these past centuries of Jewish emancipation and achievement -- an unrelenting history of persecution. The result is the other more somber and poignant reason for the Jewishness of public figures being discovered late and with surprise: concealment.

Look at the Albright case. Her distinguished father was Jewish, if tenuously so, until the Nazi invasion. He fled Czechoslovakia and, shortly thereafter, converted. Over the centuries, suffering -- most especially, the Holocaust -- has proved too much for many Jews. Many survivors simply resigned their commission.

For some, the break was defiant and theological: A God who could permit the Holocaust -- ineffable be His reasons -- had so breached the Covenant that it was now forfeit. They were bound no longer to Him or His faith.

For others, the considerations were far more secular and practical. Why subject one's children to the fear and suffering, the stigmatization and marginalization, the prospect of being hunted until death that being Jewish had brought to an entire civilization in Europe?

In fact, that was precisely the reason Etty Lumbroso, Allen's mother, concealed her identity. Brought up as a Jew in French Tunisia during World War II, she saw her father, Felix, imprisoned in a concentration camp. Coming to America was her one great chance to leave that forever behind, for her and for her future children. She married George Allen Sr., apparently never telling her husband's family, her own children or anyone else of her Jewishness.

DOJ_NMG_0068718

Such was Etty's choice. Multiply the story in its thousand variations and you have Kerry and Clinton, Albright and Allen, a world of people with a whispered past. Allen's mother tried desperately to bury it forever. In response to published rumors, she finally confessed the truth to him, adding heartbreakingly, "Now you don't love me anymore" -- and then swore him to secrecy.

Why The Democratic Wave Could Be A Washout (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, September 25, 2006

American voters have been in a bad mood lately. They don't think highly of the President's performance. They aren't crazy about the war. They certainly don't like the G.O.P.-led Congress--a New York Times poll last week put its approval rating at just 25%. And while disapproval of Congress as a whole isn't rare, polls are finding that more and more voters are dissatisfied with their own lawmakers--a more telling phenomenon. The Democrats hope that come Election Day, this perfect storm of discontent will stir a giant wave to sweep the G.O.P. out of the majority. In a recent presentation to top Democrats, pollster Cornell Belcher said the party has its best chance since the Reagan era to win slices of the electorate that have come to be identified with the G.O.P. base, including churchgoers, young white men and Southern men. Frank Newport, editor in chief of the Gallup Poll, sees conditions ripe for an electoral tsunami but says it depends on "whether Democrats can take advantage of it."

In the past, moments like this have produced what political scientists call "wave elections," in which voters oust even lawmakers who don't seem vulnerable and political icons lose to underfunded unknowns. In 1948 there was widespread disappointment with the Republican-held "do nothing" Congress. It turned out to be an easy target for President Truman's Democrats, who retook both chambers. Such waves can sneak up. In September 1994 a Congressional Quarterly columnist, voicing the conventional wisdom of the time, wrote that the G.O.P.'s chances of taking the House were "dim." Two months later, Newt Gingrich and company capitalized on disaffection with the Democrats that peaked on Election Day and pulverized the Dems' Capitol Hill majorities.

But November is still a way off. Republicans are more chipper than they have been in months, with falling gas prices and an uptick in President Bush's approval ratings. In a Gallup poll of likely voters last week, 48% said they would vote Democratic for Congress--and 48% said they'd vote Republican. Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, says the opposition hasn't sold a vision for handling terrorism, Iraq or jobs. He also cites a drop-off in turnout for most Democratic primaries this year as one sign that the Dems aren't strong enough to mount a takeover of power on Capitol Hill. Which leaves the G.O.P. cautious but hopeful that it will be able to hang on to its majority. "The challenges aren't less, but the environment is better," says Mehlman. "If you look at the overall picture, this environment is not consistent with a surge election." In other words, the conditions aren't great, but maybe the Democrats' wave won't be quite big enough to let them surf into power.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, September 25, 2006

If-and let's capitalize that-IF the Democrats take back control of the House in the fall elections and put San Francisco's Nancy Pelosi in the speaker's chair, there are going to be a lot more changes than a wholesale firing of GOP aides by gleeful new committee chairmen. In fact, the stylistic changes the first woman in that job would inaugurate could be the biggest story of the November 7 midterm election should Democrats win the needed 15 seats to take charge.

First, she's a lot tougher than many think. In fact a top Republican member tells us that he wishes Dennis Hastert, the likable speaker from Illinois, was as hard on GOP crooks and goof-ups as Pelosi has been on her misfits.

Then there's the woman's touch. Gone would be the clubby feel of the current mostly male leadership. Instead, look for lots of flowers, bowls of San Francisco's Ghirardelli chocolate, and good art mixed in with photos of her grandkids. What's more, meeting-goers would be greeted with fruit and muffins for breakfast, sandwiches for lunch, and maybe a sit-down dinner at her Georgetown condo at night. "Food shows people respect," says an aide. Fashion might also return to Washington, but she doesn't get all the credit: Pelosi's husband buys her threads. And finally, the hours would be much longer, as the 60 Minutes crew following her around for an upcoming October feature story are finding out the hard way.

DOJ_NMG_0068719

Not Just Yahoo! Getting 'Face' Time

The closest the social networking site facebook.com usually comes to politics is grainy photos of candidates' inebriated kids. Not anymore. For the same reason Yahoo! is looking to blow nearly $1 billion to buy Facebook, politicians are moving in: It's where the kids are. Facebook has just started tallying the number of users who list support for candidates. They're mostly lefties, but Maryland Republican Senate candidate Michael Steele is a fave. Some candidates work the site, like Indiana Democratic Sen. Evan Bayh, a likely 2008 presidential bidder. His bio is very Facebook: It links to another site that calls him a hot senator.

At the White House, a Full-Service Flack

He's done print, TV, and radio, so when new White House Press Secretary Tony Snow doesn't have the info he needs, the former newsman knows how to get it. Reporting, he says, "makes the job fun." And beyond liking reporters, Snow's working to make it easier for them to get answers out of the White House. But has his press coddling gone too far? At a briefing last week, he flipped over the tapes of two recorders that had clicked off. "This is part of my obligation as a press secretary. For those who regularly attend, that is a service we provide."

After 10 Years, Time for a Cookie Break

What could be better than baking Christmas cookies? How about having no job and unlimited time to devote to the batter and oven? That's exactly what Fox News Washington Bureau Chief Kim Hume has planned. The better half of the bureau's on-camera star, Brit Hume, Kim is leaving after Thanksgiving. And why? "I'm just done," she says. "Most times when this happens, people always think there's a back story," she says. "In this case, there really isn't," she says, adding: "Now's the time, and I want to finish well." The Humes, who worked together at ABC before Fox, set the bureau up in 1996 and get credit for making it a powerhouse. Brit asked her to stay but caved in. "He gets husband points galore for this," she says. Her future? "I'll do something," says Hume, 51. But first, those cookies. "My cookies are famous," she says. "I can bake my Christmas cookies at leisure. I know this sounds stupid, but you have no idea how good that sounds to me."

In Rove's Footsteps (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, September 25, 2006

In a darkened edit room in downtown Dallas, admaker Scott Howell is tinkering with his latest political firebomb. The ad starts with illegal immigrants running across the border. It then cuts to images of Osama bin Laden and Zacarias Moussaoui. Finally comes the real target of Howell's attack: Harold Ford Jr., the Democrat locked in a close race for the Senate seat in Tennessee. Over an edgy hip-hop soundtrack, the ad castigates Ford for voting against border security and the Patriot Act. "No wonder Harold Ford has been rated the most liberal congressman from Tennessee," the narrator intones. The ad ends with the word "liberal" pulsing on the screen as a shadowy figure walks down a long hallway.

If that ad sounds familiar, it's not surprising—it's a classic in the Karl Rove genre. Howell is one of a group of admakers, strategists and direct-mailers who learned the craft from the architect of George W. Bush's White House—and are now shaping some of the hottest races of 2006. Some are in Texas, making money as consultants; some are in Washington, toiling inside the administration or the party. Most of them will be in contact with Rove as Election Day draws near. None can match their mentor's talent; armed with an encyclopedic knowledge of electoral history, Rove combines a strategic vision for his party with a ruthless will to win. But as his time in the West Wing draws to a close, Rove leaves a legacy well beyond the White House—in the next generation that he's nurtured, and the campaigning style they share.

Todd Olsen is one of Rove's prized pupils. He learned the direct-mail business working at Rove's firm in Austin, Texas, then bought the company—and its invaluable mailing lists—with a partner when Rove switched full time to the Bush campaign in 1999. Today Olsen is refining Rove's microtargeting techniques for candidates across the country. Among them, two of the highest-profile African-Americans running as Republicans: Michael Steele in Maryland and Lynn Swann in Pennsylvania. (A key component of Rove's vision: bringing more African-Americans into the party.) Olsen still uses Rove's old spreadsheets, printing up a giant financial summary on Fridays to analyze how much his mailings have raised from each segment of every list.

DOJ_NMG_0068720

Terry Nelson first worked closely with Rove as political director of the Bush '04 campaign. He was struck by Rove's street-level management of the details. "Karl has a great focus on trying to figure out what works in a quantifiable way, not only in terms of message discipline but the discipline of building the organization," says Nelson. "I learned a lot more about spreadsheets under Karl than I ever knew before." Nelson is now senior adviser to Sen. John McCain's political-action committee (widely thought to be the precursor to a 2008 presidential run), managing McCain's extensive campaigning for GOP candidates this fall.

Running the Rove playbook in Washington are Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, and Sara Taylor, White House political director. Together, they've implemented a strategy that has worked wonders through the last two election cycles. But facing the tides of history and a war-weary electorate, they will need all of Rove's tricks to keep the party in power. Mehlman first started working with Rove in the embryonic Bush campaign in 1999 and later managed Bush's re-election in 2004. "We've learned a lot from each other—from what we've done right and what we've done wrong," he says. "One is that there's no place in America we can't go and unfold our Republican banner. Another is the importance of a strong grass-roots effort—the Amway-like model."

Some of Rove's heirs have become lightning rods, just like their mentor. Scott Howell, who is running ad campaigns in such hot spots as Missouri, Michigan, Minnesota and Virginia this fall, has drawn Democratic fire for his Rovean tactics. Last week the Webb campaign in Virginia named Howell as one of the "nastiest, most renowned negative campaigners in the business." Howell got his start at the RNC, where he worked with Rove under legendary attack artist Lee Atwater; he later joined Rove's direct-mail business in Austin. (The criticism isn't confined to Democrats. Some GOP operatives say Howell is simply riding Rove's coattails, and question the quality of his work for the Bush campaign in 2004. Howell suggests the sniping is the result of his success.)

But it's not all bare-knuckled offense; Howell leavens his attack ads with soft-focus spots featuring his candidates' families. One ad for Mike Bouchard, running for the Senate in Michigan, features the candidate wedged between his teenage daughter and her date. "Isn't this fun?" the candidate deadpans to the hapless boyfriend.

Rove will be watching his protégés closely, as he struggles to retain the GOP's control of Congress. One of his biggest concerns is that some congressional campaigns aren't recruiting as many volunteers as they did last time around. "You have to constantly replenish people. In some instances it has been done very successfully by some candidates," he told NEWSWEEK. "In other instances, it's not been done so well."

Anybody who has worked for Rove knows what that means—he'll be on their backs from now until November. In the early days in Austin, his employees used to stage mock "mutinies," walking out of his office to drink Margaritas whenever the boss drove them too hard. In one of the most important elections of their careers, Rove's heirs won't be walking out. But after Karl is done with them, they might need a drink.

Liberal 527s Find Shortfall (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, September 25, 2006

After pouring hundreds of millions of dollars into Democratic-leaning 527s in the 2004 cycle, wealthy liberal donors have provided only a small fraction of that amount to similar groups focused on the tug of war over the House and Senate in the 2006 cycle.

The massive drop-off in resources has left Democratic strategists fearful that their candidates will be overwhelmed financially by Republicans in the closing six weeks of the campaign season.

Only in recent weeks have billionaires such as George Soros and philanthropist Linda Pritzker cut checks to organizations expected to launch attacks on GOP House and Senate candidates in the runup to the Nov. 7 elections. And those donations — $120,000 from Soros, $100,000 from Pritzker, both to the liberal group Majority Action, which is targeting House GOP candidates — pale in comparison to the eight-figure sums that those wealthy liberals committed to 527s two years ago.

Soros alone gave at least $27 million to 527s in the 2004 campaign, making him a huge part of a well-organized effort led by former Clinton White House deputy chief of staff Harold Ickes. According to most recent filings, Soros has given just $2.3 million this cycle to 527s, and most of that money went to groups that are not active in House and Senate races.

DOJ_NMG_0068721

All told, the five largest liberal individual 527 donors in the 2004 campaign fueled that groundbreaking effort with more than $86 million, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.com's database of donors. So far in the 2006 cycle, the five most generous liberals have given less than $9 million to 527s.

The depletion of 527 group resources for liberals represents a significant loss in a financial arena where they had gained clear supremacy over their conservative counterparts just two years ago. This has prompted concern among some Democratic operatives and liberal strategists who fear they have lost the ability to play offense in some of the marginal races that would provide the party the 15 seats they need to reclaim the House and six they need to take over the Senate.

"Are we going to be able to raise enough money to keep the sixth Senate seat in play?" asked Michael Gehrke, head of a pair of Democratic 527s, one of which was intended to be a media vessel in Senate races but has ran aground for lack of funding.

With no single major 527 group establishing itself as the lead player in this cycle, Ickes recently launched September Fund, with the theme being that the group has to raise its goal of $25 million this month, in time to be effective in any key races. Gehrke and many Democratic strategists, most of whom wouldn't speak on the record, however, are worried that a late infusion of attack ads will get lost in the cacophony of spots that already have been reserved by candidates and national party committees.

"It's quite possible that by that time, George Allen will have swamped Jim Webb, and Harold Ford Jr. will have crashed and burned," Gehrke said, pointing to Sen. Allen's (R) Virginia race and Rep. Ford's (D) effort to claim the seat of retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

But there is a divide among party activists about the best way to spend resources, and the liberal mega-donors largely have decided to pour their cash into a series of nonprofits, think tanks and media groups under the umbrella organization Democracy Alliance. Rather than dumping hundreds of millions of dollars into transitory 527 groups, Soros, Pritzker and about 100 other rich liberals have steered the lion's share of their money into organizations that they hope will build a permanent left-wing network of activists.

Without this network — which the Democracy Alliance hopes will be a counter-weight to the conservative web of think tanks — the liberal mega-donors believe the Democrats at best will gain a temporary Congressional majority.

"I hope, and it is certainly critically important, that major center-left donors provide as much money as possible this cycle to assure the success of center-left candidates in every competitive race throughout the country," said Rob Stein, founder of Democracy Alliance. "But we must understand that as necessary as episodic massive infusions are in the short-term, they are not sufficient to build the sustainable infrastructure necessary to be competitive in the long term."

The lack of a full-force 527 liberal front, to date, runs contrary to Republican expectations. National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) often has a chart showing liberal 527 donations from the 2004 campaign stuffed inside his coat pocket to demonstrate to colleagues and reporters their potency.

Democratic operatives knew going into the midterm campaigns that they wouldn't have the same level of resources they enjoyed in 2004, with energy and excitement of a presidential campaign absent from the battleground. In particular, a change in FEC regulations curtailed a huge chunk of 527 money because, after the 2004 elections, the commission issued a ruling that said all get-out-the-vote efforts in Congressional races had to be financed with at least 50 percent federal donations, those contributions that are limited to $5,000 per year to political action committees.

In 2004, the umbrella group America Coming Together raised nearly $200 million — virtually all of it from massive nonfederal donations from the likes of Soros — and almost evenly split that money into a GOTV program in key states for Sen. John Kerry's (D-Mass.) presidential race and to the Media Fund, an advertising committee orchestrated by Ickes.

This election season any 527-financed GOTV effort will not be allowed to directly advocate on behalf of House and Senate candidates, in practical terms making such efforts almost useless in federal races. America Votes, a 527 group that was formed in the 2004 season, continues to operate and has raised at least $5 million but its political ground game, along with Progressive Majority, cannot focus on Congressional races.

With ACT and the Media Fund folding in early 2005, some Democratic strategists still believed they could create a few 527s that would serve as shadow party committees, some focusing on media and grass-roots work in Senate races and others focused on House races. To be successful, these groups had to have significant financing from wealthy individuals because within 60 days of a federal election 527 groups can only use money from individuals — not labor unions or corporations — in ads attacking candidates by name.

DOJ_NMG_0068722

Theories differ as to whether the 527s this year have failed so far because the organizations themselves were flawed, prompting potential donors to flee, or if the wealthy individuals caused the 527s to fail by not giving.

Gehrke, who already is the head of Senate Majority Project, a 527 group aimed at attacking GOP Senators who are not in cycle, founded the Fresh Start for America Project last winter with the hopes of raising millions of dollars to target key Senate races this fall. By June 30, according to filings with the Internal Revenue Service, Fresh Start had not raised a single dollar.

He said he still holds out hope of rounding up large donations to allow the group to play in some Senate races, but acknowledged that the group's financial standing "was still in the same mode."

On the House side, Democratic operatives formed Majority Action, a 527 group that boasted luminaries such as former Democratic National Committee Chairman Donald Fowler and former Reps. Martin Frost (Texas) and Tony Coelho (Calif.).

From July 2005 to June 2006, Majority Action raised just $315,000, almost all coming from labor unions, according to IRS records.

In recent weeks, Majority Action collected its first checks from the wealthy individuals who were so critical to 527s in 2004, with Soros, Pritzker, Loral Corp. CEO Bernard Schwartz and two others giving $420,000, according to the group's filings with the Federal Election Commission.

Those FEC filings show that Majority Action is going on the air in three House districts, against GOP Reps. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), Dave Reichert (Wash.) and Jim Walsh (N.Y.). The largest expenditure is $115,000 against Walsh, a race that is on the outer rim of competitive seats for Democrats but one that could tip their way if there is a huge anti-GOP wave on Election Day.

Bill Buck, spokesman for Majority Action, said the group's goal is to be active in six to 10 House races, with a critical component of its strategy finding districts with cheap advertising rates that aren't already flooded with ads from the candidates and party committees. "Our goal is to both maximize and optimize money," he said.

One strategist blames the large donors for not financing the 527 efforts this cycle at the same time they sought to build their long-term network of nonprofits, arguing it's not a "zero-sum game" and that both causes could have been supported.

Others say these mega-donors are putting their money into activities that have better business models and promise a longer term success for liberals. "There are other strategies and other models emerging for the future," one operative said.

Some activists are hopeful that Ickes' new September Fund will fill the void, and sources indicate that some members of the Democracy Alliance are giving to the group.

Still, the September Fund may have a difficult time getting quality ad time in key media markets such as Philadelphia, Columbus, Ohio, and Louisville, Ky., where no fewer than eight House races and two Senate races are being contested.

With 43 days until the election, some operatives worry that the effort will be too little, too late if the September Fund ads hit the airwaves next month.

"It's not going help if Jim Webb is 10 points down," Gehrke said.

Blasé Guardians At The Money Trough (NYT)

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

Major party bagmen are once again turning to the campaign finance loophole that sullied the 2004 election with the "Swift boat" attacks on Senator John Kerry and the Democrats' unlimited check-writing salvos against President Bush. Small wonder. The Federal Election Commission — the voters' supposed watchdog — continues to shirk its responsibility to rein in shadow party operatives who evade the law by raising unregulated amounts for negative war chests.

Ever since Congress voted to close the "soft money" loophole on campaign donation limits, parties have gotten around the restrictions with what are known as "527's" in honor of a section of the tax code. Organizers pretend that they run independent advocacy campaigns, which are exempt from donation limits. In reality, they do the bidding of party wheel horses in floating attack ads and underwriting voter turnout drives.

DOJ_NMG_0068723

In the current hard-fought battle for control of Congress, Bob Perry, the Republican stalwart who helped bankroll the Swift boat attacks, has already raised $5 million for a fresh assault on Democratic candidates. George Soros, the outsized donor who pumped more than $20 million into the 527 effort against President Bush, is again being solicited to open his checkbook and close the financing advantage that Republicans hold for the election.

Meanwhile, the election commission maintains its rope-a-dope version of vigilance. Complaints from 2004 about soft money abuses are still being studied "case by case" by the F.E.C. Such studiousness has been pronounced a "total failure" by a federal judge who is prodding the commission to write a firm regulation controlling the 527 evasions or explain why not.

In ducking the issue, regulators are allowing soft money to ooze into the November elections. They seem determined to keep looking the other way through the next presidential campaign.

'Battleground' Gets Late Push (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, September 25, 2006

Hoping to maximize their campaign cash reserves before Congress adjourns at the end of the week, House Republican leaders will hold a final fundraising push on Wednesday at the Capitol Hill Club.

While the 2006 Battleground program is on target to surpass the $17.5 million goal set by National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), leaders are expected to increase pressure on the handful of Members who have yet to fulfill their money commitments through individual meetings, also to be held Wednesday, with Reynolds, Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.), and Chief Deputy Majority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.), who is chairing the program this year.

As of late last week, there were approximately two dozen Members who had not yet contributed to the Battleground program, which assists the GOP's most vulnerable incumbents. So far, the program has netted more than $14 million. In the 2004 cycle, the program raised $21 million for vulnerable Republicans, and Cantor is seeking to push that figure to $22 million, surpassing his target by nearly $5 million.

Two senior Members who have yet to meet their contribution targets are Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (Calif.) and retiring Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (Calif.), according to multiple House sources. Chairmen are expected to contribute a minimum of $250,000 to the fundraising program.

According to the most recent Federal Election Commission filings, Thomas had only $70,000 in cash on hand remaining in his campaign account at the end of June, while Lewis is sitting on nearly $1.5 million in cash. Both Members also have leadership political action committees, with Lewis' PAC reporting $289,000 as of Aug. 31, and Thomas' PAC reporting $583,000 as of June 30.

While some Members withhold their checks until Oct. 1 so third-quarter FEC disclosure reports will not reflect the dip in funds, that allowance usually is granted to Members with strong Democratic challengers, something that does not apply to Members such as Thomas and Lewis.

In a statement provided to Roll Call on Friday, Lewis said only, "I will be participating in our Battleground effort." His office declined to provide a dollar figure on what Lewis will contribute.

Lewis was one of the top donors to the 2004 Battleground program when he was in the thick of a three-way race for the Appropriations chairmanship. He contributed $600,000 to the program in July 2004. Lewis has made many individual contributions to GOP incumbents and candidates in the 2006 cycle — his leadership PAC alone has contributed more than $275,000, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.com.

However, he has had to spend substantial money from his campaign account on legal retainers, as the Justice Department is investigating the ties between a lobbying firm and Lewis' office. For instance, in his recent FEC filing, he disclosed a $200,000 retainer fee to the Gibson Dunn & Crutcher law firm.

But where Lewis has made a pledge to contribute to Battleground, Thomas has made no similar commitment.

"The only thing to say is he hasn't contributed yet," said James Min, a spokesman for Thomas. "He is looking into it." Min said the chairman is in the "planning stage" of hosting a fundraiser for Battleground, but could not offer details on the event. Min also noted that Thomas has made contributions to the NRCC this election cycle and has maxed out in contributions from his leadership PAC.

DOJ_NMG_0068724

It is not unprecedented for retiring Members to withhold on the Battleground program, but it does not generate any goodwill among their colleagues. In the 2004 cycle, retiring Rep. Jack Quinn (R-N.Y.) opted to use his sizable coffers to start a new leadership PAC before heading to K Street instead of transferring funds to the NRCC.

Thomas has not yet indicated what he intends to do with his remaining funds, or how much he will contribute to Battleground. In 2004, Thomas also was a late holdout before contributing to the program.

House Democrats also are making a final fundraising push this week with the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee organizing a two day call-a-thon on Tuesday and Thursday, dubbed "Calling for a New Majority," at headquarters for Members to solicit contributions from a targeted list of donors.

House Democratic leaders sent a letter to the Democratic Caucus Friday requesting that every Caucus member participate in the effort.

"DCCC staff will contact you directly to schedule your time. Talking points and updated political background on our races will be provided," the letter states. "In addition, the DCCC will supply each Member a portfolio of calls unique and targeted for them. However, Members are encouraged to also bring a list of personal contacts that you are willing to reach out to."

Democrats are hoping to pad their coffers to fund their advertising and get-out-the-vote efforts. Similarly, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) also will meet with individual Members to squeeze additional money from the estimated $120 million combined total in House Democrats' campaign accounts.

"It's time to put up or shut up," said one Democratic aide involved in the fundraising effort.

In Kentucky's 4th, Democrats Are Banking On A Familiar Face (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

RICHWOOD, Ky. -- In a colonial mansion on a hill, a silver-haired Southern gentlemen named Ken Lucas is looking to rise to power. Again.

Two years after leaving Congress -- at the time, he was certain it was for good -- Lucas is back, asking some of Boone County's richest doctors, lawyers and businessmen to help finance a political resurrection. "If I am lucky enough to go back -- and with the grace of God, we might get there -- we will do the right thing," he promised a gathering of local elites at the home of millionaire philanthropist R.C. Durr and his wife, Deborah Jo Durr, on Saturday night.

Lucas, 73, is a courtly and conservative Southern Democrat seeking to oust Rep. Geoff Davis (R) in Kentucky's 4th Congressional District. Lucas, who held this seat from 1998 until his retirement in 2004, is also one of nine Democrats in key House races making another run at a Republican they challenged at least once before.

They are the do-it-again Democrats, a key to their party's strategy of winning back the House.

The Ohio River Valley is full of them. Across the river in Ohio, Democrat John Cranley is running in the 1st District against GOP Rep. Steve Chabot, who beat him six years ago. In neighboring Indiana's 9th District, former Democratic congressman Baron Hill is challenging Rep. Mike Sodrel, who beat him by about 1,400 votes in 2004. (That race was itself a rematch: Hill had defeated Sodrel in 2002.) Also in Indiana, Joe Donnelly is seeking a do-over in the 2nd District against GOP Rep. Chris Chocola, who defeated him in 2004.

These Democrats are banking on their experience and name recognition -- some voters mistakenly think they won last time -- to reverse their fortunes. But recent history is against them. Since 1996, only three of the 33 challengers have won rematches.

Here in the booming suburbs of Cincinnati, Lucas, who grew up on a tobacco farm in Grant County, is running like he never left Congress. "Return Ken Lucas to Congress" billboards are ubiquitous. The not-so-subtle purpose is to present Lucas as an incumbent who deserves another term.

Sitting in the living room of the mansion, as Democratic donors swirled around him, Lucas said many voters believe he ran and won in 2004. "It is the same old drill," he said. "I know what to do and how to do it."

DOJ_NMG_0068725

His connections have helped him quickly raise more than $1 million and jump out to an early lead in public polls.

Davis is no stranger to rerun candidacies. After taking 48 percent against Lucas in 2002, Davis announced his plans for a rematch on election night. Davis, a former Army Ranger, said his military buddies joked: "You didn't lose -- you just got recycled."

He never got the chance to test himself against Lucas, as the Democrat decided against seeking a fourth term. "Walking away from a fight is called losing," Davis taunted.

With the incumbent gone, Davis easily beat Nick Clooney, father of actor and sometime-activist George Clooney, and seemed ready to hold this district for the foreseeable future.

Then along came Lucas -- again. Unlike any other challenger Davis could have drawn, Lucas is well known and harder to paint as an out-of-touch liberal, which is the chief reason party officials aggressively recruited him late last year.

At the annual pig roast for Boone County Sheriff Mike Helmig, Davis said Lucas lacks one big ingredient: the power of real incumbency. Over the past two years, Davis said he has focused on building a "world-class" constituent services operation that includes five field representatives catering to voters' needs. Responsiveness keeps residents happy, and happy residents reelect incumbents.

It also loosens party allegiance among local officials, who tend to be driven more by results than raw partisanship. Witness Davis's new television commercial touting the endorsement of Covington Mayor Butch Callery, a Democrat who calls the incumbent a "great guy to have in Congress." Incumbency has other residual benefits, most notably money. In 2002, Davis raised $870,000; he has already collected more than $2.5 million for this contest.

The district has changed in Lucas's short absence. The Cincinnati suburbs across the Ohio River are the fastest-growing part of the state, as new developments balloon with residents benefiting from an economic resurgence. Boone County has added 11 to 13 residents every day over the past three years, Helmig says -- many of whom have presumably never heard of Ken Lucas.

The growth has helped transform a Democratic stronghold into Bush Country. President Bush won the district with 63 percent of the vote in 2004. Jim Creevy, who manages Lucas's campaign, said, "Bush is popular, very popular."

It would be foolish for Lucas to run against Bush, as many other Democrats and even some Republicans are doing this election cycle. "That issue just doesn't play here," Creevy said. "In this district, everyone is pro-life and pro-gun."

With similar views on many issues, Lucas campaigns as a voice of independence, a wealthy, grandfatherly figure who is not in it for the power or the prestige. Noting Davis's record of backing GOP leaders 96 percent of the time, he said, "You can send a robot to vote the party line."

His pitch is for more of an attitudinal change than a substantive one. He promises to ask tougher questions about Iraq, though he does not demand a quick withdrawal. He promises to support socially conservative views, even when this means voting against the rest of his party.

But his greatest asset in 2004, Lucas said, is familiarity: "These voters know me."

Political researcher Zachary A. Goldfarb contributed to this report.

Tight Race In Georgia Highlights Dems' Battle (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, September 25, 2006

WAYNESBORO, Ga. — Elizabeth Billips is a Democrat who sticks with her party for president and voted two years ago to send John Barrow to Congress.

But Billips, 36, said she'll vote on Nov. 7 for the man Barrow ousted from the House of Representatives in 2004: Republican Max Burns. Chatting as she sold T-shirts proclaiming this the “Bird Dog Capital of the World,” Billips said she likes Burns' tough stance on illegal immigration and said he's “personable and very available.”

Then, as if on cue, Burns ambled up to say hello. “See,” Billips said, “he shows up.”

Barrow, 50, also showed up at the recent Burke County Farm Festival. He dashed along the festival's parade route just behind his rival, who waved from atop a huge “Farmers for Burns” tractor.

DOJ_NMG_0068726

As the two men bird-dog each other across southeast Georgia's onion and cotton fields, Democrats nationwide are in the hunt for 15 seats to gain control of the House. Most of the focus has been on vulnerable GOP incumbents battered by President Bush's unpopularity, the Iraq war and voters in the mood for change.

At the same time, Democrats also must protect their own. Of three dozen seats the National Republican Congressional Committee considers competitive, eight are held by Democrats. "We're on the offense in pursuing those seats," said Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York, the House GOP campaign chairman.

Democrats are pushing more money toward their "front line" candidates, including Barrow. "We feel very good about where our incumbents are," Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg said.

The defensive line for Democrats cuts through Georgia, where two of the party's incumbents are in tough races. Barrow and fellow Georgia Democrat Jim Marshall, who faces ex-congressman Mac Collins in a neighboring district, are conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats in a region of Republican red.

"There are not a whole lot of opportunities for Republicans to have a take-back," University of Georgia political scientist Charles Bullock said. "This is not a slam-dunk, (but) at least there's a shot" here.

Barrow isn't worried about his race being tied up in the fight for majority control in the House. He agrees with Reynolds, whose mantra this year is, "All politics is local."

"I don't know how much national politics translates into changes down here," Barrow said. "It's a choice between me and Max Burns, and no amount of tidal wave is going to deflect people from that."

Burns was elected in 2002 in a district designed to elect a Democrat. His opponent, Charles "Champ" Walker, was beset by ethics problems, and Burns won with 55% of the vote. Barrow, a former Athens-Clarke County commissioner, unseated Burns, 52%-48%, in 2004.

In March 2005, Georgia's GOP-controlled Legislature redrew district lines. More conservative rural counties were in. Athens, a liberal enclave home to the University of Georgia and seven generations of Barrows, was out. Barrow moved to Savannah.

The new district, which voted for Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry, still leans Democratic but is more evenly divided. Michael Digby, a political scientist at Georgia College & State University in Milledgeville, said Barrow has strong support from blacks, who make up 42% of the district, and in Savannah and Augusta. Burns, 57, who grew up on a farm and banters in a laid-back style, is popular among rural and suburban whites.

Chris Grant, a political scientist at Mercer University in Macon, said the race will be decided in rural towns such as Waynesboro and Vidalia, the sweet-onion capital, where Burns campaigned last week. Voters here are deeply religious and tend to vote Republican, though their loyalties to Georgia or Georgia Tech football may run deeper.

Many are concerned about a flood of illegal immigrant farmworkers who have taxed local schools and hospitals. Others are frustrated by Bush administration farm policies and a "general perception that we're not getting ahead," Grant said.

Burns said Barrow is "pretending" to be a conservative and would cast his first vote next year to make House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi, whom he derides as a "San Francisco liberal," the House speaker. Burns rejected Democratic claims that he'd be a "rubber stamp" for Bush, who helped raise $375,000 for his campaign. "I agree with a lot of what he has done," Burns said about the president.

So does Barrow. In one ad, the congressman echoes GOP rhetoric, saying he "fought to get rid of the death tax" and refused to "cut and run" from Iraq.

"I'm ready, willing and able to cross the line and vote against my party leadership whenever I think the other side is right," he said.

That's good enough for Glen Watkins, 80, of Kite. A "conservative at heart," Watkins voted for Burns in 2004 but likes Barrow's ads. "I vote for the man, not the party," Watkins said.

Others are more skeptical. "Barrow is just too liberal for me," said Robert Nadekow, 44, a Vidalia computer technician who voted for Burns in 2004. "I just don't know if he's being honest about what he's saying or he's saying what will get him elected."

DOJ_NMG_0068727

Kevin Clark also doesn't trust Barrow, but for different reasons. The Savannah gay rights activist said the congressman wasn't invited to the recent Pride Festival because he supported amendments to the Georgia and U.S. constitutions to ban same-sex marriage. He said many in the city's growing gay community "are alienated by both candidates" and may sit out the election.

Grant said Barrow must persuade gays, blacks and other core Democrats to turn out on Election Day. One lure: the prospect for Democrats to take over the House.

That's what Ed Hill, 66, a retired corporate executive who lives in Savannah, said motivates him. Even though the Democrat said Barrow's ads "play damn near the GOP line," he still plans to vote for him. "There's not anything that I agree with him on," said Hill, but "it's important not to have all three branches of the government controlled by the Republicans."

Contender May Become First Muslim In US Congress (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, September 25, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS

When Keith Ellison arrives at the Karmel Square, one of Minneapolis's Somali malls, a rock star might as well be walking by the bustling stalls of bright fabrics, jewelry, phone cards, and videos.

People laugh and cheer as they hug Mr. Ellison and pat him on the back. Some speak quickly in Somali as an interpreter translates, and others offer congratulations in fluent English.

"Asalamu aleikum, brothers," Ellison says with a smile. "Thanks for voting."

He is not Somali, or even an immigrant, but for these voters, Ellison is one of their own. After his victory in this month's Democratic primary in the Fifth District, he's likely to become the first Muslim elected to Congress. He would also be the first black congressman to come from Minnesota.

The distinctions are ones Ellison tries to downplay, always directing conversation back to the issues, but national media and many Minnesotans want to talk of little else.

"You think of the stereotype of Minnesota - Garrison Keillor and white Norwegian farmers. The first Muslim congressman coming from Minnesota? It says a lot about the changing face of the United States and Minnesota," says Larry Jacobs, director of the University of Minnesota's Center for the Study of Politics and Governance. "I think it's one of the most interesting races in the country." A contentious race

It's also been one of the most contentious, with scathing allegations against Ellison coming from conservative bloggers and, most recently, his Republican opponent.

Much of the controversy focuses on his past associations with the Nation of Islam and its leader Louis Farrakhan, considered by many to be racist and antisemitic. He raised money for the Million Man March in 1995 and wrote some articles praising Mr. Farrakhan when he was a student. Ellison says he was never actually a member of the Nation of Islam, and that he became disenchanted with Farrakhan when he realized what he stood for.

Ellison has also been questioned over revelations that his driver's license was twice suspended, most recently this spring, over unpaid parking and speeding tickets, and that he's filed taxes and campaign-finance disclosures late.

"There's a pattern of behavior here that should really make us question the character and integrity of this person," says Alan Fine, his Republican opponent and a professor at the University of Minnesota's Carlson School of Management. "This has never been about race or religion - it has to do with people who choose to be part of a hate group, and associate with people who promote hatred toward others.... I'd like to know when he realized Louis Farrakhan was a racist." Is victory ahead?

Since none of the allegations are new - they were all out there during the primary as well - they're unlikely to derail a campaign that seems headed to victory. But some observers say the state GOP hopes to highlight the controversy in order to make gains in other elections.

"There's a broader statewide Republican strategy here, attempting to brand Democrats as the party of Keith Ellison in order to make Republicans statewide seem more appealing," says Steven Schier, a political science professor at Carleton College in Northfield, Minn. "They're trying to suggest guilt by association for all major Democratic candidates."

DOJ_NMG_0068728

Ellison, who grew up a Catholic in Detroit and moved to Minnesota to go to law school, brushes off such criticisms as fearmongering by some conservatives - an effort to derail a progressive campaign and divide voters.

He's at ease and eloquent mingling with a wide variety of voters, and these days, his talk is primarily about inclusiveness and the need to listen. In his campaign, he eschewed tactics like TV advertising in favor of grass-roots efforts to get out the vote and reach out to a variety of constituencies.

After all, despite Minneapolis's demographic changes, blacks comprise less than 15 percent of his district, which includes both the city and several well-off suburbs.

Ellison was extremely successful in his efforts to increase turnout among minorities and immigrants who rarely vote in primaries - the number of primary voters from the heavily minority district he represents as a state legislator more than tripled from two years ago - but he also reached out to environmentalists, union members, gays and lesbians, antiwar folks, Jewish voters, and Minnesota's active progressive community, many of whom see him as a politician after the model of their hero, the late Sen. Paul Wellstone (D).

"Put all these communities together, and we end up with a quilt that can cover us all," Ellison tells smiling supporters at Clean Water Action, an environmental justice group that endorsed him. "Just keep on inviting more people into vote, and we're going to rock this thing."

As he walks out of their office, he pauses by a photo of Mr. Wellstone. "That's the man," he says. "I just really admire him." Factors that are helping Ellison Ellison's critics point out that he won the primary with just 29,000 votes, in a district with 300,000 voters. But his 41 percent primary victory in a crowded field was still notable.

His campaign was helped significantly when he won the endorsement of Minnesota's powerful Democratic Farmer Labor (DFL) party - the local Democratic Party equivalent - and of most unions. He's a progressive candidate - advocating universal single-payer healthcare, immediate withdrawal of troops from Iraq, and environmental justice - in a district that's among the most progressive in the country.

He might also have been helped, to an extent, by the fact that politics in mostly white Minnesota aren't as racially charged as in many cities, experts say.

"The other [primary] candidates didn't zero in on race or religion. What stood out was how little they talked about it," says Professor Jacobs. "The Democratic characteristics and the less well developed political identities of these racial and religious groups made it possible for Ellison in this district and this election to emerge."

While liberal voters emphasize that it's his issues that primarily won them over, some also love the idea of being the first district to send a Muslim to Congress.

"I'll be honest - to have my little Lutheran community sending him makes me proud," says Bob Hulteen, the organizing director for Take Action, a coalition of progressive groups, as Ellison stops in to thank cheering members and chat with them about their experiences getting out the vote in the primaries. Muslims energized by campaign

Muslims, both in Minneapolis and around the country, are quick to cheer his success as well.

"It sends two very positive messages," says Corey Saylor, national legislative director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, an advocacy group in Washington. "It sends a message about the American people, that five years after 9/11 they're comfortable sending an American to Congress, on issues not based on faith. And for the American Muslim community, it says our community has grown in political inclusion to the point where we can get someone elected to higher office."

Ellison, meanwhile, understands that excitement, but is a bit tired of it.

"All that 'first' stuff isn't why I got in the race, and it doesn't keep me in the race," he says, taking an hour out of a busy day to cheer for his son Elijah at a football game.

"My goals are to have excellent constituent services, and to leverage the energy, talent, and intelligence of the district. I want to see the minimum wage increased and Medicare Part B reformed.... If my religion can prove to people that Muslims can make a contribution - to me, that's a side benefit."

Swift Boat Veterans 2.0 (TIME)

DOJ_NMG_0068729

By Karen Tumulty

Time, September 25, 2006

In 2004 a small ad campaign by anÂ obscure organization called Swift Boat Veterans for Truth smeared John Kerry's Vietnam War record and dealt his campaign a blow from which it never fully recovered. The episode demonstrated the new power of independent political organizations, known as 527s or 501(c)s for the sections of the tax code under which they operate. These groups function outside the campaign-finance laws. Among other things, most can collect unlimited contributions.

Given the stakes and the expected closeness of this fall's election, it is no surprise that a new generation of them has mobilized in recent months. At least three groups--two that tilt Democratic and one Republican--are already generating controversy. Another, the September Fund, led by Hillary Clinton strategist Harold Ickes, is just getting under way. With the Democratic Party far behind Republicans in fund raising, this group of operatives hopes to reduce the G.O.P.'s advantage by raising $20 million to pour into advertising and other support for congressional campaigns and ballot initiatives.

The final weeks of a campaign are generally when advertising and rhetoric turn nasty. This year is likely to be no different.

VoteVets

â€¢WHO'S BEHIND IT Run by Jon Soltz, who served in Iraq in 2003, the group counts among its directors former NATO Commander Wesley Clark and ex-Senator Bob Kerrey, who won the Congressional Medal of Honor in Vietnam, both Democrats.

â€¢WHAT IT SAYS IT DOES Aims to help elect Iraq and Afghanistan veterans to Congress and hold current members of Congress accountable for "votes and positions that harm America and its troops and veterans."

â€¢WHAT IT HAS ACTUALLY DONE Has run graphic and misleading television ads against Republican Senators George Allen and Rick Santorum, suggesting their votes against a Democratic funding measure deprived U.S. troops of modern body armor. In fact, the Government Accountability Office found that a lack of money didn't cause the armor shortfall in 2003. Rather, the military's suppliers could not keep up with the sudden surge in demand for the armor.

Majority Action

â€¢WHO'S BEHIND IT Two former Democratic National Committee chairmen, Joe Andrew and Don Fowler, lead a group of party operatives, including former Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chairman Tony Coelho, who also chaired Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign.

â€¢WHAT IT SAYS IT DOES Plans to "educate the American public about the disastrous record of the current Republican Congress."

â€¢WHAT IT HAS ACTUALLY DONE Has run radio and television ads attacking vulnerable G.O.P. incumbents, apparently exaggerating at least some of its claims against them. The independent watchdog group Factcheck.org a project of the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg Public Policy Center, chided Majority Action for digging back to three trips that Ohio Congresswoman Deborah Pryce took six years ago to support its claim that she "just seems to be on vacation."

Economic Freedom Fund

â€¢WHO'S BEHIND IT The same person who brought you Swift Boat Veterans for Truth. Texas homebuilder Bob Perry, who has close ties to the Bush White House, has given the new California organization $5 million, which exceeds the $4.5 million he provided as the largest contributor to the Swift Boat Veterans.

â€¢WHAT IT SAYS IT DOES Seeks to "educate the public concerning issues related to the preservation of economic freedom, the promotion of economic growth and prosperity."

â€¢WHAT IT HAS ACTUALLY DONE Indiana attorney general Steve Carter filed a lawsuit against the group last week after receiving complaints that it was "push polling" against Democratic congressional candidate Baron Hill. Automated calls placed by the group claimed to be conducting a poll, then attacked Hill's voting record. The tactic usually goes below the radar. In this case, the Indiana AG claims it violates the state's telemarketing law.

10 Questions For Elizabeth Edwards (TIME)

By Andrea Sachs

Time, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068730

In the final days of the 2004 campaign, Elizabeth Edwards, wife of Democratic vice-presidential candidate John Edwards, learned that she had breast cancer. In her inspiring new memoir Saving Graces (Broadway), Edwards reflects, with her trademark frankness, on her battle with the disease as well as the death 10 years earlier of their son Wade in a freak auto accident. Edwards spoke with TIME's Andrea Sachs about her health, her family's wealth and the possibility of John Edwards in '08.

Why did you delay treatment until after the election?

Coming out and saying "I have breast cancer" would have been met with a lot of skepticism about our trying to manipulate the electorate. I had assurances that this delay was not going to adversely affect my health.

How's your health now?

It is as good as any 57-year-old mother with two young children could possibly be. I'm a little tired, but I'm apparently cancer free, and that's the big thing.

Some people say that if your husband had been at the top of the ticket in 2004, he could have beaten George W. Bush.

It would be hard for me to say that I didn't think that was true. John was exactly the counterpoint we needed because the President had portrayed himself as somebody in touch with the guy on the corner. What you needed to show the falsity of that was to have somebody who really was in touch with the guy on the corner, who really understood the lives of people who work in factories, people who struggle, people who live middle-class lives built around their children, Saturday or Sunday soccer, and Friday-night football.

Was John Kerry's privileged background a problem?

I'd be telling you things that weren't true if I said that he didn't have an impediment. He did. He was certainly able to be painted as someone who didn't understand what people did with their free time or what their concerns were when they sat around the table. But I don't think that if you looked at his policies you would have found that to be a fair conclusion.

You write about the Kerrys' plush lifestyle. How would you describe yours?

It's a different kind of luxury, I think. I know the people whose artwork is on my walls--they're not the old masters. I shop at Target. We eat at Wendy's. Even though we have a lot and I feel very blessed, we are basically the same people we were when we first started out and made, between us, $28,000 a year.

What advice do you have for parents who lose a child?

You don't want to make decisions in those first awful moments that are going to make 10 years down the road harder. If you can't stand to see his things or her things, ask a friend to hold them for you. Maybe you'll never ask for them again. But there may come a day when you'd like to see her second-grade paper or a poem he wrote when he was a sophomore.

It looks like your husband will run for President again. What factors are in play?

He's very seriously considering running. One [factor] is my health. He said that if the cancer recurred -- we actually had a scare this fall that turned out not to be anything--he would do what he did before, and draw himself into making me better.

What's the hardest part of campaigning?

Juggling the children. We want to see them as much as possible. We want their lives to be disrupted as little as possible. Those two things obviously are in conflict. One of us would see them every other day at least so they would know we were there for them. We talked to them constantly. And when they were on vacations or had long weekends, or even short weekends sometimes, they would travel with us.

Is the country ready for a female President?

It's impossible to know. I've been ready since I was 8 and thought I wanted to be President.

Is the country ready for Elizabeth Edwards as First Lady?

[Laughs.] When John was running in 2004 in the primaries, then Florida Senator Bob Graham was in the race. His wife is regal--tall, beautiful, always perfect and gracious in every way. I think there's part of the American public that wants there to be a queen. The public would have to tell you whether they're ready for somebody who sits on the floor playing Monopoly with the kids.

Anti-Immigration Movement Finds An Articulate Voice (WP)

By Steven A. Holmes

DOJ_NMG_0068731

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

STATE OF EMERGENCY

The Third World Invasion and Conquest of America

By Patrick J. Buchanan

Thomas Dunne Books, St. Martin's Press,

308 pp., $24.95

Man, is Pat Buchanan mad. He is virtually sputtering with rage. He can hardly contain himself. The subjects of his ire are the immigrants -- nearly 2 million a year, about 500,000 of them illegal -- crossing the country's borders and the bumbling or unpatriotic elite who are letting them in.

It's not just any immigrant that sets Buchanan's blood a-boiling. It's the brown, yellow and black ones that make up 90 percent of the new arrivals. While some people, including President Bush, may view these newcomers as decent, hardworking people whose desire is to provide for their families, Buchanan sees them as something much more sinister -- a threat to United States.

"We are witnessing how nations perish," he writes in his latest book, "State of Emergency: The Third World Invasion and Conquest of America."

"We are entered upon the final act of our civilization. The last scene is the deconstruction of the nations. The penultimate scene, now well underway, is the invasion unresisted."

His list of grievances is long -- and stark. The United States cannot absorb the sheer mass of migrants. They are driving down wages and ratcheting up crime. They are endangering the Republican Party and conservative, small-government ideology. They are threatening U.S. sovereignty. But, for Buchanan, perhaps the most unforgivable sin is that they challenge the supremacy of white European culture.

"Can anyone say today that we Americans are 'one united people?' " he writes. "We are no longer descended from the same ancestors. The European core of the country -- almost 95 percent of Americans as late as 1965 -- has fallen well below 70 percent and will be less than half the nation by 2050."

One has to give Buchanan credit. He is a muscular writer, fully in command of the English language he feels is under siege. He is adept at linking history, statistics and the writings of philosophers and economists to proffer forceful arguments.

His book crackles. Words leap off the page to bludgeon the reader to submit to his views. Analyzing the 1994 passage in California of Proposition 187 that ended welfare benefits to illegal immigrants, Buchanan thunders, "The voters of California were saying that no matter what ideas these illegal aliens brought with them, they were not Americans, they were not part of our nation, they did not belong here, they were not entitled to the benefits of American citizens, and they ought to go back where they came from."

Some books are enlightening, some exciting. This one is exhausting. After reading chapter after chapter of invective, rabid Buchanan-haters may long for a shower. Me? I need a nap.

Buchanan's stridency will tend to turn anyone who picks up "State of Emergency" into either a cheerleader or a debater. And there are a host of assertions in this work that are highly debatable.

In Buchanan's view, immigrants are unleashing a deadly reign of crime on America. While Latino gangs are a violent presence in some cities, most notably Los Angeles, the premise is questionable. After all, as the wave of immigrants has crested, overall violent crime rates have plunged. On a per capita basis, the number of rapes has dropped by 85 percent since the 1970s, robberies by 38 percent. We have the lowest homicide rate since the late 1960s. The murder rate was higher in the 1930s and 1940s -- a time of exceedingly low immigration -- than it is now.

Buchanan argues that today's immigrants maintain a much stronger grip on the culture and language of their homelands than that of previous waves. "There is little evidence that the scores of millions who have come in the last forty years from Asia, Africa and Latin America are assimilating as the European immigrants once did," he writes.

But what's his proof? Are today's immigrants really not assimilating? Did European immigrants meld into the American fabric as rapidly as is assumed in the gauzy and nostalgic view of earlier immigration? No one really knows. There is no hard census or other research data on the assimilation rates of these early immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0068732

Buchanan laments that "of the 9 million living in Los Angeles County, 5 million do not speak English at home." But no one can say with accuracy how many people spoke Italian or Yiddish or Polish at home in the 1920s -- or how long it took for that to stop. German was virtually the official language in Wisconsin, used in public schools, for decades before World War I. "There were more German-language newspapers then than there are Spanish-language newspapers now," said George Borjas, an immigration expert who Buchanan cites often in his book -- though not on this point.

Buchanan argues forcefully that immigration will tear the country apart. He is particularly worried that Mexicans -- the largest immigrant bloc -- are, in effect reconquistas, identifying more strongly with Mexico than with the United States, and bent on retaking the territories of Texas, California and the Southwest that were seized from Mexico in the 19th century. His evidence? The appearance of Mexican flags at rallies, and the writings of some Mexican American intellectuals longing for the establishment of Aztlan, an appendage of Mexico that runs from Texas to Oregon.

But given the opportunity for the first time to vote in last summer's Mexican elections -- a clear chance to show solidarity with Mexico -- only an estimated 41,000 Mexicans out of 4.1 million living here bothered to cast a ballot.

It's easy to quibble with Buchanan, but it would be a mistake to ignore him. New York Times columnist David Brooks posits that our political landscape is increasingly being defined as a fight between what he terms "progressive globalists" and "populist nationalists." The former are multilateral interventionists, placing great faith in market-oriented solutions and holding liberal social values. The latter are distrustful of multinational corporations, conservative in social values, wary at intervening in other countries and angry at immigration and the outsourcing of jobs.

Buchanan may be their most articulate spokesman. We would dismiss him and the anger embodied in "State of Emergency" at our peril.

Holmes is a deputy national editor of The Washington Post.

Your Vote Counts (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

BALLOT-FATIGUED CALIFORNIANS, who in six weeks face their third election in a year, can be forgiven if they feel left out of the action. Voters elsewhere will see brutal political warfare between Republicans and Democrats for control of Congress — but all seats here appear safe. The battle for Congress will not be decided in California.

Yet on Nov. 7, voters here will decide the shape of the state's finances and the health of its infrastructure for decades to come, and will set a course for leadership at a time of unprecedented growth and demographic change. Every election is touted as pivotal, but with an almost unfathomable $46 billion in bond measures on this ballot, and up to $3 billion annually in new taxes, it's hard to dismiss the coming vote as just another day at the ballot box.

Californians love direct democracy — and they couldn't care less about it. They have gone to the polls to recall the governor, limit the power of the Legislature and impose specific taxes to pay for new programs. And yet, participation in state elections has fallen dramatically since 1994, with turnout in the June primary a record low 33.6% of registered voters. There's a sense that Californians must fix the outrages perpetrated on them by Sacramento — or by their predecessors at the ballot box — but it's never quite clear how to do it.

In 2002, for example, voters approved $550 million a year for after-school programs. But to date, not a single dollar from the measure has been spent. In 2004, voters decided to fund a DNA databank of suspected felons, but there is now an unprecedented backlog of unprocessed DNA samples.

How is a voter to wade through 13 ballot measures, seven statewide races and a seat on the obscure state Board of Equalization without fear of unforeseen consequences? There is no good answer. Ballot propositions, in particular, have become so bloated and misleading that they often defy understanding.

But if a newspaper editorial board is good for anything, it's to wade through the political muck of campaign season and identify some of the more important issues and principles at stake. At the same time, no list of principles can apply universally. With candidates, for example, it's not enough to know where they stand on the issues. A voter also must have some faith in the person's ability to inspire confidence and act with integrity.

DOJ_NMG_0068733

With ballot measures, the examination must go beyond the strategy of an impulse buyer at Target. It's not enough to ask "Do we want this?" or even "Can we afford this?" Each new bond or tax that promises new revenue also threatens to constrain the budget or harm the business climate.

This page, and voters, also must be increasingly skeptical of the sock-the-villains proposition craze — the trend of matching popular causes with unpopular deep pockets. The day may soon come when Californians vote themselves an afternoon coffee break, courtesy of Big Tobacco or Big Oil. Initiatives shouldn't be a form of communal extortion. We encourage you to consider each measure's merits. Enjoy your chance to pick your representatives — and to do a little legislating of your own while you're at it.

Corporate America Takes On Spitzerism (WSJ)

By Kimberley A. Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer garnered a stunning 81% of the vote in his primary for the New York governorship two weeks ago, riding high on his reputation as Chief Persecutor of Wall Street. It was the sort of result that should have made grown CEOs cry.

Still, there was some reason for good cheer in the business community: namely, a race on the other side of the country. In Washington, a relatively unknown property-rights lawyer, John Groen, challenged the activist chief justice of the state Supreme Court. It was the most hotly contested judicial contest in state history -- highest profile, highest dollar, highest stakes. Mr. Groen lost last week, but barely. Across the country, incumbent judges -- who are rarely challenged, much less seriously so -- began shaking in their robes.

Call it business's revenge, or better yet, business's new political strategy -- one that may prove a rare bright point for conservatives in upcoming elections. Somewhere among the Spitzer campaigns, the endless trial-lawyer suits, and the adverse verdicts in state courts, the corporate world realized it needed to address root causes. Local chambers of commerce and tort-reform groups encouraged businesses to start putting some skin into state elections.

This year, that effort has given rise to a frontal assault aiming to reshape courts and law enforcement offices across the nation. If business coalitions have their way, Michigan, Ohio, Wisconsin and New Mexico will not be the playgrounds of proto-Eliot Spitzers. Nor will the courts of Georgia, Kentucky, Alabama, Michigan, Oregon, Ohio and Illinois make Stephen Breyer proud. The money underlines the commitment: In 2002, spending on state Supreme Court races was $29 million; by 2004 it had jumped to $42 million; this year it's expected to set records.

If there's a godfather of this movement it might be John Engler, who realized early in his 1990s career as Michigan governor that tort reform didn't count for much if state courts routinely struck down new laws. (Mr. Engler is currently a director of Dow Jones, which publishes this newspaper.) As governor, he made judges a top priority, one reason why Michigan's high court is today a national model of judicial restraint. Mr. Engler carried that philosophy to his presidency of the National Association of Manufacturers.

Last year, NAM launched the American Justice Partnership, an umbrella organization that brings together a mindboggling array of national and state organizations -- industry groups, chambers, think tanks, citizens' groups -- fighting for legal reform. "Legal reform has become a full contact sport," says Steve Hantler, assistant general counsel of Daimler-Chrysler and chairman of AJP. "More business leaders and consumer groups have realized this fight is in the political arena, and you can't leave that arena to the trial bar."

Plaintiffs' attorneys have been in this game a long time, knowing the value of sympathetic judges and meddlesome AGs (who often throw them business). They've perfected a fund-raising machine, drumming up individual donations via firms, and often tap this network to stand for office themselves. Reform groups are borrowing these tactics, rallying more companies to donate to campaigns, making the public aware of races, and also setting up political action committees designed to solicit and bundle money for elections.

In Washington, Mr. Groen's bid was launched with the financial backing of a state builder's association weary of the high court's anti-property-rights bent. But he also got a boost from some $350,000 of ads against his opponent, financed by a new outfit called Americans Tired of Lawsuit Abuse, a national PAC that counts the American Tort Reform Association as a donor. In total, outside groups spent more than $1.5 million on the Groen campaign, or about three times that spent by defenders of Chief Justice Gerry Alexander.

DOJ_NMG_0068734

Mr. Groen still lost, which is partially a reflection of the difficulty of ousting a sitting judge or a popular incumbent AG. It also underscores the challenges facing the business community in making any of this work. But several key victories serve as inspiration. One notable example was Michigan's 2002 AG race, in which Republican Mike Cox, a state prosecutor, ran against state Sen. Gary Peters, a friend of the trial bar. In the final days, the Michigan Chamber dropped a wad of money on a TV ad supporting Mr. Cox. He won by a mere 5,000 votes, and no one doubts the ad put him over the top. This year, his opponent is a trial lawyer, and the business community isn't taking any chances.

Democrats currently hold 29 AG seats, and business leaders hope to pick up three or four seats for the Republicans this year. While that would hardly be a landslide, it would be significant given the GOP's larger troubles. Plus, flipping AG seats is a double victory: It stops a Spitzer-like prosecutor and takes away a popular platform to run for higher office.

The courts project is harder, and longer term: Incumbents are tough to unseat, individual victories don't often lead to majorities, and the public has historically showed little interest in judicial races. Though, as John Groen's razor margin shows, the times are a-changin'.

The corporate world is still taking its usual interest in congressional elections, though here too it's upping the stakes in select races. Iowa's open congressional seat offers a case study, where Republican businessman Mike Whalen is running against Democratic trial lawyer Bruce Braley. Reform groups view this as a chance to beat a prominent plaintiffs' attorney, and to do so by making his career a liability.

Ads against Mr. Braley have focused largely on his stint as head of the Iowa Trial Lawyers' Association and his lifetime of suing doctors and companies. The tort bar has sensed the threat, and the Association of Trial Lawyers of America has stepped up as one of Mr. Braley's chief donors. The race is fast becoming a referendum on tort lawyers.

In a sense, Eliot Spitzer's success might turn out to be a net positive for the business community. Back in April, the notorious AG went to Michigan to campaign against Mike Cox. The visit struck a nerve. Mr. Cox has raised more money than any AG candidate in state history.

Ms. Strassel is a member of the Journal's editorial board.

Producer Accuses Clintons Of 'Looting' (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

A Hollywood producer who sought to hire President Clinton as a "rainmaker" has told a California court the former president and his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, cheated him out of a multimillion-dollar Internet venture and he wants his money back.

In a complaint to be heard today in Superior Court in Los Angeles, Peter F. Paul says the scheme was orchestrated by Mrs. Clinton, who convinced him to spend $1.9 million on campaign fundraisers prior to her November 2000 election to the Senate and then reneged on promises to help him on the Internet deal.

The 43-page complaint, which also accuses Mr. Clinton and others involved in Mrs. Clinton's "New York Senate 2000" campaign of taking part in the conspiracy, seeks $30 million in stock losses and $1.9 million in cash. The complaint is part of a pending lawsuit against Mr. Clinton and will be heard by Superior Court Judge Aurelio N. Munoz.

In a telephone interview from his California home, Paul, a convicted felon, said the Clintons "looted" his business to generate the largest contribution to Mrs. Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign in New York. Describing himself as a "disgruntled business associate" and not a "disgruntled contributor," he said the Clintons reneged on promises they made that Mr. Clinton would work with him after he left the White House.

He said he was "cajoled and then coerced" by Mr. Clinton as "an erstwhile future business partner" to make expenditures to benefit the president and his wife.

DOJ_NMG_0068735

Paul produced and underwrote an August 2000 fundraiser called the "Gala Hollywood Farewell Salute to President William Jefferson Clinton," attended by numerous celebrities, including John Travolta, Brad Pitt, Whoopi Goldberg, Patrick Swayze, Michael Bolton, Diana Ross, Patti LaBelle and Melissa Etheridge.

Money raised at the all-star event went to Mrs. Clinton's successful campaign.

The Clintons' attorney, David Kendall, did not return calls for comment.

In January, the Federal Election Commission (FEC) said Mrs. Clinton's campaign committee, New York Senate 2000, underreported the cash it received from the gala. The committee agreed to pay a $35,000 fine. The committee also agreed to amend public reports to show that Paul's share of production costs for the gala were understated by $721,895.

The FEC ruling came after a four-year investigation and a separate Justice Department probe. An FBI affidavit in the case said costs of the August 2000 gala actually exceeded $1.2 million, but required FEC disclosure forms "incorrectly disclosed that the cost of the event was only $523,000."

The affidavit said the true cost of the event was "deliberately understated" to increase the amount of funds available to the Clinton campaign. Mrs. Clinton's campaign treasurer, Andrew Grossman, admitted in December he filed false FEC reports to hide more than $720,000 in Paul's contributions.

According to the lawsuit against Mr. Clinton, Paul said the former president agreed to work with him after leaving office as a "rainmaker" for Stan Lee Media Inc., a company Paul founded with "Spider-Man" creator Stan Lee. The suit said the deal involved $10 million in stock, $5 million in cash and a $1 million donation to the ex-president's foundation.

The deal, according to the suit, was based on a pledge by Paul to produce and underwrite the largest fundraiser of Mrs. Clinton's 2000 campaign. Stan Lee Media, which held the rights to Spider-Man, the Incredible Hulk and other comic book characters, was a publicly traded company with a market capitalization of $350 million.

The suit accuses Mr. Clinton of fraud and deceit in diverting a key investment away from Paul's company, causing it to fail and ending any chance for the $200 million Internet business to move forward. Also named in the suit are Mrs. Clinton's former campaign-finance director, David Rosen, and James Levin, a close friend of Mr. Clinton tagged by the former president as his agent to work with Paul.

Trial in the suit is set for March.

The complaint details what Paul said was Mrs. Clinton's role in convincing him to contribute cash to her campaign and to support misleading pre-election statements she made saying she would accept no money from him and that he had not donated to her campaign.

After the November 2000 election, Paul said Mr. Clinton went into business with Paul's Japanese partner and largest investor, Tendo Oto, president of Venture Soft of Japan. He said Mr. Clinton used "the trappings of the White House" to interfere in a $5 million investment promised to him by Mr. Oto.

The complaint said Stan Lee Media collapsed when Mr. Oto was convinced by Mr. Clinton to renege on his investment promise.

In 2004, the Clintons lost an appeal to the California Supreme Court to have Paul's suit dismissed, but Mrs. Clinton was removed as a co-defendant. Mrs. Clinton remains as a material witness and co-conspirator in the suit, and Judge Munoz has said she can not avoid testifying.

Paul pleaded guilty last year to one count of violating Securities and Exchange Commission regulations in manipulating the price of Stan Lee stock to save the company. In the late 1970s, he pleaded guilty to conspiring to defraud the Cuban government of $8.75 million in a black-market coffee transaction. In the 1980s, he pleaded guilty to possessing cocaine with intent to distribute and spent 40 months in prison.

New Premium When Employees Pay For Health Care, The Boss Pays Too (WSJ)

By Sarah Rubenstein

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

FORT WAYNE, Ind. -- Last year Russ Moore Transmission Inc. adopted a health-insurance plan in tune with the "consumer driven" philosophy President Bush has been touting. The plan requires employees to pay as much as $5,250 a year in medical costs out of their own money before insurance kicks in, with the goal of turning them into savvy shoppers for doctors and drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0068736

The new strategy has motivated some workers to research what they are paying for medical care. One found an over-the-counter replacement for a more expensive brand-name heartburn drug. That is good news for Nick Bond, who runs the business and had suspected some employees were overusing medical care because they didn't have to pay for much of it themselves.

The bad news: The employees' research often consists of going to Mr. Bond and asking for his help, even after they have had 19 months to get familiar with the plan. At one point, he and his office manager had to hole themselves up in their offic es for about two weeks developing a spreadsheet with price information on 32 drugs.

Mr. Bond's experience suggests that although information about the price and quality of health care remains sketchy, the president's push to make the health-care market more like the market for other services can change consumers' behavior. However, some managers have to turn themselves into instant experts both on health care and on the law. Mr. Bond knows about a transmission rebuilder's heartburn, a technician's blood-pressure medication and a visit to the emergency room by a mechanic's daughter. If he uses health information in firing or demoting an employee -- or is perceived to do so -- he might be in for a lawsuit.

"There are things I'm not supposed to know -- but I know," says Mr. Bond, who is part-owner and general manager of the company previously run by his father-in-law.

Under most health-insurance plans, once employees pay their share of monthly premiums, their upfront out-of-pocket costs are at a relatively manageable level. Those with family coverage pay on average the first $700 or so of costs themselves -- what is called a deductible -- and modest co-payments for visiting a doctor or buying drugs.

Consumer-driven plans usually have a much higher deductible. Many of these plans also come with a sweetener: some kind of account to use for medical expenses. A popular option is the tax-advantaged "health savings account," a Republican initiative that was passed by Congress in 2003. As of January, nearly 3.2 million people were enrolled in insurance plans tha t enable them to open HSAs, according to the trade group America's Health Insurance Plans.

The health plan at Russ Moore Transmission, which has 34 full-time employees at three locations in and around Fort Wayne, is typical of the consumer-driven genre. The deductible for care in the insurance company's network is $2,650 for individual employees and $5,250 for those with family coverage. (Preventive care is covered regardless of whether people have hit the deductible.) Employees get a head start in paying their bills because the company contributes its own money each year into employees' health savings accounts -- $700 for an individual and $1,350 for a family.

Employees can add their own pretax money to the account, up to the amount of the deductible. Funds in the account carry over from year to year, like a 401(k) retirement account. The money can grow and be withdrawn tax-free so long as it is used for qualified medical expenses.

With this setup, many health-care decisions have a big impact on the pocketbook for Mr. Bond's workers. Nearly every pill or test can be a household budget buster. The lowest-paid full-time Russ Moore Transmission workers earn about $25,000 a year.

While some information is available on the Web and the company has computers in its break area, Mr. Bond estimates that fewer than half of his workers have Internet connections at home. When faced with big bills, the first instinct for many is to catch the boss as he walks by.

Detailed Information

When Mr. Bond joined Russ Moore Transmission in 1998, he had access to detailed information on employees' medical spending. At the time Russ Moore shouldered as much as $7,500 of the medical bills for each covered person before the insurer started paying. Mr. Bond could see how much each person was spending and what procedures he or she was getting.

A few employees' family members always seemed to be using the latest brand-name drugs or going to doctor after doctor. That frustrated Mr. Bond, who says he saw the family members as hypochondriacs. He calculated that he was spending an average of $2.80 an hour on employees' health insurance, in addition to their wages. He says he resisted approaching individu al employees to discuss spending. "That's a dangerous road to walk down, I always felt," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0068737

In 2001, Mr. Bond's insurer stopped selling his plan to businesses of his size. He went with another insurer that paid the bills from the start. That insurer didn't provide Mr. Bond access to spending data.

As Russ Moore Transmission's health-insurance premiums climbed each year at double-digit rates, Mr. Bond tried harder to keep costs in check. He urged workers at company meetings to buy generic drugs where possible over costlier alternatives. He reminded workers to use the emergency room for emergencies only. The point didn't seem to sink in. Mr. Bond thought that was because employees lacked a financial incentive to change their habits.

In mid-2004, Mr. Bond decided to check out health savings accounts, an option created by a federal law the previous December. He combed through news articles and talked to his insurance broker, George Danusis, a big believer in the concept.

As the end of the year approached, Mr. Bond learned he would have to pay an extra 29% to renew his employees' health plan, which already cost about $175,000 a year. The company's annual revenue is a little less than $5 million. By switching to a plan with much higher deductibles and the savings accounts, he could keep his costs flat. Mr. Bond believed the consumer-driven plan would give employees a powerful incentive to cut back on unnecessary spending.

In December, he gathered his workers on chairs and benches near one of their work stations. Using an overhead projector, he showed that if the company were to keep its current insurance plan, its costs would rise about $165 a family each month. He warned that without a new approach employees with coverage would have to bear some or all of that additional cost themselves. He flashed the "Proposed Solution": high-deductible coverage and health savings accounts.

"There was a lot of deer-in-the-headlights as they tried to assimilate it," Mr. Bond recalls.

He didn't fully realize what he was in for until he returned to work in January after a vacation. Questions came rolling in from people such as Mike Pitcher, 55, who specializes in rebuilding transmissions of General Motors cars. His wife takes seven regular medications and he takes three. Out-of-pocket expenses for his wife's drugs were about to increase to around $400 a month.

Richard Harlow, a health-insurance broker in Reston, Va., says several of his small-business clients have found health savings accounts too much of a hassle because of all the questions from employees and other administrative burdens. They have reverted to more familiar lower-deductible plans. "We keep saying to our clients, 'Don't answer those questions -- that's what you're paying us to do,' " Mr. Harlow says. But some small-business owners don't want to seem unknowledgeable or unconcerned, he says.

Mr. Bond decided he should help his employees. He felt responsible for their problems, since he was the one who ultimately decided to go with the new plan. Also, he had learned repeatedly that stress in his employees' lives -- especially financial stress -- had a direct impact on their effectiveness on the job. He had helped on personal issues before, even lending money.

He told employees that if they let him look at their prescription information, he could research lower-cost options for them. Over a few days, about 10 people approached Mr. Bond and took him up on the offer.

For the next two weeks or so, Mr. Bond and Connie Mead, his office manager, spent hours in their offices, clicking on pharmacy Web sites and developing a spreadsheet with price information. He researched cost-saving ideas such as generic drugs, over-the-counter pills and bulk buying.

"Everything except for what absolutely had to be done ground to a halt while we dealt with it," Ms. Mead recalls.

Kyle Miller, a 26-year-old transmission rebuilder, pulled Mr. Bond aside and asked for advice on reducing the cost of Protonix, a heartburn medication sold by Wyeth. Under the previous plan, the co-payment for Protonix was $30. If Mr. Miller bought the drug under the new plan, he expected his costs to rise far above that.

The two men walked over to one of the shop's public computers and Mr. Bond clicked on the Walgreens Web site. He showed Mr. Miller how to research alternatives. Based on the research and feedback from his doctor, Mr. Miller decided to switch to a less expensive over-the-counter pill.

Mr. Bond "just seemed like he knew a lot about looking for, not necessarily deals, but how to get what you're taking for a different cost," Mr. Miller recalls. "I really don't care who knows what I'm taking."

DOJ_NMG_0068738

Despite the savings, the new insurance plan has been costly for Mr. Miller. His wife gave birth this year and the couple is struggling to pay off the roughly $5,000 they owed. They cancelled their home Internet access in anticipation of the birth and have switched to store-brand cola.

About a month into the new health plan, Ms. Mead, the office manager, cursed as she opened mail at her dining-room table. She and her husband, Rick, were going to have to pay $555 for his recent abdominal ultrasound exam. Mr. Mead, a 48-year-old transmission rebuilder at the company, had been undergoing tests for abdominal pain. He suspected he would need his gallbladder removed, meaning bigger expenses were to come.

The next day, Ms. Mead told Mr. Bond. He wanted to know whether the Meads could save money depending on where they had the surgery.

Ms. Mead was curious, too. Though the Meads moved ahead with Mr. Mead's procedure as planned, she researched prices for the ultrasound, a second test and the surgery at three medical facilities. Her conclusion: The differences were substantial. Her research showed the family could have saved $173 on the ultrasound if Mr. Mead had gone elsewhere. Mr. Bond has subsequently used the information to encourage workers to shop around.

Mr. Mead says he believed Mr. Bond was only trying to help, but he wasn't so comfortable with his wife's sharing the details of his gallbladder removal with the boss. "I don't talk about my sex life," Mr. Mead says. "Why does he have to know about my medical conditions?"

Mr. Bond says he makes it a rule to discuss workers' health issues only if they come to him first. If they give him copies of documents, he often shreds them once he is finished so they aren't mixed up with other employee records or viewed by someone who shouldn't be looking. Kirk Nahra, a lawyer at Wiley Rein & Fielding LLP in Washington, says employers have to defend themselves against the risk of being sued by a worker who discloses health problems and is later fired.

Although Mr. Bond has advised employees that they can also get help from the company's insurance broker, many continue to come to him. One morning this summer, he walked into the shop. Before he could put down his briefcase and keys, Mr. Pitcher approached him. The GM transmission rebuilder had followed his boss's advice to reduce his drug bills by asking for free samples. Now he handed over a letter from the insurer denying coverage for Vytorin, a cholesterol medication that cost around $100 a month. The denial meant Mr. Pitcher would have to pay for the drug out of pocket even if he hit his annual deductible. Mr. Bond offered to help him sort out the problem.

Mr. Bond faxed the letter to his insurance broker's office. By lunchtime, he was on the phone with someone at the broker's office who said the letter meant that Mr. Pitcher would need his doctor to put him on a different drug or justify the prescription to the insurer.

Mr. Pitcher, who has worked at the company for 30 years, says he often prefers talking to Mr. Bond because it disrupts his job to call the broker's office, explain his problem and handle the documents. "I don't think I should have to deal with the insurance company and all that crap," Mr. Pitcher says. "Why not just take it to Nick and have him fax it and be done with it? It's easier."

Widespread Outage Spurs Coup Rumors In Pakistan (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Sept. 24 -- Panicky rumors of a coup swept through Pakistan on Sunday after a power outage interrupted national television broadcasts and later plunged much of the country into darkness.

With the president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, away on an extended trip to the United States and Canada at a time of regional tensions and growing insurgency in neighboring Afghanistan, many Pakistanis speculated that he had been overthrown in absentia.

The chairman of the national power administration, Tariq Hamid, said at a 10 p.m. news conference in Lahore that the outage was caused by technical problems and that no sabotage had been involved.

Information Ministry officials, accompanying Musharraf on a visit to New York, also announced Sunday night that the president was "in good health."

DOJ_NMG_0068739

Islamabad, the capital, was quiet late into the night, and there were no signs of military vehicles or troops in the streets. There were also no reports of unusual military movements in Rawalpindi, a city near Islamabad where the armed forces are headquartered.

But for hours, with power flickering on and off in Islamabad and half the country still without electricity by late evening, rumors continued to swirl of a possible coup against Musharraf, an army general who seized power from Pakistan's last elected leader in 1999.

"I have been flooded with calls all evening. Everyone wants to know if something is amiss. It shows you how on edge people are," said Mushahid Hussain, a senator from the ruling Pakistan Muslim League faction who is close to Musharraf.

Hussain said he had received dozens of queries by cellphone and text messaging from provincial authorities, human rights groups, Pakistanis living abroad, and even from officials traveling with the president. He said he told them everything was fine.

Rifaat Hussain, a Pakistani defense and security expert, said he, too, had received numerous calls from friends who were worried about a possible coup. He said he immediately contacted government sources, who "vociferously denied" there was any problem.

"So many people have cellphones now that rumors can snowball, and such a situation also taps into people's anxieties," he said. Many Pakistanis thought immediately of last week's coup in Thailand, Hussain said, and remembered how previous Pakistani leaders had been "unceremoniously removed."

Pakistan has had a history of military intervention in civilian politics ever since it was founded as a Muslim democracy in 1947. While elections have been held regularly, civilian rule has been repeatedly interrupted by the army or other non-elected figures.

Musharraf, 63, who is chief of Pakistan's army staff, would be highly unlikely to fall to a military coup, although it has been reported that some of the senior army commanders, who operate as a consensual policy group within the armed forces, are conservative Muslims who disagree with his moderate religious policies.

But Musharraf has lost considerable domestic support for a variety of reasons, including his refusal to relinquish his military uniform while in office, his retreat on promises to expand women's and religious rights, and his use of aggressive military tactics to solve problems in volatile border regions.

While in the United States this week, Musharraf has made several statements that could reflect poorly on Pakistan's military leadership and autonomy. He said a senior U.S. official had threatened to bomb Pakistan "back to the Stone Age" if it did not cooperate fully with the United States against al-Qaeda and Afghanistan's Taliban government after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Musharraf's comment suggested that he had yielded to intense U.S. pressure in deciding to turn against the Taliban and to help in the hunt for al-Qaeda, decisions that many Pakistani Islamic leaders have long criticized.

"Musharraf is blindly toeing the American line, thereby causing irreparable damage to Pakistan and its image in the world," said Khurshid Ahmad, a scholar and senator from the religious Jamaat-e-Islami party. "For his efforts, he gets a pat on the back while they are twisting his arm."

A second sensitive issue raised during Musharraf's visit to Washington concerned the activities of Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters along the border with Afghanistan. Earlier this month, Musharraf announced that he had made a peace pact with Taliban groups inside Pakistan after thousands of Pakistani troops failed to quell them.

President Bush praised Musharraf's efforts this week but insisted he would send U.S. forces into Pakistan to track down al-Qaeda leaders if necessary. This is a sore point for the Pakistani military, and Musharraf has always insisted he would not allow it.

On Sunday night, after power had been restored in most areas, news stations broadcast footage of cities and towns lighted by candles, and messages crawling across TV screens repeated that Musharraf was in good health and that the government situation was normal.

Hamid, the chairman of the power administration, apologized for the inconvenience and the fact that the lengthy power outage had contributed to "baseless stories." News reports said some civilians had protested outside power offices and attacked one, but there were no other reports of violence.

DOJ_NMG_0068740

Hamas Says It's Serious About Coalition (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 25, 2006

Hamas said Sunday it will resume talks on building a governing coalition with moderate President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement, but the militant Islamic group gave no indication of any move toward compromise on recognizing Israel.

The announcement of a resumption in talks came after an angry standoff with Fatah over the recognition issue and a warning by Abbas that the talks were going nowhere.

Western nations cut off aid after the hard-line Hamas won elections to take control of the Palestinian government. The West says the Palestinian government must meet three demands — recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous agreements.

A coalition deal between Hamas and Fatah, reached earlier this month, was vague on the recognition of Israel, and both sides have since offered different interpretations.

Abbas' aides say Hamas agreed to honor all the agreements of previous Palestinian governments, which would imply recognition of Israel since the Palestine Liberation Organization and Israel exchanged letters of mutual recognition in 1993.

Hamas insists it was much less specific and agreed only to support those PLO commitments that serve the Palestinian interest.

Abbas will meet Tuesday in Gaza with Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas to try to rescue the coalition agreement, said Saeb Erekat, an Abbas aide.

Erekat said it is time for Haniyeh to adopt clear positions.

"It is not about games of words, it's not about intentions, it's about a clear-cut commitment," Erekat said. "He must realize that any government must accept the commitments and obligations of the PLO and previous governments, including the letter of mutual recognition."

Haniyeh said Sunday that Hamas is still interested in forming a broader government. Hamas has ruled alone since March after winning parliamentary elections, and hopes it can end the crippling international aid boycott by bringing in Fatah.

"We are going to resume talks on the formation of a national coalition government," Haniyeh said in a statement. "We have serious intentions to make it succeed, and we hope that the talks will resume soon."

Haniyeh did not, however, indicate whether Hamas would compromise. Only two days earlier, Haniyeh said he would never head a coalition that recognizes Israel.

Despite their differences, Hamas and Abbas appear to have little choice but to govern together.

Hamas needs Fatah to win international recognition and restore foreign aid. During its six months in power, Hamas has been largely unable to pay the salaries of 165,000 civil servants, the backbone of the Palestinian labor force. The Palestinian Authority has been teetering on the brink of collapse, increasingly unable to provide services.

Abbas could fire the current government and install a new one, but the new government would then require the approval of parliament, which is controlled by Hamas. Early elections are seen as an unpopular option, and there are no guarantees Fatah would win.

In Gaza City, meanwhile, two dozen Islamic militant gunmen threatened to attack any coalition that recognized Israel.

"We will fight against it by all means, and we will deal with it as an entity linked to the occupation," said one of the gunmen, who would only identify himself by his nom de guerre, Abu Abir.

The gunmen, who gathered outside a mosque, represent only a small splinter group. However, it marked the first time Palestinian militants said publicly they were prepared to attack government officials.

The threats came at a time of growing tensions between Hamas and Fatah, particularly in Gaza, where some Fatah members accuse Hamas of involvement in the slaying of a Fatah-allied security chief last week.

War Turns The Tide For Israeli Settlers (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068741

AMONA, West Bank -- The movement to expand Jewish settlements in the West Bank, which only a few months ago appeared to be a divided, waning political force, is experiencing a revival after a summer of war that caused many Israelis to question the wisdom of abandoning more territory.

Little more than a year ago, then-Prime Minister Ariel Sharon withdrew all Jewish settlers and Israeli troops from the Gaza Strip. After Sharon's debilitating stroke in January, his deputy, Ehud Olmert, won national elections in March on a promise to evacuate dozens of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and to uproot the smaller, unauthorized communities known as outposts in a bid to define Israel's final borders.

But after a month-long war in southern Lebanon and as sporadic fighting continues in Gaza, a highly unpopular Olmert has put his West Bank withdrawal plan on hold. His government has stepped up construction in the large settlement blocs, including areas the Bush administration has warned Israel against developing, and the West Bank settlement population of a quarter-million people is growing.

"This state does not operate by a policy," said Yehuda Yifrach, 30, who still lives with his wife, Ayelet, and three children on this windblown hilltop even though in February Israeli military bulldozers demolished the shipping container that was their home. "They only go by the polls at the time."

The settlers' change of fortune stems from Israel's conflicts in the Gaza Strip and southern Lebanon, regions the country had occupied and abandoned in the recent past. Islamic gunmen staged cross-border raids from those areas this summer, capturing three Israeli soldiers who are still being held.

Some Israelis are drawing lessons from the war that have helped vindicate the settlers, whose large financial claim on the national treasury and strident opposition to an independent state for the Palestinians in Gaza and the West Bank have angered many here over the years. Israel occupied those regions in the 1967 Middle East war.

"The Lebanon war may have bought them time," said Dror Etkes of Peace Now, a group that opposes Israel's settlement policy. "But the demographics and the overarching view of an Israeli majority about what the state should look like has not changed. So neither has the precarious nature of the settlements."

In evacuating the Gaza settlements last year, Sharon said he was seeking to define more defensible borders and protect Israel's Jewish majority by jettisoning the strip's 1.4 million Palestinians, who might someday demand the right to vote in Israel if not given a state of their own.

Soon after, Sharon, Olmert and others quit the Likud party, leaving the settlers' most powerful sponsor in shambles. The new party they founded, Kadima, easily won the most seats in the March elections, while Likud finished tied for a distant third.

But guerrillas in Gaza have continued to pepper southern Israel with crude rockets, and the radical Islamic movement Hamas, whose stronghold is Gaza, has been elected to lead the Palestinian government. Hamas does not recognize Israel's right to exist even within its pre-1967 borders, nor does Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite Muslim militia whose seizure of two Israeli soldiers on July 12 touched off the recent war.

"The settlements are Israel's anchor in these places," said Effie Eitam, a legislator from the National Union, the settlers' political arm, who was injured in Amona in February when settlers clashed with police. "Israel is about to review its entire defense doctrine," he added, "and most Israelis understand it is time to rethink the whole paradigm of giving up land for things less certain."

A poll published Thursday in the Haaretz newspaper showed Olmert's job approval rating at 22 percent and indicated Kadima would lose 13 of its 29 parliamentary seats if elections were held today. Meanwhile, Likud, led by former prime minister Binyamin Netanyahu, would double its strength in the legislature to 24 seats, making it the largest faction.

But Shaul Goldstein, a settler leader who is identified with the movement's pragmatic wing, said he expects Olmert to resurrect the West Bank withdrawal plan as soon as he determines that prospects are slim for successful peace talks with the Palestinians or Syria.

In the meantime, he said, the movement will consider whether to form a new party to influence the withdrawal plan or to fight it by other means. The hard-line wing, embodied by Eitam, has proposed more-radical options that appear to have little chance of winning public support.

DOJ_NMG_0068742

During a memorial service this month for a soldier killed in Lebanon, Eitam, a former general who commanded a brigade in Gaza, told the gathering that "we will have to expel a large majority of the Arabs of Judea and Samaria," using Israeli terminology for the West Bank.

"We are still very divided," said Goldstein, who is chairman of the Gush Etzion settlement bloc. "The whole right-wing movement in Israel is frustrated, even though many in the left wing can now see that our warnings about withdrawing from Gaza were not simply propaganda."

A state commission last year identified more than 100 unauthorized outposts in the West Bank and Gaza before its evacuation. Unlike larger Jewish settlements in the territories -- all of which are deemed illegal under international law -- the outposts were built without the explicit approval of the Israeli government.

Outposts are usually no more than a few shipping containers and trailers that often expand the boundaries of established settlements to neighboring hilltops. Many of them, including Amona, are built on private Palestinian land.

Sharon promised the Bush administration that he would raze about two dozen outposts erected since he took office in March 2001, although none has been dismantled to date. Less than a month after taking over from Sharon, Olmert ordered Israeli soldiers and border police to remove nine trailers from this outpost. Pro-settlement demonstrators pelted the soldiers with rocks, sand and paint; scores of people were injured. The rest of Amona was left standing.

Last week, Defense Minister Amir Peretz ordered the military to raze 47 illegal buildings in some West Bank outposts, which Peace Now says contain thousands of illegal structures. The order, which has yet to be carried out, also called for the demolition of 39 buildings that Israel says the Palestinians constructed illegally.

At the same time, Olmert has this month alone advertised for bids to build 854 new housing units in West Bank settlements, most of them in the large blocs he intends to keep. The construction runs counter to the U.S.-backed peace blueprint known as the "road map," which Olmert says he supports as the best way to reach an agreement with the Palestinians.

In addition to the new housing, a large Israeli police headquarters has been nearly completed on a parcel of land east of Jerusalem where the Bush administration has long opposed any Israeli construction. Senior U.S. officials have warned that building in the so-called E-1 area would cut off the southern West Bank from economic centers in the north and further complicate the creation of a coherent Palestinian state.

"No settlement will be dismantled until we get legitimacy for the settlement blocs," said Otniel Schneller, a Kadima lawmaker and settler involved in planning the West Bank withdrawal. "The Americans' lack of flexibility is now causing this stalemate. If they would say yes to the settlement blocs, then there would be areas that we could develop and other areas we could not. If the U.S. does not understand this, the government will be in a stalemate."

Stewart Tuttle, spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Tel Aviv, said the United States does not have "a separate policy for this or that settlement, or this or that area. Our policy is the same across the board. Israel, like the Palestinians, has obligations under the road map. Israel's is to cease settlement activity and dismantle illegal outposts."

In Amona, the structure that was to have been the outpost's first concrete house sits unfinished, the work frozen. The road remains unpaved, and the 35 families here remain uncertain whether to develop their hilltop or prepare to abandon it.

In front of a trailer, the wood frame for a swing set is taking shape alongside a barbecue and a baby carriage. Moti and Yael, a husband and wife who declined to give their last name, said the new playground for their three children was a step toward moving ahead with a life that has been in a kind of limbo for months.

Yael, who teaches high school English in the adjacent settlement of Ofra, predicted that the West Bank withdrawal would resurface soon. She said a "left-wing" friend from Haifa, the coastal city pounded by Hezbollah rockets during the war, already wants Olmert to dust off his plan.

"This settlement has a feel of being stuck," said Yael, 33. "But things change quickly here. Soon the country will forget the war."

International Investors See More Opportunities Than Risk In Postwar Israel (WSJ)

By Michael Corkery

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068743

JERUSALEM -- These days, Israel is wracked by investigations and hand-wringing over who is to blame for the apparent missteps in its recent war against Hezbollah. It is frustrated by its simmering conflict with the Palestinians and harbors fears about a nuclear Iran.

But there's one symbol of postwar pride that has emerged not from the battlefield, but from the boardroom. Warren Buffett's decision to buy an 80% stake in Iscar Metalworking Cos. -- a closely held maker of metal-cutting tools and blades -- is regarded here as proof that Israel remains a good place to do business. It was the first time that Mr. Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. purchased a company with a headquarters and main operations outside the U.S.

Hundreds of executives and politicians packed the King David Hotel in Jerusalem last week to celebrate the $4 billion acquisition, announced in May. "Some Americans have come to the Middle East looking for oil. We came to the Middle East looking for brains, and we stopped at Israel," Mr. Buffett said to applause. He said he is looking at other possible investments in Israel, shrugging off concerns about the country's security.

But Israel increasingly is forced to balance its fight against Islamic militants with efforts to preserve its world-class economy.

Mr. Buffett isn't the only bullish investor here. Hewlett-Packard announced amid the war on July 25 that it was buying Mercury Interactive Corp., a tech company with a sizable operation in Israel -- for $4.5 billion. Days later, SanDisk Corp. of Milpitas, Calif., said it was buying msystems Ltd., an Israeli-based supplier of data-storage technology.

Overall, Israel's economy proved pretty resilient during the war, considering that rockets rained down on the country for several weeks.

Israel's gross domestic product, a broad measure of economic output, is expected to rise by about 4.6% this year, about 0.8 percentage point less than what was forecast before the war, according to the Bank of Israel. Much of this loss was due to a slowdown in Israel's tourism industry and some slowing in manufacturing in the north of Israel, where many of the Hezbollah rockets fell. The economic aftermath was different than in past conflicts, such as the period that followed the 1973 war with Syria and Egypt, which some Israelis call the "lost decade," of sky-high inflation and huge government deficits. The most-recent Palestinian uprising, which started in 2000, combined with the bust of Israel's tech sector and a world-wide economy downturn, plunged Israel into a painful slump. "When you look at those historic episodes and you compare it with the last war you realize, at least, in the economic front we did quite well," says Rafi Melnick, dean of the Lauder School of Government, Diplomacy and Strategy in Herzliya.

To be sure, Israel's economic picture during the latest war may have been buoyed by the overall health of the global economy. Today, Israel's fortunes are tied much closer to those of the world economy, after having evolved into a leading exporter of high-tech products and services as well as an incubator of entrepreneurs.

Many believe the groundwork for today's economy was laid by Benjamin Netanyahu who became finance minister in 2003 and imposed cuts in government spending and reduced the deficit. U.S. guarantees of Israel's debt are also credited with giving international investors more confidence in recent years. The economy is by no means perfect. The current government is expected to finish 2006 with a budget deficit of roughly 2% of GDP. Unemployment stands at more than 8%.

Business leaders say Israel's tech-dominated economy is flexible enough so that during times of conflict, both work and meetings can be shifted outside the country.

But security analysts say the situation is only getting worse, as threats against Israel increase. One threat that continues to simmer is the rising lawlessness and violence in the Palestinian territories of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, where rocket fire from militants on neighboring Israeli towns erupts regularly, followed by reprisals from the Israeli military.

For years, many have argued that neither the Israelis nor Palestinians could truly prosper without peace. But under the leadership of former Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Israel turned away from that notion, and began the process of "disengagement" from the Palestinian territories.

Israel's economic success -- not just during the war with Hezbollah, but amid the smoldering tension in the territories -- may again bolster the country's current path of insulating itself from the Palestinians economically and socially.

Nadine Baudot Trajtenberg, an economist and head of investor relations at the Bank Hapoalim in Israel, says clashes with Palestinians are now largely confined to the territories, and aren't as harmful to the Israeli economy as the frequent suicide bombings in Jerusalem and other large Israeli cities used to be.

DOJ_NMG_0068744

As history demonstrates, Israel's conflict with the Palestinians can quickly worsen. But investors like Mr. Buffett see more opportunity than risk. And that's a powerful symbol.

U.N. Force Is Treading Lightly On Lebanese Soil (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

TIBNIN, Lebanon, Sept. 24 — One month after a United Nations Security Council resolution ended a 34-day war between Israel and Lebanon's Hezbollah militia, members of the international force sent to help keep the peace say their mission is defined more by what they cannot do than by what they can.

They say they cannot set up checkpoints, search cars, homes or businesses or detain suspects. If they see a truck transporting missiles, for example, they say they can not stop it. They cannot do any of this, they say, because under their interpretation of the Security Council resolution that deployed them, they must first be authorized to take such action by the Lebanese Army.

The job of the United Nations force, and commanders in the field repeat this like a mantra, is to respect Lebanese sovereignty by supporting the Lebanese Army. They will only do what the Lebanese authorities ask.

The Security Council resolution, known as 1701, was seen at the time as the best way to halt the war, partly by giving Israel assurances that Lebanon's southern border would be policed by a robust international force to prevent Hezbollah militants from attacking. When the resolution was approved, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, one of its principal architects, said the force's deployment would help "protect the Lebanese people and prevent armed groups such as Hezbollah from destabilizing the area."

But the resolution's diplomatic language skirted a fundamental question: what kind of policing power would be given to the international force? The resolution leaves open the possibility that the Lebanese Army would grant such policing power, but the force's commanders say that so far, at least, that has not happened.

"There's a lot of misunderstanding what we are doing here," said Lt. Col. Stefano Cappellaro, an Italian commander with the San Marco Regiment.

The force, known as the United Nation's Interim Force in Lebanon, or Unifil, now has 5,000 troops on the ground, including 1,000 from Italy, and is stepping gently as it tries to carve out a role in a country that is feeling its way through the postwar period. It is early in the United Nations mission, but officials say that their most difficult task, and one they are adamant about achieving, is not being drawn into any power struggles between the religious and political factions in Lebanon. "We will not get involved in any domestic or regional politics,'' said Milos Strugar, senior adviser to the force.

The force is larger and better equipped than an earlier Unifil contingent, which has been on the border with Israel for years. But at the moment, the Lebanese government and the United Nations have a similar agenda in trying to win the trust of the Lebanese people and not have the force become a tool of political factions looking to incite domestic conflict. The goal is to be viewed as a peacekeeping force, not an occupier.

So while there may have been some expectation that the international force would disarm or restrain Hezbollah, or search for hidden weapons caches, the commanders on the ground say very clearly that those tasks are not their job for now. "We will advise, help and assist the Lebanese forces," said Col. Rosario Walter Guerrisi, commander of the San Marco Regiment, referring to the Lebanese Army.

But the challenges facing their determined neutrality are significant and often beyond their control. In Syria, for example, President Bashar al-Assad was reported in the Lebanese news media to have told a visiting Lebanese delegation that the strengthened United Nations force, with its heavy European contingent, resembled a force from NATO. In Lebanon, the United Nations force found its credibility questioned when German officials said that their country would contribute to the naval patrols off the coast of Lebanon as a means to protect Israel.

Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of Hezbollah, has also questioned the purpose of the expanded force.

"Thus far, I have not heard any country participating in the Unifil say that it sent its sons and soldiers to defend Lebanon and the Lebanese," he said in a speech Friday before hundreds of thousands of his supporters. "They are ashamed of us, brothers and sisters. They are ashamed of saying they came to defend us, but they talk about defending Israel."

DOJ_NMG_0068745

Hezbollah has so far acted in accordance with the cease-fire terms of 1701, which prohibits the deployment of weapons south of the Litani River, close to the Israeli border.

When the United Nations Security Council passed 1701, which set up the cease-fire, it outlined basic principles with few specifics. One of those principles was that militias were to be disarmed in compliance with earlier agreements and resolutions. It did not say, though, that the United Nations force would carry that out.

Hezbollah, the only militia that did not lay down its weapons after the Lebanese civil war ended, has made it clear that it is not going to surrender those weapons now. And Sheik Nasrallah made it clear that the international forces had better not even think about trying.

In Israel, skepticism about the effectiveness of the enlarged United Nations force has always been high, particularly in enforcing an arms embargo on Hezbollah. Israeli military officials have said that if they find evidence that trucks from Syria are resupplying rockets and launchers to Hezbollah, Israel will be justified in bombing those trucks.

The United Nations officials here say their primary duty, and the one that carries the most long-term benefits for both sides, is to help strengthen the Lebanese Army. At the moment, officials say the first priority is to make sure that all of the Israeli Defense Forces withdraw from land occupied during the war. United Nations officials said the process should be completed by the end of the month. The process involves weekly meetings along the border to set up a schedule that allows Israel to withdraw and the United Nations forces to move in, followed by the Lebanese forces. So far 85 percent of Israel's forces have withdrawn, the United Nations said.

The formula for ending the war was also contingent on the state's asserting its authority in the south, primarily by dispatching 15,000 Lebanese troops to the area. The resolution called for the Lebanese Army to be supplemented by up to 15,000 foreign troops. Officials say that the ultimate size of the foreign force will be determined based on need — and one United Nations adviser said that meant it was unlikely the number of troops would ever exceed 10,000.

But however large the force, its officers said it would never be large enough if the population began to view it as an occupying force. The United Nations first set up an international force here in 1976, and so the people of the region are accustomed to seeing foreign troops in the blue berets of the United Nations.

But the new troops have stepped into Lebanon at a particularly tense time, as Hezbollah and the American-supported government are jockeying for position and power. If the Lebanese government did decide to expand the responsibilities of the troops now, they would risk turning them into targets of attack. These forces are much better equipped than past forces, and that has people a bit nervous about their mission.

"If these troops are going to clash with the resistance, they are going to clash with the people," said Abu Rowda Noureddin, 64, as he collected free blankets and food supplies from the Red Crescent Society. He lives in the village of Burj Qalawiyah, a community of just 1,000 year-round residents in southern Lebanon that took heavy fire from Israeli jets.

The village is about 70 miles from Beirut and a short drive from a base staffed by Italian forces. Like most residents of neighboring villages, the people were essentially ignored by their government for many years. There is one school, no high school and few jobs. Villagers said that five times since 1972 the Israeli military had invaded their village, and so even those who said they did not count themselves as Hezbollah members said they counted themselves as Hezbollah supporters.

"The people here will fight against anybody who tries with force to take Hezbollah's weapons away,'' said Ibrahim Noureddin, another villager.

Up the hill, past houses pocked by shrapnel, the mukhtar, a kind of village administrator, was busy taking an inventory of the damage to crops and olive and fruit trees. He said that the Italian forces recently gave his community $3,000 to buy aluminum and glass to repair the school, which was damaged in an Israeli raid. "It was a very nice gesture on the part of the Italians," he said.

But like everyone else, he said that for the forces to remain welcome they must demonstrate they are there to protect the Lebanese from Israel — not to police the Lebanese on behalf of Israel.

Not far away, on a busy road heading toward Beirut, Colonel Cappellaro stood beside two armored personnel carriers and 11 of his soldiers as cars sped by. He said that they were conducting a "static point," as opposed to a checkpoint. If they saw anything suspicious they would notify the Lebanese Army. But the Lebanese Army was a good way up the road. At this point, he said, it would be impossible for the two forces to actually staff a check point together.

DOJ_NMG_0068746

"When you don't know each other's procedures, you can not overlap," he said before climbing into his jeep and driving off.

Lebanese Christians Protest Hezbollah (AP)

By Hussein Dakroub

AP, September 25, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon - An anti-Syrian Christian leader dismissed Hezbollah's claims of victory in its war with Israel as tens of thousands of his supporters rallied Sunday in a show of strength that highlighted Lebanon's sharp divisions.

The rally north of Beirut came just two days after a massive gathering by the rival Shiite Muslim Hezbollah that attracted hundreds of thousands. The two sides have been at sharp odds over the future of the Lebanese government since this summer's Israeli-Hezbollah war.

Samir Geagea, a notorious former leader of a Christian militia, scoffed at Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah's declaration that his guerrillas achieved "a victory" against Israel.

"I don't feel victory because the majority of the Lebanese people do not feel victory. Rather, they feel that a major catastrophe had befallen them and made their present and future uncertain," he said.

Hezbollah's fight with Israel sent its support soaring among Shiites. But a large sector — particularly among Christians and Sunni Muslims — opposes Hezbollah and resents it for provoking the monthlong fight by capturing two Israeli soldiers on July 12.

The war killed hundreds of Lebanese civilians and left part of the country's infrastructure in ruins, causing billions of dollars in damage to the economy.

Geagea, who served more than a decade in prison on multiple counts of murder dating to the 1975-90 civil war, backs the Western-leaning government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. His party is a member of the anti-Syrian parliamentary majority in Lebanon.

Geagea's supporters, waving his pictures and the white, red and green flag of his Lebanese Forces Party, arrived in buses and cars at the shrine of the Virgin Mary in the town of Harissa, about 15 miles north of Beirut.

Addressing his supporters after a mass to commemorate Christian militiamen killed in the civil war, Geagea rejected Nasrallah's vow to keep his weapons, saying the guerrilla group was blocking the establishment of "a strong and capable (Lebanese) state" for which Nasrallah was calling.

"When we find a solution to (the issue of Hezbollah's) weapons, then it will be possible to establish the state as it should be," he said.

Geagea, who backs Hezbollah's disarmament, implicitly accused the Iranian- and Syrian-backed group of running "a state within a state" in south Lebanon.

"How can a state be established while there is a mini-state (within its borders)? How can this state be established while every day arms and ammunitions are smuggled (to Hezbollah) under its (the state's) nose?" he said.

Nasrallah vowed at a massive rally Friday in Beirut's southern suburbs not to disarm despite international pressure. Some 800,000 Hezbollah supporters cheered Nasrallah at the gathering to celebrate what Hezbollah called "a divine victory" against Israel in the 34-day war that ended on Aug. 14.

In his speech, Nasrallah also called for the formation of a new government, repeatedly attacking Saniora's administration, which he called weak and unable to protect Lebanon from Israel.

Hezbollah's push for a stronger political role could deepen tensions in a country already sharply divided over the war.

Geagea rejected Nasrallah's call for a new government, defending Saniora's administration. Despite "some loopholes and defects," it is for the first time "a Lebanese, sovereign and independent one," he said.

Syria dominated Lebanon for nearly three decades before it withdrew its troops last year under heavy international pressure following the assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri.

Syria is accused of involvement in Hariri's death, which it denies.

DOJ_NMG_0068747

Geagea was arrested in April 1994 and his group was banned after a church bombing killed 10 people. He was later acquitted in the bombing but sentenced to three life terms on several other murder counts, including the killing of pro-Syrian Prime Minister Rashid Karami.

Geagea served 11 years in prison before he was released in July 2005, when Lebanon's parliament approved a motion to pardon him.

He was leader of the Lebanese Forces — the country's most powerful Christian militia during the Lebanese civil war. Israel backed the militia during that conflict and the Israeli invasion in 1982 to expel Palestinian guerrillas.

Iran Unplugged (USNEWS)

By Thomas Omestad

U.S. News and World Report, September 25, 2006

UNITED NATIONS-As diplomatic roadshows go, this was the polar opposite of slick. No big ad buys, no polished PowerPoint presentations, and, certainly, no cocktail receptions. No, no. The host wore bland, off-the-rack white sport jackets paired with pale, open-collar shirts. But he drew a crowd, did Iran's Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, offering a rare up-close look at the new public face of Tehran's nuclear ambitions, its antipathy for Israel, and its zeal for regional muscle-flexing.

Even as whispers of war grew louder in Washington, Ahmadinejad launched his charm offensive hard on the heels of his denunciation of the United States in his address to the opening session of the U.N. General Assembly. He used his visit to New York to try to put a resolute-but-unthreatening face on Iran's aims-at an acutely delicate moment in the U.S.-led drive to get the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran. The key countries in the coalition pressuring Iran are struggling to stick together on their insistence that Iran stop enriching uranium before formal talks can begin. A move to sanctions has been expected ever since Iran rebuffed the Security Council's August 31 deadline to halt uranium enrichment. The delays-"extra innings," as a top State Department official, Nicholas Burns, put it-come as Europe is probing both Iranian and U.S. officials for a compromise formula to get full-fledged negotiations started.

"Just friends?" The Iranian president seemed determined to soften his image as an implacable foe of America, chuckling and joking at times and, for the most part, lightening up on his often-fiery rhetoric. He praised Americans as "a strong people, a good people," urged "dialogue," and called for exchanges of scientists and students, along with direct flights between Iran and the United States. "Can't we just be friends?" he asked at one point in an unusual session at his Manhattan hotel with Iran specialists and a handful of journalists. Still, he grew steely-eyed in reply to a question from U.S. News about the Bush administration's apparent preference for "regime change" in Iran. Ahmadinejad had heard that "on numerous occasions," he said, but insisted that it would never happen. "They are not able to do that," he said.

On the most dangerous flashpoint, Ahmadinejad repeated assurances-dismissed in Washington and in most European capitals-that Iran's nuclear program "will be solely used for peaceful purposes." In any case, he said, nuclear weapons are proscribed by Islamic teachings. "The Iranian people," he said, "don't need a nuclear weapon." Ahmadinejad called the focus on uranium enrichment an "excuse" to try to deny Iran its right to nuclear energy. He also professed disappointment that President Bush didn't respond to his meandering, 21-page letter this spring or to his challenge to a debate at the United Nations.

Ahmadinejad remains a bit of a mystery to official Washington. A U.S. intelligence profile, U.S. News has learned, depicts him as seeing the world "in very black-and-white terms" yet also possessing the capacity to "change quite quickly." But Ahmadinejad came to America bearing no gifts-other than his gift of idiosyncratic oratory. He refused to yield to the U.N. demands. And he said nothing to disavow his past comments suggesting that the Holocaust is a myth and threatening Israel. These "constant provocations," as one European diplomat puts it, have served to rally Security Council opposition to the prospect of a nuclear-capable Iran. "He does have that quality," agrees a senior U.S. official. But Ahmadinejad's outbursts resonated with hard-liners in Iran and elsewhere in the region. "He has put Iran back on the map," says Sanam Vakil, an Iran specialist at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies in Washington. "The common man still admires him."

Iranian Clerics' Angling Stirs Worry On Absolute Rule (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068748

TEHRAN, Sept. 24 — Political jockeying by fundamentalist Iranian clerics for the coming election of the Assembly of Experts, the group charged with overseeing the country's supreme leader, is raising concerns that the government will move further toward authoritarianism.

As in the last elections for the assembly eight years ago, the watchdog Guardian Council has barred reformist clerics. And this year, some clerics and some newspapers have been suggesting that a senior fundamentalist cleric who is President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's mentor, Muhammad Taqi Mesbah Yazdi, may be trying to expand his already growing power by packing the assembly with loyalists trained at his education center in Qum.

Mr. Mesbah Yazdi, 72, is close to the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and he directly influences the government through loyalists appointed to high posts after Mr. Ahmadinejad took power last year. His followers also have great sway amon g Iran's Revolutionary Guards and the Basij volunteer paramilitary force.

The Iranian Constitution adopted after the 1979 revolution led by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini provided for a system of checks and balances meant to ensure that the government would not move toward authoritarianism. So even as it enshrined a supreme leader, who has the final word on all matters, it created an Assembly of Experts, or religious jurisprudence, to oversee his activities.

But after the death of Ayatollah Khomeini in 1989, a system of vetting election candidates was put in place to eliminate any threat to the rule of the supreme leader.

At least on paper, the official powers of the Assembly of Experts include the ability to replace the supreme leader if he acts against Islam or the Constitution.

However, Mr. Mesbah Yazdi and Ayatollah Khamenei are allies — the ayatollah finances Mr. Mesbah Yazdi's school in Qum — and the likeliest outcome of a power play by Mr. Mesbah Yazdi would be to strengthen the supreme leader, even at the expense of the Assembly of Experts.

Mohsen Kadivar, a senior reformist cleric who was barred from running in the last election, said, "The fight in the election will be between the traditional clerics and the fundamentalists." He identified the traditionalists as those who considered the Assembly of Experts a higher authority than the supreme leader.

Mr. Mesbah Yazdi is a particularly aggressive defender of the supreme leader's absolute power, and he was a strong critic of the previous president, Mohammad Khatami, who tried to introduce modest social and political changes. He has long held that democracy and elections are not compatible with Islam.

"Democracy means if the people want something that is against God's will, then they should forget about God and religion," he said in July 1998. "Be careful not to be deceived. Accepting Islam is not compatible with democracy."

And in November 2002, the daily Aftab-e-Yazd quoted him as saying: "Who are the majority of people who vote: a bunch of hooligans who drink vodka and are paid to vote. Whatever they say cannot become the law of the country and Islam."

He has criticized democracy more cautiously since the election of Mr. Ahmadinejad, but his disdain for the election process to fill the Assembly of Experts was evident in a speech in Mashhad this month, in which the news agency ISNA quoted him as saying it was like the vote of the "ignorant for the learned."

Mr. Mesbah Yazdi was a founder of the modern Haghani School, a religious school in Qum where most Iranian officials were trained.

After Ayatollah Khomeini died, Mr. Mesbah Yazdi founded the Imam Khomeini Education and Research Institute. Since then, he has grown close to Ayatollah Khamenei.

Through the school, he has educated more than 700 students who are extremely loyal to him, according to people who work in Qum, but, out of fear of retribution, would speak only on the condition of anonymity. Many of his followers are believed to be running for the Assembly of Experts.

These protégés are clerics but have studied the humanities, and many have received degrees from Western universities like McGill in Montreal and Manchester in London.

The elections for the Assembly of Experts, the fourth since the Iranian Revolution in 1979, is scheduled for Dec. 15. Many of Mr. Mesbah Yazdi's young and seemingly modern clerics are believed to be running, but as independent candidates to avoid announcing their affiliation to Mr. Mesbah Yazdi. However, it is difficult to be sure exactly how many, or which, candidates are allied with him because of the secrecy that often blankets elective matters here.

DOJ_NMG_0068749

Some analysts say the competition this year is likely to be between Mr. Mesbah Yazdi and Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, a former president who packed the assembly elected in 1990 and 1998 with traditional clerics with whom he had influence.

But Mr. Rafsanjani, who represents more moderate and pragmatist views, has not announced his candidacy, and some political analysts say he may not run if the prospect of winning the prestigious position of the leader of the assembly seems dim. He lost to Mr. Ahmadinejad in last year's presidential elections and suffered a defeat in parliamentary elections six years ago. His son, Mehdi Hashemi, said Mr. Rafsanjani had "set a condition and his participation depends on that." But he declined to specify the condition.

Turnout was a low 37 percent in the second assembly election, in 1990, in part because voters felt little connection to it.

"People have not received any reports about the activities of the Assembly of Experts, and no one can even imagine the supreme leader can be replaced," said Mohammad Atrianfar, a close aide to Mr. Rafsanjani and the publisher of the daily newspaper Shargh, which was shut down this month. "People have no positive or negative reaction toward the assembly."

In 1998, 46 percent voted after the landslide presidential victory in 1997 of Mr. Khatami, who urged people to vote in the assembly elections.

This year, to bolster turnout, the election authorities decided to hold the assembly vote at the same time as local elections. But requiring the candidates to be approved by the Guardian Council, some analysts say, undermines the point of the vote.

"If the members are independent and genuinely carry out their duty, the Islamic Republic can become democratic," said Emadedin Baghi, a reformist journalist who studied religion for many years. "But vetting its candidates has put a cancerous tumor in the assembly which does not allow it to function properly."

For Iran, A Policy Of Patience (WP)

By Fareed Zakaria

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

If you think Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has said some crazy things, none comes close to this: "If the worst came to worst and half of mankind died, the other half would remain while imperialism would be razed to the ground. . ." That was Mao Zedong in 1957. If you find the idea of an Iranian nuclear program unsettling, put yourself in the shoes of policymakers in 1964, the year that China tested a nuclear bomb.

At the time, China was probably the most aggressive country in the world. As historian Francis J. Gavin recounts, Mao's regime had fought a bloody war against the United States in Korea and almost entered another one over Taiwan. It had attacked India in 1962 and threatened several other Asian countries, such as Indonesia. It was supporting North Vietnam and the Viet Cong insurgency in the South. It actively aided violent revolutionary groups around the world, including in Latin America and the Caribbean. Mao's gruesome callousness toward human life extended to his own people. "Half of China may well have to die," he declared as he launched the Great Leap Forward. (He didn't quite succeed, but for a while the "Guinness World Records" book listed him as history's greatest mass murderer, for having caused the deaths of 26.3 million people.) Compared with all this, Iran today looks positively normal.

Of course it is not normal, and Ahmadinejad is not a normal leader. Iran is ruled by a repressive clique that has armed Hezbollah, destabilized Lebanon and Iraq, and defied and deceived international nuclear inspectors. Ahmadinejad has made a series of grotesque comments. But if we convince ourselves that Iran is an existential threat, one that must be stopped immediately and at all costs, we will fail. If we turn this into a game of chicken, we will lose.

Right now, Iran is riding high. Oil revenue is rolling in, amounting to about $55 billion last year. Its neighbors are severely weakened. Iraq is in chaos; Afghanistan and Pakistan are preoccupied with a resurgent Taliban; the Lebanese government is under great strain; the Persian Gulf states are scared. Most important, the United States is tied down, its influence and political capital in the region at an all-time low.

DOJ_NMG_0068750

Ahmadinejad is using this moment to press his advantage. He has outflanked Arab regimes on the issue of Israel and Palestine, speaking in more confrontational terms than they dare (for fear of Washington). He knows that the Sunni Arab governments don't like him, so he has gone directly to their people. It's working.

Ahmadinejad is also turning Iran's nuclear program into a matter of Third World pride. Taking advantage of the global atmosphere of anti-Americanism, he is claiming that the United States is determined to prevent a developing country from moving ahead technologically. Again, it's working. Fully 118 countries signed on to Iran's cause at the recent nonaligned summit.

Instead of getting scared and spooked, America should view Tehran with a healthy dose of calm and confidence. Iran's fortunes will wane. Oil prices might head downward; Iraq could become less of a burden one way or the other; Arab regimes will get more assertive in responding to the rise of Iranian power. Washington could take the initiative on Lebanon and Palestine, which would vastly improve the political atmosphere.

The Bush administration must also develop a set of creative options short of military strikes -- which would only delay, not end, Iran's nuclear program -- in case Iran does not agree to stop reprocessing. Other countries will not go along with many of the toughest economic sanctions -- and it's not clear they would work anyway. One measure that would sting would be a widespread travel ban on Iran's officials. (That would be the end of the diplomats' conference circuit, not to mention trips to Dubai for money laundering.) Iran is unlikely to agree to become dependent on imported nuclear fuel. The second-best alternative might be a permanent inspections system in Iran, ensuring that its civilian program is not weaponized.

Watching Ahmadinejad at a private meeting last week, I was struck by how little he conformed to the picture of a madman. He was smug, even arrogant, sometimes offensive, but always calm and intelligent. If we're going to outsmart him, we need clever, compelling arguments of our own. Instead we have tended to threaten, bully and intimidate. No wonder he's winning the public diplomacy.

One way to change the game is to play to our strengths. Iran's hard-liners don't want good relations with the United States. Iranians have been taught for a generation now that Washington hates them, doesn't want relations with their country and tries to isolate them in the world. What if President Bush publicly offered to open an embassy in Tehran and begin student exchanges with young Iranians? In a country that is yearning for contact with the outside world, it might put the mullahs on the defensive.

In 1964, many people argued for a preemptive strike against China. Wiser heads prevailed. But even President John F. Kennedy had worried that from the moment China went nuclear "it would dominate South East Asia." In fact, far from dominating it, China's bomb scared Southeast Asia into a closer association with the United States. Today, Chinese influence in the region is great and growing -- but that's because of its economic heft, not its nukes. Iran is ruled by a failed regime that cannot modernize the country and is instead seeking a cheap path to influence. It didn't work for the communists in Russia or China and, if we keep our cool, it won't work for the mullahs in Tehran.

The writer is editor of Newsweek International. He co-hosts, with The Post's David Ignatius, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://www.washingtonpost.com.

North Korea To Challenge U.S. On Nuclear Fuel (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

BEIJING, Sept. 24 — North Korea plans to step up production of fuel for nuclear weapons unless the United States drops financial sanctions and returns to negotiations over its nuclear program, an American scholar with ties to North Korean leaders said Sunday.

The scholar, Selig S. Harrison, a longtime Korea specialist based in Washington, said top North Korean officials whom he met with last week told him they intended to unload fuel rods at their Yongbyong reactor and extract plutonium for nuclear bombs earlier than had been expected.

“It is a significant new development because it underlines that North Korea is enhancing its weapons capability,” Mr. Harrison said in Beijing after returning from Pyongyang, the capital of North Korea.

He quoted Kim Kye-gwan, the vice foreign minister of North Korea, who is overseeing its participation in the stalled six-nation negotiations, as saying that the fuel rods would be unloaded this fall.

DOJ_NMG_0068751

Mr. Harrison, who cultivates ties to the reclusive officials who run North Korea, said that he did not interpret the statement of intention to expedite nuclear fuel production as a threat and that the political and military leaders he had met seemed eager to resume negotiations with the outside world.

After meetings with several top North Korean political and military figures, he said, they expressed a desire to carry out a preliminary international accord on dismantling their nuclear program.

North Korea reached the accord with the United States and four other nations a year ago, but has refused to discuss how to carry it out.

Shortly after the agreement, the Bush administration imposed financial sanctions on North Korea. The administration said the sanctions were necessary to stop North Korean counterfeiting of American dollars and other black market activities.

Mr. Harrison said North Korean officials had repeated public demands that the United States drop financial sanctions before nuclear negotiations resume. But he said they were also seeking ways for the two countries to resume talks even earlier as a way to build trust.

He argued that the sanctions, which he said North Koreans saw as an effort to further isolate them and to topple the government of Kim Jong-il, were counterproductive in ridding the Korean Peninsula of nuclear weapons.

"The U.S. will have to find a way to deal with illicit transactions without destroying North Korean intercourse with the outside world," Mr. Harrison said. "The policy of sanctions is completely counterproductive."

The Bush administration has defended the sanctions as a vital law enforcement action. Administration officials say that they are unrelated to the nuclear talks and that the only significant obstacle to resuming those talks is North Korea's reluctance to give up nuclear weapons.

Nuclear Engagement (WSJ)

By Peter Wonacott

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

NEW DELHI -- With the fate of a landmark nuclear pact between the U.S. and India hinging on an imminent Senate vote, Ron Somers isn't leaving its outcome to chance.

Mr. Somers, an American businessman whose career has tracked India's economic opening over the past 15 years, is spearheading a late-stage lobbying blitz to coax the deal across the finish line. After seeing one Indian energy venture after another, including two of his own, strangled by bureaucracy and political turf wars, Mr. Somers believes the nuclear-power pact represents the key to unlocking India's huge economic potential -- and the billions of dollars in business opportunities that would follow for U.S. companies.

The U.S.-India Business Council in Washington, of which he is president, is working with a broad coalition of U.S. companies, academics and Indian-American groups to shepherd final congressional passage of a pact President Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed to in March. The deal's proponents believe it will knit together two big democracies in a strategic bond and a rich economic relationship.

"The pure fundamentals of India point to an extraordinary opportunity for multinationals," says 51-year-old Mr. Somers, a former power-company executive who has spent years working to satisfy India's enormous thirst for energy. "This is the dawn of a whole new era."

As the number of days dwindles before Congress breaks, Mr. Somers and a disparate group of allies have coordinated visits, letters and teleconferences to expedite the Senate vote. The House has approved its version of the bill. Mr. Somers's track record in India has become a political asset in Washington, say those who have worked with him. By divining Indian politics, he has earned credibility among U.S. politicians. And by speaking a tangled version of the Southern Telugu language, Mr. Somers has won friends among Indian-Americans, many of whom are flexing their political muscle for the first time.

Companies including Westinghouse Electric Co., Boeing Co. and Ford Motor Co. have lined up behind the initiative. Another strong backer, General Electric Co., provided reactors for India's fledgling nuclear program in 1969 before breaking off cooperation when India exploded a nuclear device five years later.

DOJ_NMG_0068752

Now, New Delhi is seeking foreign assistance to reach its stated goal of producing 20,000 megawatts of nuclear power by 2020, a drive that could generate $30 billion in sales for U.S. companies that provide nuclear know-how and equipment, according to Mr. Somers. Industry executives expect India to boost its output goal sharply if the nuclear-cooperation pact is approved.

Meanwhile, the Indian air force is expected to order 126 fighter jets, an estimated $6 billion deal that could tilt toward U.S. companies if nuclear links are established and barriers to sharing technology can be lowered, according to Chris Chadwick, vice president of global strike systems at Boeing Integrated Defense Systems.

In November, around the time supporters hope the nuclear agreement will be finalized, a U.S. trade mission -- touted as the largest ever to visit India, with 200 U.S. companies -- will arrive to scout for business. Some companies will be looking for trade deals, while others will explore investment openings.

But there have been false dawns before for foreign investors in India, especially in the power sector. Many hurdles that tripped up Mr. Somers's earlier energy projects remain, ranging from free electricity for farmers to a succession of Indian bureaucrats, who must learn about new industries and projects with each job rotation. That can mean delays and costly red tape. In September, the World Bank ranked India 134th out of 175 locales in difficulty of setting up or operating a business. And some India business backers worry the nation's stalled privatization drive, notably its recently postponed plans to sell stakes in government-owned companies, points to a slowing pace of market liberalization that could hamper growth.

"It is important to bear in mind there are serious economic costs to any loss of momentum on the reform front," U.S. Ambassador David C. Mulford said in a speech this month.

Few foreign executives know the difficulties of operating here better than Mr. Somers. After a stint with the U.S. Agency for International Development in India in the early 1990s, he went to work for Cogentrix Energy Inc. of Charlotte, N.C., to set up a coal-fired power plant. Then a litany of troubles began: Mr. Somers would regularly awake at 2 a.m. to place calls home because that was the only time a long-distance line would be available. He once waited at an Indian airport for five hours, only to be told the pilots hadn't shown up to fly the plane.

Though it was granted fast-track status by the government, Cogentrix's $1.3 billion electric-power project in Karnataka state faced stiff challenges. Negotiators struggled to come up with workable financial terms, mainly because -- like today -- many farmers receive electricity free by order of state governments. Cogentrix also ran into environmental opposition for its coal-fired plant, even though it planned to use clean technologies. "I couldn't get up in the morning without another thing coming at me," says Mr. Somers.

In early 2000 Cogentrix pulled out of India, leaving the project to joint-venture partner China Light & Power Co. of Hong Kong. India's seven other fast-track projects didn't fare much better. The most high profile among them, Enron Corp.'s $2.9 billion Dabhol power project, was shut down in 2001 after its only customer, the Maharashtra State Electricity Board, fell behind on payments. GE and Bechtel Group Inc. bought the rights to Enron's stake, but last year both shed their interests in the plant after a drawn-out dispute with the electricity board and other government interests.

Mr. Somers went on to become Unocal Corp.'s chief executive in India. The U.S. company, now part of Chevron Corp., sought to build a pipeline that would stretch across seven Indian states, tapping gas from Bangladesh. Unocal lined up Indian Oil Corp. and other powerful government backers, but Bangladesh ultimately refused to supply the gas. In 2004 Unocal shelved the plan and shut down its India operations. Mr. Somers headed back to the U.S.

Today, India's cities are increasingly racked by power cuts as the economy expands around 8% a year. Oil and gas reserves can't meet soaring demand. Overseas, Indian bids for oil and gas fields are running up against those of another energy-hungry giant, China. "We need a huge amount of power at a reasonable price," says Harry Dhaul, director general of Independent Power Producers Association of India. "Nuclear is the only option."

Enter Mr. Somers -- again.

In India, Mr. Somers is so well-known he can't walk through a hotel lobby without someone interrupting him. During a visit in July, a vice president of Raytheon Co. wanted to trade gossip on the fighter-jet deal. An Indian-American entrepreneur thanked him for setting up a meeting with Indian defense scientists, who were eager to hear about his company's anthrax vaccine. And an anxious assistant reminded Mr. Somers he was an hour late for his next meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0068753

Mr. Somers's group, an affiliate of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, is scrambling to rally support. In December , the U.S.-India Business Council hired Washington law firm Patton Boggs LLP to help line up lawmakers behind the nuclear deal, formally known as the "United States-India Peaceful Atomic Energy Cooperation Act."

The U.S. requires legislation to dismantle decades-old barriers to sharing its nuclear technology and equipment with New Delhi, and ensuring India has sufficient fuel to run its reactors. In July, the House passed the pact overwhelmingly; a Senate vote could come within days. If the deal is approved, both chambers would vote again on a final version.

The measure would lay the groundwork for a final agreement that would bring India's civilian nuclear program under international safeguards for the first time, but some U.S. lawmakers and security analysts worry that rewarding India for bucking nuclear norms would encourage other nations to follow its example. New Delhi has long refused to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. In 1998, India exploded a series of nuclear devices, prompting Pakistan's own nuclear tests.

Far from earlier project failures damping his enthusiasm, Mr. Somers says India's future energizes him. "This is a young, hopeful [nation], which embraces wholeheartedly the tenets of free-market democracy," he says. "With all of this going for it, why shouldn't I, or U.S. industry, be anything but upbeat?"

Affirmative Action In India Flips Caste Roles (WT)

By Erica Lee Nelson

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

NEW DELHI -- Years of affirmative action have upended India's caste system to the point where some upper-caste Brahmins are reduced to working as porters and pedaling rickshaws, while almost half the places in universities will soon be reserved for lower castes and tribal people.

Ramesh Jha, a Brahmin, came to New Delhi because he could not find work in his village in eastern Bihar state, where farming jobs have disappeared and almost all the government jobs are reserved for lower castes.

He now cleans toilets, performing a job once done by only the lowest of castes -- "untouchable" scavengers who cleaned excreta with their bare hands.

India's version of affirmative action has gradually taken hold over the past 50 years, designed to bring justice to those who were long oppressed by the Hindu caste system.

Now the government, using data from a caste census taken in 1931, is on its way to increasing the number of university admissions reserved for lower castes and tribal people to 49.5 percent from 22.5 percent.

When the reservation system was introduced in 1990, violent protests surged through the country and one student immolated himself in protest. This year, large groups of medical and engineering students went on hunger strikes, faced tear gas and left hospitals unmanned for days to participate in protests.

The demonstrators say the quota system will squelch merit in India's most respected universities and further fracture Indian society. More protests are expected when Parliament reconvenes for the winter session.

Since caste cannot always be determined by looks, corrupt government officials are known to create fake lower-caste certificates for anyone who pays. Recently, the Indian Express newspaper obtained a backward-caste certificate for Atal Behari Vajpayee -- a Brahmin and former prime minister -- simply by paying a bribe of less than $10.

Meanwhile, the status of Brahmins in many states is abysmal. In Andhra Pradesh, 44 percent of Brahmins in the 5 to 18 age group dropped out of school at the primary level, according to a book by J. Radhakrishna. And hundreds of thousands of Brahmins who were forced to leave insurgency-hit Kashmir now live as refugees in other parts of India.

Much of the progress made by the lowest castes is attributable to the work of the Sulabh Sanitation Movement in New Delhi, which has worked to improve conditions for those who clean public toilets while training them for other kinds of work.

Its founder, Bindeshwar Pathak, a Brahmin, recalls the day from his childhood that his grandmother forced him to swallow sand and cow manure because he had touched an "untouchable." Inspired by Mahatma Gandhi's social movement, he made it his life's work as an adult to fight against that prejudice.

Mr. Pathak, 64, estimates that 13 million toilets are cleaned by members of the manual scavenging caste -- women like Usha who started cleaning sewage when she was 15 years old, just after her marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0068754

"I was sick when I did that work," says Usha, who uses only one name. "My stomach always felt bad. My employers would never hand me food. They would only drop it on the ground."

The Sulabh Sanitation Movement trained her to make noodles and grind spices to sell to hotels in the area. The community now looks up to her, and she makes enough money to send her children to school.

But, she says, no one in her slum has benefited much from reserved jobs in the government: They only get jobs as cleaners. And no one of her generation has enough education to gain admission to a university, even if the increased reservations are implemented.

Rather, she says, it is members of the subcastes that stand slightly above the untouchables who are in a position to take advantage of the government benefits.

In order to correct this imbalance, Mr. Jha says, reserved jobs and places in universities should be allotted on the basis of income rather than caste.

"Anyone coming from poverty level should be helped by the government, no matter what the caste, so they can grow and develop," he says.

Somalia's Islamists Seize Seaport (AP)

By Nasteex Dahir Farah, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 25, 2006

Hundreds of Islamic militiamen in heavily armed trucks took over the southern town of Kismayo, one of the last seaports that had been outside their control in Somalia, witnesses said Sunday.

"The Islamic courts have entered Kismayo," said resident Abdi Gashan, adding that the warlords who previously ruled the area had fled. "We welcome the Islamic courts."

The peaceful takeover was the latest blow to Somalia's virtually powerless government. The country's defense minister, Col. Barre "Hirale" Aden Shire, had been a leading member of the Juba Valley Alliance that had been ruling Kismayo and was among those who fled.

Hirale's deputy, Yusuf Mire Mohamud, said "the Juba Valley Alliance has collapsed today."

Members of the Islamic group, which the United States accuses of harboring al-Qaida terrorists, were not immediately available for comment.

Leaders from the Islamic militia — which controls the capital, Mogadishu, along with much of southern Somalia — have been in Kismayo for several days, in direct challenge to the alliance. Fearful residents of the town, some 260 miles southwest of Mogadishu, have been fleeing across the border to Kenya in case fighting breaks out.

Somalia has not had an effective national government since 1991, when warlords overthrew dictator Mohamed Siad Barre and then turned on one another, throwing the country into anarchy.

An interim government was formed in 2004 with U.N. help in hopes of restoring order after years of lawlessness. But the Islamic movement seized Mogadishu in June and now controls much of the country's south.

The government controls just one town, Baidoa, 150 miles from the capital.

The United States has accused the Islamic group of sheltering suspects in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Al-Qaida chief Osama bin Laden has portrayed Somalia as a battleground in his war on the U.S.

The group's strict and often severe interpretation of Islam raises memories of Afghanistan's Taliban, which was ousted by a U.S.-led campaign for harboring bin Laden and al-Qaida fighters. Still, many residents credit the courts with bringing a semblance of order.

U.S. Envoy Says Sudan One Of His Toughest Tasks (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, September 25, 2006

The Bush administration's new envoy to Sudan said his mission to try to stop the genocide in Darfur will be a daunting assignment.

DOJ_NMG_0068755

Andrew Natsios, a former head of the U.S. Agency for International Development, said his new job will be "one of the most difficult I've had." In an interview Friday, he compared it to his work on Boston's "Big Dig." Natsios was chairman and chief executive officer of the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority for a year. In 2000, he was brought in to try to get the calamity-plagued bridge and tunnel project on track.

Natsios said his first task will be to convince the Sudanese government to stop bombarding rebel villages in Darfur and allow the deployment of United Nations peacekeepers in the western Sudanese region, which is the size of France.

The U.N. Security Council passed a resolution last month calling on Sudan to permit deployment of 20,000 peacekeepers in Darfur. The U.N. force would augment an African Union (AU) force that has failed to stop the killing and displacement of Darfur civilians.

The conflict began in February 2003, when Darfur rebels attacked government installations, claiming discrimination against the region's non-Arabic-speaking farmers. The government unleashed helicopter gunships, and the Janjaweed, pro-government militias on horseback and camels, burned villages, raped women and slaughtered thousands. The attacks have forced more than 2 million from their homes and killed at least 200,000.

In recent weeks, the government has stepped up bombing of villages in rebel-held areas, New York-based Human Rights Watch says.

Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir has rejected U.N. troops, saying their presence would violate Sudan's sovereignty.

Last week, the AU announced it would extend its force's mandate, due to expire Sept. 30, until the end of the year. Noureddine Mezni, an AU spokesman, said Sunday that the organization would increase the number of troops in Darfur, currently 7,000.

"It will be a matter of battalions. I cannot specify how many," he said. A battalion usually is made up of 600 to 800 soldiers.

In a speech to the U.N. General Assembly last week, President Bush told the people of Darfur: "You have suffered unspeakable violence, and my nation has called these atrocities what they are — genocide."

Two years ago, then-secretary of State Colin Powell called the Darfur situation genocide. Bush said that if the Sudanese government does not cooperate, "the United Nations must act." He also announced Natsios' appointment.

Natsios said he will travel to the region in the next few weeks to try to convince the Bashir government to accept U.N. peacekeepers and to encourage Darfur rebels to stop fighting. A similar mission this month by Assistant Secretary of State for Africa Jendayi Frazer failed on both fronts. Natsios said the United States has "a plan B and a plan C" to deal with Darfur if his efforts do not succeed. He would not provide details.

U.S. leverage with the Sudanese government is limited by political and economic considerations:

•Sudan provides crucial cooperation on terrorism. Paul Pillar, former Middle East chief on the National Intelligence Council, which advises the president, said the Sudanese government "has for the past several years tried to get into our good graces by cooperating on terrorism," particularly against al-Qaeda, which was founded in Sudan in the early 1990s.

If the Bush administration were to increase pressure on Sudan by seeking to freeze its assets or block its oil exports, such cooperation could fade. "There is no question in my mind" that this is a complicating factor on Darfur, Pillar said.

John Prendergast, a Sudan specialist with the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based organization that seeks to end conflicts, said U.S. leverage is limited because Sudan's intelligence chief, Maj. Gen. Salah Abdallah Gosh, who works with the CIA against al-Qaeda, is the same man who came up with the strategy of using the Janjaweed.

Natsios said, "I have to be aware of" the intelligence links, but "that's not driving" U.S. policy.

•Sudan uses oil as a diplomatic weapon. The toughest penalty against Sudan would be to block its oil sales, which account for 70% of its export earnings. Sudan is Africa's third-largest oil producer and the third-largest supplier of oil to China, a permanent member of the U.N. Security Council with the power to veto any sanctions. China owns 40% of Sudan's major oil company, said Princeton Lyman, an Africa expert at the Council on Foreign Relations: "The Chinese have not put pressure on Sudan, and they've blocked U.N. sanctions."

Natsios acknowledged that "dealing with the Chinese will be critically important."

DOJ_NMG_0068756

•Arab and Muslim countries have supported Sudan. Although Darfur natives are Muslim, many do not speak Arabic or identify with Arabs, as the government and most of the Janjaweed do. In general, the 22-member Arab League has backed Bashir in opposing the deployment of U.N. troops.

Natsios said he hoped that would change. A lot of Muslim leaders "are very nervous about where this is going," he said, referring to the deaths of fellow Muslims.

A NATO Solution For Sudan's Genocide (WSJ)

By Kurt Bassuener And Eric A. Witte

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

The Sudanese genocide in Darfur is on a faster track than the diplomacy hoping to stop it.

True, the Aug. 31 United Nations Security Council resolution to replace the African Union's underpowered observer force in Darfur with a stronger U.N. mission of over 17,000 troops clearly worries the Sudanese regime. But its fear that the world may finally summon the will to intervene forcefully has led to Khartoum's initial decision to expel and now try to co-opt the AU's ineffectual force. The regime seems to bet that by wiping out rebels and accelerating the genocide this fall, it can preclude any intervention.

At the U.N. Security Council earlier this month, Secretary General Kofi Annan reported that Sudanese aircraft have renewed bombardment of civilians, and that Sudanese army regulars are on the march. The genocidaires' plan has been kicked into overdrive. Even an agreement to a meaningful U.N. force now may come too late.

But the West's current tactics -- such as British Prime Minister Tony Blair's announcement two weeks ago that he would try to engineer an invitation from Khartoum -- will never convince Sudan to allow a "permissive environment" for deploying the kind of international force that Sudanese leader Omar Bashir categorically rejects. His threats of jihad against intervening troops are clearly designed to spook a Western public already jittery about terrorism at home and hot conflicts in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere. The Security Council's insistence on walking through an open door rather than displaying the will to kick it down gives Sudan an effective veto over any force deployment. China and Russia, for reasons of oil, arms, and precedent would no doubt veto Security Council authorization of a deployment unless Sudan consents.

The only way Beijing, Moscow and Khartoum might change their minds is if the alternative is even less palatable: a force in which they have no say. Coercing the necessary Sudanese consent and convincing likely resisters on the Security Council to demur, as U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hinted at Friday, is possible if the West moved outside the U.N. framework. NATO could rapidly alter the strategic and diplomatic equation by creating a no-fly zone and denying Sudanese control over Darfur's skies. It wouldn't be the first time for NATO to stop ethnic cleansing "unilaterally."

In 1999, NATO intervened in Kosovo to end Serbian atrocities without approval of the divided Security Council and thus paved the way for a U.N.-approved ground force under NATO and a U.N. civilian mission. Later that year, New Zealand's foreign minister mooted intervention without U.N. approval in East Timor, prodding China and others to rethink their resistance to a strong U.N. force.

But who could lead such a NATO force? Bogged down in Iraq and Afghanistan, the U.S. is unlikely to take charge. It is Europe and particularly France, recently more vocal than ever on Darfur, that hold the keys to meaningful international action. French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said earlier this month that it was "essential" for Khartoum to accept the U.N. force and even alluded to a deployment of troops without Sudanese consent. "Do we go there, in spite of them?" Mr. Douste-Blazy said at a Paris news conference. "That's not on the table; nobody has asked the question like that. But it's a real question," he stressed. The answer must be a resounding yes.

Despite its commitment to lead the augmented U.N. Interim Force in Lebanon, France remains the best-positioned power to take the lead on Darfur, given its military bases in neighboring Chad. European NATO forces -- acting through the alliance or as an EU-led Combined Joint Task Force availing itself of NATO assets, such as logistics and airborne battlefield management -- could quickly establish a no-fly zone over Darfur and eastern Chad from French airfields there. This could immediately end Sudanese strafing of Darfuri villages and provide a foundation for deploying reinforcements to AU troops without unduly stretching

DOJ_NMG_0068757

NATO military resources. In so doing, Khartoum -- denied control of its western airspace and with its ground forces as vulnerable as the civilians the regime has been attacking -- would find it hard to continue resisting a U.N.-mandated ground force.

If, despite a no-fly zone, the Sudanese government still were to block the deployment of a robust U.N. force, NATO could up the ante and strike at Janjaweed and government forces that continue to attack civilians. It should also begin staging a heavily armed brigade in Chad as the core of a future U.N.-approved, Chapter VII peace enforcement mission.

The only thing that could secure Sudan's agreement to a U.N.-mandated force is a NATO force prepared to act without one.

Messrs. Bassuener and Witte are senior associates at the Democratization Policy Council.

Official Claims Abuse At N.Y. Airport (WT/AP)

By Ian James

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

NEW YORK -- Venezuela's foreign minister said he was detained for 90 minutes by officials at a New York airport and accused authorities of treating him abusively by trying to frisk and handcuff him.

U.S. officials called the Saturday evening incident regrettable and said they had apologized to Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro. But Mr. Maduro said Venezuela would seek a legal challenge through the United Nations to what he called a "flagrant violation of international law" and his diplomatic immunity.

"We were detained for an hour and a half, threatened by police with being beaten," Mr. Maduro told reporters at Venezuela's mission to the United Nations. "We hold the U.S. government responsible."

A U.N. diplomat who spoke on the condition of anonymity said Mr. Maduro's return home had been delayed because he arrived late at the airport without a ticket, prompting extra screening.

Department of Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke denied that Mr. Maduro was mistreated at John F. Kennedy International Airport when he was selected for an extra security check.

"He began to articulate his frustration with secondary screening right after he went through" a metal detector, Mr. Knocke said. "Port Authority officials confronted him when the situation became a ruckus."

Mr. Maduro said he refused a request to go to another room for a strip-search. He told CNN that an official pushed him and yelled at him. He told reporters that the situation worsened when he explained he was the Venezuelan foreign minister and presented his diplomatic passport.

Mr. Maduro said authorities at one point ordered him and other officials to spread their arms and legs and be frisked, but he said they forcefully refused. He said officers also threatened to handcuff him.

"We responded with the dignity of Venezuelan revolutionaries ... with strength," Mr. Maduro said at Venezuela's mission to the United Nations. "It's a Nazi government, a racist government."

If this is how U.S. authorities treat a foreign minister, he asked, "What won't they do to Arab people for wearing a turban?"

He said his passport and ticket were seized and eventually returned, but the incident prevented him from flying home Saturday.

State Department spokesman Tom Casey said it was a "regrettable incident" for which "the U.S. government has apologized."

Fidel Castro, in his role as president of the Non-Aligned Movement, decried the incident in a statement, calling it a "vulgar provocation."

The statement issued late Saturday said that the Cuban leader reacted "with indignation" and that the detention was an "unacceptable violation" of international norms regarding diplomats.

Cuba took over the leadership of the Non-Aligned Movement Sept. 15. Its 118 members comprise two-thirds of the world's nations, mostly developing countries.

Relations between the U.S. and Venezuela -- strained for several years -- took a particularly confrontational turn last week, when Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, speaking at the annual U.N. General Assembly, called President Bush "the devil."

U.S. officials often call Mr. Chavez a threat to democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0068758

Mr. Maduro told reporters that the treatment of him and other Venezuelan officials seemed in part to be an "attempt to provoke us."

He said about an hour and 20 minutes into his detention, he received a call from U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Thomas Shannon, who apologized and said State Department officials were on their way to resolve the matter.

Five minutes later, State Department officials arrived and ordered Mr. Maduro and the others to spread their arms and legs to be frisked by police, he said.

Mr. Maduro said that Venezuela has lodged a protest with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan and that the incident should be investigated so that those responsible are punished. He said those who detained him did not make any particular accusations.

Crazy Like A Fox (TIME)

By Tim Padgett

Time, September 25, 2006

It's no surpriseÂ that the first thingÂ Hugo ChÃ¡vez offers me as we sit down for an interview is a cup of coffee. ChÃ¡vez is a renowned caffeine fanatic, known for downing as many as two dozen small cups a day. Venezuelans speculate that it's one reason their President is so prone to impulsive diatribes like the one he delivered at the U.N. General Assembly last week, in which he accused President George W. Bush of being the "devil" and leaving a satanic "smell of sulfur" in the U.N. hall. ChÃ¡vez wasn't done. A few hours before he met me, he gave a speech in Harlem in which he called Bush an "alcoholic."

But by the time he arrived at Venezuela's U.N. mission last Thursday, Hurricane Hugo had lost some of his bluster. On the basis of two previous meetings with ChÃ¡vez, I expected him to be considerably less strident when sitting over a cup of guayoyo (a Venezuelan-style cup of coffee) than while standing at a lectern. Indeed, when an aide reminded him that my wife is Venezuelan, he asked to see pictures of her and our kids. He seemed genuinely surprised when I informed him that rebukes were pouring in from liberals in the U.S. Congress over the way he insulted Bush on U.S. soil. "Bush has called me worse," ChÃ¡vez said, with a shrug. "Tyrant, populist dictator, drug trafficker, to name a few. I was simply telling a truth that people should know about this President, a man with gigantic power that no one seems to be braking."

ChÃ¡vez, 52, believes it's his destiny to be the leftist David who puts the brakes on what he calls Bush's imperialist Goliath--not just in Venezuela, which has the hemisphere's largest oil reserves, but in Latin America and the world. In his eight years as President, ChÃ¡vez has gone from a backwater strongman to a genuine global player, capitalizing on sky-high oil prices to spread his influence across Latin America and to win attention when he denounces the Bush Administration. That has made Caracas a hot destination for leftist tourists, bolstered ChÃ¡vez's celebrity cachet--he counts Danny Glover and Harry Belafonte as friends--and made him the most visible Latin leader since Fidel Castro. But his rhetorical excesses, like his antics at the U.N., allow his critics to dismiss him as a buffoonish pretender. It was a sign of how badly his act played in New York City last week that even Democratic Representative Charles Rangel, a harsh critic of Bush's, went out of his way to tell ChÃ¡vez that "you don't come into my country, you don't come into my congressional district and ... condemn my President."

Yet the problem for the Bush Administration is that while many Americans recoil, much of the rest of the world applauds. That's a big reason the U.S. is lobbying hard to prevent Venezuela from winning a nonvoting seat next month on the U.N. Security Council, where ChÃ¡vez could run interference for his friend, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, in the dispute over Iran's nuclear ambitions. The U.S. is backing Guatemala for the seat, but ChÃ¡vez has lined up the support of such influential nations as Russia, China and Brazil. And if Venezuela does win it, it would be the latest reminder that while 20th century rebels like Castro could do little more than rail at Washington, the U.S. today faces post--cold war radicals like ChÃ¡vez and Ahmadinejad who have the will, savvy and resources to constrain American power and thwart U.S. interests. Says an African diplomat: "ChÃ¡vez will stand up and articulate, however coarsely, the notion many of our citizens hold--that Bush and the U.S. have kicked us around for some time now after 9/11 and we would like it to stop."

ChÃ¡vez has long been an insurgent. He grew up idolizing his great-grandfather, who went into the mountains to lead a revolt against an early 20th century Venezuelan dictator, and SimÃ³n BolÃ-var, South America's 19th century independence hero. "ChÃ¡vez has always seen himself as that kind of heroic man of action on horseback," says Alberto Barrera, co-author of the biography Hugo ChÃ¡vez sin Uniforme (Hugo ChÃ¡vez Out of Uniform). Venezuela's ambassador to the U.N., Francisco Arias, a former classmate who took part with ChÃ¡vez in a 1992 coup attempt, says that when the two men went through military training together, "Hugo was the one cadet who stood up to the awful hazing" at the academy.

DOJ_NMG_0068759

When ChÃ¡vez went to jail in 1992 for attempting to overthrow the government, the joke on the streets was that he deserved 30 years: one for the coup and 29 for failing. The incident won him admiration among ordinary Venezuelans, who backed ChÃ¡vez for taking a stand against their criminally corrupt Ã©lite, who for decades had pillaged the oil wealth and left half the population in poverty. That popular support got him and his comrades released, and ChÃ¡vez set out to take power at the ballot box instead. In 1998 he won a landslide presidential victory (and another in a special 2001 election).

Having vanquished Venezuela's political establishment, ChÃ¡vez has set his sights on bigger targets. Exploiting the fact that the U.S. gets about 15% of its foreign oil from Venezuela, he pushed the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, of which Venezuela is a founding member, to pump up crude prices. In 1998, Venezuela's state-run oil monopoly, PDVSA, earned less than $14 billion in export revenue; this year it is expected to rake in almost $40 billion. In 2002 the White House was widely perceived to have backed a failed coup attempt against ChÃ¡vez. (The Bush Administration denies that.) The resulting sympathy ChÃ¡vez won coincided with the new petro-largesse he could spread around Latin America to curry favor for his Bolivarian revolution--including epic projects like a proposed $20 billion, 6,000-mile-long gas pipeline from Venezuela to Argentina to help integrate South America's economies. ChÃ¡vez's anti-Yanqui message has changed the hemisphere's political equation, catapulting Latin leftists like Bolivia's Evo Morales into power and helping nonhemispheric powers like China gain a stronger economic foothold. "The U.S. fears Venezuela's presence on the Security Council," ChÃ¡vez says, "because it knows we'll be a genuinely independent vote for the Third World."

ChÃ¡vez has also poured the country's oil windfall into a New Deal's worth of social programs in Venezuela, including the first medical clinics that many dirt-poor Caracas barrios have ever seen--usually staffed by doctors from Cuba whom Castro sends in exchange for cut-rate oil. "I don't care if our doctors are from Mars," says Manuel Tejera, who is helping build a clinic and lay potable-water pipes in the La Vega barrio. "We feel more like real citizens here for once."

But ChÃ¡vez is also a polarizing figure at home. Although his approval ratings are in the high 50s, there is growing impatience with the country's stubborn unemployment and violent crime. Teodoro Petkoff, an erstwhile socialist leader who is a campaign strategist for ChÃ¡vez's main opponent in the December presidential election, Manuel Rosales, says ChÃ¡vez's "21st century socialism" is only a short-term fix. "The real fight against poverty is a fight against unemployment," Petkoff says. Others complain that ChÃ¡vez is a Castro wannabe who has subverted Venezuela's democratic institutions, especially the courts, and may well seek a constitutional change to let him run for a third term in 2012 if, as expected, he wins re-election in December. For the most part, Venezuelan media are still free to rail at ChÃ¡vez--and they do. "Just watch two hours of television there," ChÃ¡vez says. "My God, devil is the least of things the opposition is allowed to call me on the air."

What may ultimately erode ChÃ¡vez's stature are exactly the things that he has skillfully used to boost it. As the price of oil begins to fall, critics predict ChÃ¡vez's radical influence will too. Some analysts believe that Mexico's leftist candidate, AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador, narrowly lost the recent presidential race in large part because his conservative opponent painted him as a ChÃ¡vez clone. The same thing happened a month earlier in presidential elections in Peru.

ChÃ¡vez considers his bravado his chief asset, but critics say it too often makes it hard to take him seriously as a statesman. While Ahmadinejad wowed U.S. audiences with his verbal dexterity last week, ChÃ¡vez seemed only to enhance his reputation for gratuitous Bush baiting. After ChÃ¡vez's speech at the General Assembly, the U.S. ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, called the performance "a comic-strip approach to international affairs." A product of Venezuela's llanos, or rural plains, ChÃ¡vez patterns his style after the straight-talking vaqueros (cowboys) he grew up with. (One of his favorite American films is Clint Eastwood's Pale Rider.) And ChÃ¡vez is fond of calling Bush "Mister Danger," a reference to a quintessential Ugly American in Venezuela's best-known novel, DoÃ±a BÃ¡rbara, a torrid story set not far from where ChÃ¡vez was raised. And the "devil" barb, he points out, stems from a legend about a vaquero who beats Satan in a singing contest. But at some point even cowboys have to learn a more diplomatic tune. With reporting by Jens Erik Gould/Caracas

The Sound & The Fury (TIME)

DOJ_NMG_0068760

By Tim Padgett

Time, September 25, 2006

TIME: Why do you attack President George W. Bush with such jolting language?

CHAVEZ: I believe words have great weight, and I want people to know exactly what I mean. I'm not attacking President Bush; I'm simply counterattacking. Bush has been attacking the world, and not just with words--with bombs. When I say these things I believe I'm speaking for many people, because they too believe this moment is our opportunity to stop the threat of a U.S. empire that uses the U.N. to justify its aggression against half the world. In Bush's speech to the U.N., he sounded as if he wants to be master of the world. I changed my original speech after reading his.

TIME: But doesn't your rhetoric--referring to Bush, for example, as an "alcoholic"--risk alienating potential allies?

CHAVEZ: First of all, Bush has called me worse: tyrant, populist dictator, drug trafficker, to name a few. I was simply telling a truth that people should know about this President, a man with gigantic power.

TIME: Is all of this mostly for domestic consumption back in Venezuela?

CHAVEZ: No. American author Noam Chomsky in his book [Hegemony or Survival: America's Quest for Global Dominance] talks of two superpowers in today's world--one is the U.S., which aggressively wants to dominate the world, and the other is global public opinion. I don't consider what I'm saying personal attacks on President Bush--I want to wake up U.S. and global public opinion about him.

TIME: Do your feelings about Bush reflect your feelings toward America in general?

CHAVEZ: No. I revere America as the nation of Abraham Lincoln, Martin Luther King and Mark Twain--who was a great anti-imperialist, who opposed U.S. adventurism in the Spanish-American War.

TIME: You often speak of the link between U.S. foreign policy and its appetite for oil.

CHAVEZ: Bush wanted Iraq's oil, and I believe he wants Venezuela's oil. The blame for high oil prices lies in the consumer model of the U.S. Its reckless oil consumption is a form of suicide.

TIME: You said recently that you believe the "BolÃ-var Doctrine is finally replacing the Monroe Doctrine" on your watch. Why?

CHAVEZ: For two centuries in this hemisphere we've experienced a confrontation between two theses--America's Monroe Doctrine, which says the U.S. should exercise hegemony over all the other republics, and the doctrine of SimÃ³n BolÃ-var, which envisioned a great South American republic as a counterbalance. Bush has spread the Monroe thesis globally, to make the U.S. the police of the world--if you're not with us, he says, you're against us. We're simply doing the same now with the BolÃ-var thesis--a doctrine of more equality and autonomy among nations, more equilibrium of power.

TIME: What's the difference between your "socialism for the 21st century" and past attempts to fix the region's economic inequality?

CHAVEZ: When I was released from prison [in 1994] and began my political life, I naively took as a reference point Tony Blair's proposal for a "third way" between capitalism and socialism--capitalism with a human face. Not anymore. After seeing the failure of Washington-backed capitalist reforms in Latin America, I no longer think a third way is possible. Capitalism is the way of the devil and exploitation, of the kind of misery and inequality that destroys social values. If you really look at things through the eyes of Jesus Christ--who I think was the first socialist--only socialism can really create a genuine society.

TIME: Yet one slogan of your re-election campaign is "Against ChÃ¡vez, Against the People." You also seem to have taken on a with-me-or-against-me stance.

CHAVEZ: The difference is ethics and morals. We're not threatening anyone. That slogan is simply a call for conscious reflection on national unity. We're not going to enforce it by bombing or invading anyone.

TIME: Critics have noted that while you were free to slam President Bush on U.S. soil, a new defamation law in Venezuela makes people subject to criminal prosecution for slander against officials like you.

CHAVEZ: They need to visit Venezuela. If you think ChÃ¡vez is intimidating free expression, just watch television there--my God, devil is the least of things the opposition is allowed to call me on the air.

TIME: Could Venezuela play an interlocutor role between Iran and the U.S.? You and President Bush have some things in common--you both hail from cowboy country and enjoy Clint Eastwood movies.

DOJ_NMG_0068761

CHAVEZ: I like Danny Glover movies better. But I don't believe there is anyone who can play the interlocutor with a leader who considers himself master of the world, as Bush does. Before the 2002 coup attempt against me--which Bush backed--various Presidents around the world tried to be interlocutors between Bush and ChÃ¡vez. I said sure, please give him my regards. But they found it a waste of time with this U.S. President. I could talk to Clinton, but not Bush.

Chávez's Inferno (WSJ)

By Alvaro Vargas Llosa

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

It would have been more appropriate for Hugo Chávez to brandish Dante's "Divine Comedy" than Chomsky's "Hegemony or Survival" during his sulfuric broadside at the U.N. last week. In the first part of the Italian masterpiece, the author undertakes a journey through the nine concentric circles of the Inferno, each representing a type of evil. Dante's description reads like a script of present-day Venezuela.

Dante's first circle is for those who lack faith. In Chávez's Inferno, the first circle is made up of those who lack food. Cendas, a research center, maintains that 80% of Venezuelans cannot meet the cost of a basic daily diet. According to an official statistic the government inadvertently made public on the Web site of the Instituto Nacional de Estadística, between 1999, the year in which Chávez took office, and 2004, poverty rose to 53% from 43% of the population. The authorities attributed the figures to an outdated methodology and now claim the rate of poverty is 42%. If it were true, that would be embarrassing enough, because it would mean that poverty has remained at nearly the same level for eight years.

Dante's second circle is for those unable to control lust. Chávez's second circle is for those unable to control homicidal instincts. His government has degraded social coexistence so much that there have been more homicides in Venezuela during his seven-and-a-half years in office than there have been deaths in any single armed conflict around the world in recent years. Between 2001 and 2006, the number of homicides in Venezuela has been three times the number of victims in Afghanistan.

Dante's third circle is for gluttons who leave us with no food. Chávez's third is reserved for corrupt authorities who leave Venezuelans with no wealth. The major sources of corruption have been Plan Bolívar 2000, the state-owned oil company, and social programs known as "missions." Under Plan Bolívar 2000, the army took over development programs from the local governments. In the case of PDVSA, the energy giant, no one but Chávez and his cronies have access to detailed financial records. The budget for social programs, personally controlled by Chávez, is not included in any government ministry.

Dante's fourth circle is for misers. In Chávez's Inferno, the fourth circle is made up of bureaucrats who claim to provide social services but use funds to pay people to attend rallies or bust up opposition gatherings. Marino González, from Universidad Simón Bolívar, says that the "Barrio Adentro" program that purports to tend to all the pregnant women in the country only serves 2,000 expectant mothers out of a total of half a million each year. No country ever became prosperous through socialism, but for a government that claims to be able to tend to the needy, not being able to meet even 1% of the commitment is a particularly hellish sin.

Dante's fifth circle is for those who succumb to wrath. Chávez's fifth is for political persecution. Venezuela's human rights record is atrocious. Two violent incidents involving Chavista henchmen with many fatalities have gone unpunished, including the killing in April 2002 of 12 people who were protesting near the government palace. There are political prisoners such as Francisco Usón, former minister of finance in Chávez's government, who received a six-year sentence for saying he thought an incident in which a few soldiers died at Fort Mara in 2004 was no accident. Henrique Capriles, the mayor of Baruta, was jailed in 2004, accused of organizing a violent protest against the Cuban embassy which he had actually helped diffuse.

Dante's sixth circle is for heretics. Chávez's sixth circle is for heretic journalists who try to tell the truth. In December 2004, a "gag law" was imposed making it easy to prosecute journalists. The president continually threatens to withdraw TV and radio licenses -- the reason why there are no opinion programs on network TV. Government-controlled mobs called Bolivarian Circles, formed with the help of the Cuban intelligence apparatus, harass journalists.

Dante's seventh circle is for the violent. Chávez's seventh circle is another name for imperialism. His government has bought (or is buying) 100,000 AK-47s, 53 Mi-35 assault helicopters, fighter jets, transport planes, patrol boats, speedboats and Tucano jets from Russia, Spain and Brazil. Chávez is a long-time supporter of FARC, Colombia's terrorist group. He granted

DOJ_NMG_0068762

Venezuelan citizenship and protection to Rodrigo Granda, its "foreign minister," until Alvaro Uribe's government hired bounty hunters to bring him back to Colombia in 2005. The Venezuelan leader has given financial and political support to movements from Mexico to Bolivia. (His support for Ollanta Humala in Peru and Andrés Manuel López Obrador in Mexico was a major factor in both men's recent defeats.)

Chávez buys influence through oil. It is a form of blackmail: At OPEC, Chávez fights for increasing prices, making life hard for poor countries that import oil, and then offers those very nations oil subsidies they have no choice but to accept. That is what happened with the 14 Caribbean countries that make up the Caricom group. He also sends 100,000 barrels of oil to Cuba daily; and 200,000 barrels to Bolivia every month in exchange for soy, poultry and political subservience. And he has bought $3 billion worth of Argentine bonds to entice President Kirchner's loyalty. Chávez is denying his nation its wealth from oil, somewhere between $40 billion and $50 billion a year. His annual "aid" budget totals more than $2 billion. He sponsors 30 countries, including some in Africa, in order to buy their vote for a seat at the U.N. Security Council.

Dante's eighth circle is for those who commit fraud. Chávez's eighth is fraudulent anti-Americanism. Chávez exports 1.5 million barrels of oil a day to the U.S. Since oil makes up half the government's revenue and the U.S. is the principal destination of Venezuelan oil, he pays daily homage to U.S. capitalism. Moreover, Venezuela imported $18 billion worth of goods and services from the U.S. in 2005. He may have signed 20 trade deals with Iran's Ahmadinejad, but what he really lusts for is U.S. capitalism. (Another type of fraud involves the electoral system. Chávez has manipulated the voter registration rolls, adding two million phantom voters, including 30,000 who are 100 years old and citizens named "Superman." Four out of five members in the Electoral Council are Chávez lackeys.)

Dante's final circle is for traitors. Chávez's ninth is for traitors, too -- and the place is getting crowded. Army officers betray Chávez every day. Labor leader Carlos Ortega recently fled with three officers from a high-security prison controlled by the army. They evaded security controls thanks to help from army personnel.

At the end of Dante's Inferno is the center of the earth, where Satan is held captive in the frozen lake of Cocytus. In Venezuela's Inferno, Satan is frozen in oil-rich Lake Maracaibo, a metaphor for astronomical wealth squandered by tyrannical populism. The journey through hell is now complete.

Mr. Vargas Llosa, author of "Liberty for Latin America" (Farrar Straus Giroux, 2005), is director of the Center on Global Prosperity at the Independent Institute.

As Brazil Prepares To Vote, Scandal's Taint Seems To Fade (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

CARUARU, Brazil — A year ago, President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva was on the ropes, his support and legitimacy sapped by the biggest corruption scandal in Brazil's modern history. But with Brazilians scheduled to vote Oct. 1, he now seems likely to cruise to a landslide re-election victory anyway.

The turnaround is a result of several factors, political analysts say, like generous patronage and social programs that have buoyed the president's standing. Simple voter weariness with hearing about corruption day after day has also clearly played a part.

But at least as important is the bedrock of support for Mr. da Silva, 60, the country's first elected left-wing president, among the nation's poor, like those here in the northeast. He was born in the region into a peasant family, one of eight children.

Mr. da Silva's campaign theme song, played incessantly over loudspeakers at campaign rallies and on television advertisements, reminds voters again and again of those humble roots and his kinship with them. "He's the first president with the soul of the people, who looks like us," one verse proclaims.

That argument seems to have resonated with the electorate. So has Mr. da Silva's strategy of distancing himself from the scandal, and from his own Workers' Party, which is expected to lose many of its seats in Congress, even as the president seems likely to emerge from the election unscathed.

Polls indicate that Brazilians blame Congress, the Workers' Party and "the government" for corruption, but have largely exempted Mr. da Silva from responsibility for the scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0068763

"Lula is not a conventional president, and enjoys a degree of identification with the less-educated sector of the populace that is like a safe conduct pass that allows him to do what he wants," said Rubens Figueiredo, a university professor and public opinion consultant. "He has been absolved beforehand."

[In mid-September a new scandal erupted, which forced the replacement of Mr. da Silva's campaign manager but has had minimal immediate impact on polls. Two Workers' Party operatives were arrested with $792,000 in cash that the police say was going to be paid to owners of an ambulance business, involved in another Health Ministry scandal, in return for a dossier meant to incriminate Mr. da Silva's opponent in the 2002 election, who was a former health minister.]

Recent polls have showed Mr. da Silva hovering around the 50 percent of the vote he would need to avoid an Oct. 15 runoff. His closest challenger, Geraldo Alckmin of the Brazilian Social Democratic Party, has been trailing far behind, with fewer than 30 percent of voters questioned saying they will vote for him. Broken down state by state, those numbers indicate an electorate of 126 million voters sharply divided along class and regional lines.

While Mr. da Silva and Mr. Alckmin, a doctor and former governor of São Paulo State, are running close in the more prosperous, industrialized south, polls show the president pulling down 70 percent of the vote in this poor nine-state area that is home to more than 50 million people.

"It would be so easy to govern if we only had to take care of the poor," Mr. da Silva said gratefully at the start of the campaign. "The poor don't cause problems," he added. "All they want is a bit of bread. They don't have the money to go protest in Brasília, to organize marches."

The scandal that threatened to derail Mr. da Silva's presidency erupted in May 2005, when a kickback scheme involving post office contracts was exposed. As the news media and congressional investigators dug deeper, however, they found evidence that Mr. da Silva's 2002 presidential campaign was financed illegally. The clandestine fund-raising scheme continued after he was elected and included payoffs to members of Congress in return for votes.

As a result, Mr. da Silva's two most important aides — his chief of staff, José Dirceu, and his finance minister, Antonio Palocci — were implicated and had to resign. The president of the Workers' Party, which Mr. da Silva founded in 1980 as a labor leader, also had to step down in disgrace, as did the party's secretary general and treasurer.

Initially thrown off balance, Mr. da Silva offered at least five widely varying defenses for the corruption, ranging from an initial argument that "everyone does it" to declarations that he had been "betrayed" by unidentified aides and knew nothing of what was happening.

In the end, he settled on saying that "the same elite that has dominated this country for 500 years" fabricated the scandal to prevent him from working in the interests of the poor, who have for the most part stood by the president's side.

"There has always been corruption in Brazil, but it was always kept under wraps, whereas now it's coming out in the wash and is talked about on the news every day," said Giderson Tenório Silva, 60, a truck driver here. "Like the Bible says, let he who is without sin cast the first stone."

At a campaign rally here on Sept. 5, Mr. da Silva struck a defiant tone with his former health minister, Humberto Costa, now running for governor, at his side. Mr. Costa was recently indicted as part of "the vampire scandal," involving overbilling for blood products, but the president urged his comrade not to worry, because "the people are more intelligent than the political class" and will deliver their verdict at the polls.

"I've been accused many times myself," Mr. da Silva said.

At the start of the campaign, in July, party leaders gave Mr. da Silva, who is prone to gaffes and exaggerations when he speaks off the cuff, "Ten Commandments" to follow. Though the president has occasionally had difficulty containing himself, as when he compared his critics to Nazis, he has mostly obeyed the main points, which include avoiding interviews and debates, so as not to have to improvise, and keeping away from his re-election committee, so as not to be linked to its financing practices.

Mr. da Silva has also been rewarded with voter support for his social programs aimed at easing the lot of the poor.

After his much-heralded Zero Hunger campaign proved a failure, he merged several welfare programs begun by the previous government, repackaged them under the name Family Allowance and made the benefits available to families with a per capita income of less than $60 a month on more lenient terms than were offered by his predecessor.

DOJ_NMG_0068764

More than 11 million families, accounting for nearly one quarter of Brazil's 185 million people, now benefit from the Family Allowance, which pays up to $45 a month per family. With the election looming, Mr. da Silva has also stepped up rural electrification and efforts to install water storage tanks.

"Lula has used the machinery of the state in a way I've never seen in 50 years," said Bolívar Lamounier, a political analyst in São Paulo. "He has been clever in taking voters out of play in the northeast, where people are more dependent on the government and can easily become captives of handouts, so that the only battle is being fought in the south."

Zimbabwe's Leaders Want To Delay Presidential Vote Until 2010 (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

JOHANNESBURG, Sept. 24 — Zimbabwe's governing political party wants to postpone national presidential elections to 2010 from 2008, potentially giving the nation's longtime leader, Robert G. Mugabe, an extra two years in office, the state-controlled news media reported Sunday.

The proposal quickly drew speculation that the government was seeking to buy time before the vote so it could try to resuscitate the economy, which is in a state of collapse, and settle an increasingly bitter struggle within the ruling party over who will succeed Mr. Mugabe once he retires or dies.

Mr. Mugabe, who is 82 and has governed the country since 1980, has suggested but never confirmed that he would retire at the end of his current term as president. Several leaders are jockeying to succeed him within his governing party, the Zimbabwe African National Union-Patriotic Front, or ZANU-PF, but no clear favorite has emerged.

Because ZANU-PF dominates Parliament and is entrenched in the government, any proposal to delay elections is virtually certain to be approved.

Quoted on state radio and in the state-controlled Sunday News in Bulawayo, the ZANU-PF information minister, Nathan Shamuyarira, said delaying the presidential ballot by two years would consolidate that vote with parliamentary elections, also in 2010.

"We want to combine the two, the presidential and parliamentary elections, so that we do not go to elections every two years," The Sunday News quoted him as saying. "We have been discussing that and we will be putting our ideas to Parliament."

Some political analysts said that seemed a small reason to amend the Constitution and to delay the nation's most important election. Experts said it was more likely that the governing party wanted to give itself more time to settle its succession battle.

"There is perhaps a lot of turbulence within ZANU-PF with regard to the succession issue, to a point where holding 2008 elections could split the ruling party into various factions," Dr. Eldred Masunugure, who is in charge of the political science department at the University of Zimbabwe in Harare, said in a telephone interview. "I think 2008 may be too soon for the party to get its house in order."

Any split in the party would separate its hard-liners, led by Mr. Mugabe, from reformers who favor more democratic rule. That, in turn, could help the democratic opposition, which insists that fraud robbed it of victory in recent elections.

Mr. Masunugure and others also say Mr. Mugabe's government needs more time to try to revive the economy, which is saddled with 1,200 percent inflation, 80 percent unemployment and a crippling lack of foreign exchange to import supplies for manufacturing and farming.

Bread vanished from store shelves last week after the government imposed price controls on bread makers. The Associated Press reported Sunday that acute shortages of coal had caused an Indian steel maker to walk away from a plan to invest in steelworks and had forced brewers to raise the price of beer last week by 50 percent.

Zimbabwe has enough high-quality coal reserves to last the country thousands of years, the news agency reported, but shortages of imported spare parts and foreign currency have caused production to plummet.

Now What? (USAT)

By Jonah Goldberg

USA Today, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068765

There's no substitute for a good pope. What other religious leader can start a global argument about theology? The Dalai Lama? Perhaps. The archbishop of Canterbury? Doubtful. Pat Robertson? Please.

Notice how the pope doesn't have a Muslim counterpart to "dialogue" with. It's the pope vs. 10,000 imams, scholars and other self-anointed spokesmen for Islam. It's a bit like Gulliver vs. the Lilliputians.

So, where is the Muslim pope? This question isn't often asked in the West. Particularly among left-leaning scholars of Islam, the search has been on for a "Muslim Martin Luther." Martin Kramer's blistering 2001 study Ivory Towers on Sand: The Failure of Middle Eastern Studies in America catalogued how for decades, scholars have been "so preoccupied with 'Muslim Martin Luthers' that they never got around to producing a single serious analysis" of Osama bin Laden and his cause.

This quest for a Muslim Luther centered on the understandable hope that such a person could reform Islam toward liberalization and modernization, just as Luther supposedly did in Europe. The problem is he did no such thing. His gripe with Roman Catholicism wasn't that it was too reactionary and rigid, but just the opposite. He thought the church had become too worldly and licentious, selling "indulgences" — or divine do-overs — to the highest bidder and the like.

The early Protestants were hardly "moderates" and, normally, secular liberals are keen to make this point. When was the last time you heard a Western liberal pine for a return of Puritanism? Luther and his immediate successors were true believers. And, while enormous theological and historical differences shouldn't be overlooked, today's Islamic fundamentalists have quite a bit in common with these religious crusaders.

Many Protestant sects were as austere as bin Laden's Wahhabi faith. The doctrines that birthed the Amish were hardly "modernizing." Other faiths were more violent. Mobs of Protestant iconoclasts rampaged through European capitals smashing "Catholic" sculptures and burning paintings that violated biblical injunctions against graven images.

In the early 20th century, Muslim zealots launched a remarkably similar project. For example, in 1925 Ibn Saud, a patriarch of the Saudi dynasty and a follower of the puritanical Wahhabi sect of Islam, ordered the destruction of the sacred tombs and mosques of Mohammed and his early followers. They razed Mohammed's home and the graves of the prophet's mother and first wife. The prophet's tomb was barely spared thanks to popular opposition. Today, Saudi authorities are in the process of destroying ancient art and architecture of Mecca and Medina out of the same puritanical zeal. A similar fanaticism inspired the Taliban to blow up the Bamiyan Buddhas, to ban music and even kite flying.

The West is surely indebted to Protestantism. But the idea that liberal secularism was born from it steals a few bases. Protestantism lent itself to being a state religion even more than Catholicism did. And while Christianity has long recognized the distinction between secular and religious authority, the reality is that secularism rests on a foundation of blood, not theology. The Reformation inaugurated an era of relentless religious wars. French Catholics slaughtered Protestant French Huguenots. Calvinists and Lutherans beat the stuffing out of each other. The bloodshed continued until, as British historian Herbert Butterfield put it, religious tolerance became "the last policy that remained when it had proved impossible to go on fighting any longer." Secular tolerance, in other words, defined the terms of cease-fire.

What might be called the Muslim Protestant Reformation began with the demise of the closest thing the Muslim world had to a Catholic Church: the Ottoman Empire. Unfortunately, unlike the church, which was strong enough to fight back, the "Sick Man of Europe" just up and died, ceding the battlefield to zealots. Without the push-and-pull that birthed Western social compromise, Islam simply replaced religious authoritarianism with religious totalitarianism. Tellingly, Lebanon, which endured years of religious civil war, is an exception to this dynamic in the Arab world.

Today, Islam is chockablock with Muslim Luthers claiming to have a monopoly on the Quran's true meaning. Murderers can shop around for a fatwa endorsing the most horrific — and technically un-Islamic — barbarism like junkies searching for a corrupt doctor with a prescription pad for hire.

No, what the Muslim world needs is a pope. Large, old institutions such as the Catholic Church have the "worldliness" to value flexibility and tolerance, and the moral and theological authority to clamp down on those who see compromise as heresy. Pope Clement XIV's famous, or infamous, suppression of Jesuits in 1773 might be an example of both qualities. The Ottoman Empire played a similar, if imperfect, role before its demise. In its absence, Islamic Lilliputians run amok. Ironically, Muslims don't want this divisiveness. The jihadists strive to restore the caliphate as an Islamist thousand-year Reich. But even the moderates long for unity among the Islamic nations. They might one day forge the sort of compromise we in the West reached, but the road map there isn't well illuminated by our past.

DOJ_NMG_0068766

Jonah Goldberg is editor at large of National Review Online. He is a syndicated columnist and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

Play By The Rules (WSJ)

By Charles E. Schumer And Lindsey O. Graham

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

If there's one issue on which we all should agree, it is that increasing global trade is good for American workers and businesses. No serious economist believes that we would be better off if we closed our borders. But for trade to be good for our people, every major economic power needs to abide by the rules of free trade.

One of the fundamental tenets of free trade is that currencies should float -- or at the very least, move along with market forces. The reason for this is that a free-floating currency allows large trade imbalances to self-correct, as the country with a large trade deficit sees its imports become more expensive and its exports become less expensive. Unfortunately, the Chinese government intervenes in the market to keep its currency, the yuan, artificially low, which allows China to artificially inflate its exports and reduce its imports. Their continued manipulation is a form of protectionism, and it throws the whole global trading system out of balance.

Free trade is hard. It's something that all countries have to work at, and most do a pretty good job. Unfortunately, China bends or breaks the rules far too often. Years of currency manipulation, intellectual property theft, and barriers to entry have cost American jobs and contributed heavily to our trade deficit with China, which will set a record this year. China's actions have eroded the coalition for free trade and make it harder for Americans to support free trade here at home.

Three years ago, we grew frustrated with the pace of China's reforms, and we introduced a bill that would impose a temporary tariff of 27.5% on all Chinese imports unless China agreed to play by the rules. Our bill was carefully crafted to not impose tariffs immediately, giving the parties time to negotiate an alternative. In addition, the president would retain the right to delay the tariff for up to two years. Neither of us wants the tariff to become law; our goal all along has been to send a shot across China's bow and prod them to play fair.

While not the ideal way to address China's currency regime, our legislation has given the Bush administration an important tool to encourage the Chinese to institute reforms more rapidly. Senior administration officials concede that our bill has helped strengthen their hand in negotiations.

So we have succeeded in getting China's attention. In fact, we believe the only reason there has been any progress on this issue at all is because of the existence of our bill.

Employers in our states tell us that if the playing field were more level -- that is, if the built-in price advantage China enjoys were reduced -- they would be able to compete more effectively, even with the wage differential between the United States and China. But with a built-in price disadvantage of 15% to 40%, many U.S. plants are forced to close and shift production to China. Members of Congress in both parties are starting to take this issue very seriously.

The tide has even turned at the large investment firms that analyze global economic trends. When we started working on the currency issue, few were paying much attention to it -- but now, many of the largest and most influential firms agree that the currency is significantly undervalued and that China could do much more.

In April 2005, we finally brought our bill to the Senate floor. The Chinese responded that July by allowing the yuan to appreciate by 2.1%, and promising to allow market forces to play a greater role in determining its value. Since the small revaluation, however, the currency has appreciated very little in 14 months, despite an economy growing at 11% annually and a trade surplus with the United States that continues to explode. So the rhetoric out of China is not being matched by real results.

We have agreed four times since last April to delay taking a final vote on our bill. Before the most recent delay, in March of this year, we traveled to China to meet with several of its top government officials.

What we learned on our trip is that China's economic leaders know that China could allow the currency to appreciate more rapidly, but the political leaders are less forthcoming. (There is clearly a growing tension in China between modern economic thinkers and the old-guard party officials.) We returned from our trip with the strong impression that China would move more quickly in the ensuing months. However, even after President Bush went to China last November, and President Hu came to the United States in April, there was no real movement.

DOJ_NMG_0068767

We appreciate that China's banking system is not yet ready for a fully floating currency, but we also agree with most mainstream trade economists that gradual currency appreciation is possible without disrupting their "harmonious society." We have been patient and reasonable, but the time for patience has run out. The workers and manufacturers in our states rightfully demand a level playing field. To those who say we should do nothing, we ask: How much longer are they willing to wait?

Unfortunately, the Chinese appear to be content with the status quo. Their exports to the United States create millions of Chinese jobs and have allowed China to become the second-largest holder of U.S. government bonds in the world. They have no reason to change unless we send a very strong message that the status quo is not acceptable.

We look forward to meeting with Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson, who just recently returned from China. We hope he brings back good news. If not, the clock will have run out and it will be time for an up-or-down vote. With Congress's recess imminent, we know our bill will not become law, but it will be our last opportunity before a new Congress convenes to send such a message. We believe more strongly than ever that pressuring the Chinese to allow their currency to float is in the economic interests of both nations.

Messrs. Schumer and Graham are, respectively, Democratic and Republican senators.

Corruption? Ho-Hum (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

You might think the biggest objections to a World Bank anticorruption push would come from, say, corrupt poor countries in danger of losing international aid. In fact, it's such donor nations as Britain, France and Germany -- and bureaucrats at international aid agencies -- that seem to be complaining the loudest.

Welcome to the upside-down world of development aid, where a country's actual use (or misuse) of money is much less important than how much it receives. Paul Wolfowitz, who took over as head of the World Bank last year, wants to change this paradigm, which won't be easy. At an annual meeting of bank officials in Singapore last week, European elites let it be known that they much prefer a lending system that gives lip service to ending graft but in fact turns a blind eye to corrupt government officials on the receiving end of billions of dollars in foreign aid.

British Development Secretary Hilary Benn threatened to withhold $94 million in funding next year to protest the transparency and accountability conditions that Mr. Wolfowitz is implementing. Mr. Benn, along with his French and German counterparts who serve on the bank's board of directors, finally relented after assurances from Mr. Wolfowitz that the board would play an oversight role. So the same countries that say Americans need to throw more taxpayer money at the developing world don't seem to care how much of it is siphoned off by corrupt governments. The only word for this is bizarre.

Mr. Wolfowitz has said that this anticorruption drive "is about making certain that money goes to schools and textbooks for children, medicines for mothers and creating job opportunities for the poor -- not to line the pockets of the rich and powerful." These days as so often in the past, the latter is the norm.

Throw a dart at a map of Africa, and chances are high that you'll hit a place like Cameroon, where autocrat Paul Biya has been in power since 1982. According to The Wall Street Journal-Heritage Foundation 2006 Index of Economic Freedom, "the ruling party's long domination has encouraged corruption and cronyism" and "corruption is widespread in the government and the judiciary." Our guess is that the more than 40% of government revenue that Mr. Biya receives each year via foreign aid isn't doing much for the average Cameroonian, but it is helping Mr. Biya maintain power.

The World Bank says it has uncovered more than 2,000 instances of fraud, corruption and other misconduct related to its projects since 2001, a situation that led Mr. Wolfowitz to suspend more that $1 billion in loans to countries including Kenya, India, Bangladesh and -- yes -- Cameroon.

Through its lending arm, the International Development Association, the Bank issues on average between $7 billion and $9 billion each year in credits and grants to the poorest nations. And overall, Bank loans totaled nearly $23 billion in 2005. Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0068768

Wolfowitz recognizes that he has a fiduciary obligation to make sure money isn't being wasted or misused. He also understands that anticorruption is an integral part of reducing poverty and promoting growth.

That's a lesson many multilateral agency planners have yet to learn. And it's no surprise, since success at places like the World Bank is measured not by results but by how much money is pushed out the door. Hence, extreme poverty in Africa is growing, even as taxpayers in the West are importuned to throw more and more foreign aid at the continent.

Mr. Wolfowitz's detractors characterize his anticorruption efforts as "obsessive." The Financial Times went so far as to imply that he doesn't grasp the "complexity" of the problem, as if theft and bribery are difficult concepts.

Mr. Wolfowitz is being attacked precisely because he understands the situation all too well. As he put it last week, "better governance . . . is the key to reduction of poverty." We'd go further and add that corruption tends to accompany too-powerful governments that give politicians and bureaucracies control over investment and other economic decisions. The World Bank's own annual "Doing Business" survey documents this problem, even if some on the bank's board apparently don't read its own work. The last thing the world's poor need is international aid organizations that indulge their oppressive governments.

Japan's Future -- And Past (WP)

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

IN ITS LONG march from military catastrophe to heavyweight status, postwar Japan has oscillated between two kinds of error. Its left wing has been honest about the past but irresponsible about the present: It has shown remorse for atrocities committed by Japanese troops in East Asia in the 1930s and 1940s but has been reluctant to see Japan emerge from its pacifist shell and contribute to international security. Meanwhile, the right has made the opposite mistake: It has pushed for Japan to take more responsibility for defense but has glossed over Japan's war guilt. Since becoming prime minister in 2001, Junichiro Koizumi has tended to make the right-wing mistake. His newly chosen successor, Shinzo Abe, threatens to do the same -- but more dramatically.

Mr. Koizumi came to power after a period in which demonstrators called for the removal of American troops from Japanese soil and the value of an alliance forged during the Cold War was widely questioned. He acted decisively to reinforce U.S.-Japanese ties, participating in the Bush administration's missile defense program, sending noncombat troops to Iraq despite Japan's pacifist constitution and taking a tougher line on North Korea than Japan had ventured previously. This pro-American instinct was Mr. Koizumi's good side. But the prime minister also insisted on visiting the Yasukuni shrine commemorating Japan's war dead, including its war criminals, and during his tenure some government-approved textbooks whitewashed Japan's war record. This unnecessarily inflamed anti-Japanese sentiment in China and other neighboring countries.

Mr. Abe promises an extreme version of this formula. He seems likely to dilute Japan's pacifism further: As he correctly says, it is wrong that a Japanese warship cannot come to the aid of a U.S. one attacked by a third country. He will be tougher on North Korea, too, having built his public career on denouncing Pyongyang's dictator. But Mr. Abe has also gone further than Mr. Koizumi in glossing over the past. He has questioned the legitimacy of the Tokyo trials that condemned Japan's wartime leaders. He has not endorsed the apology that Japan's government issued on the 50th anniversary of its surrender.

Mr. Abe sees political advantage in asserting Japan's pride. His grandfather was part of Japan's wartime leadership, so there may be a personal angle to his view of history. But he needs to recognize that forthright policies in the present must be underpinned by forthright honesty about the past. If Japan admits past errors, it will gain acceptance as the responsible democracy that it is, and its muscular foreign policy will be treated as legitimate. But if it professes to see nothing wrong in its own record -- including episodes such as the massacre of at least 100,000 Chinese in Nanjing -- its efforts to assert itself on security and diplomatic questions will raise tensions with neighbors, undermining regional security rather than contributing to it.

Europe V. Microsoft (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

Europe was expected to try a new approach to monopoly cases when Neelie Kroes took over as EU antitrust chief two years ago. Finding creative ways for Brussels to assail Microsoft isn't what most people had in mind.

The latest dust-up concerns the software giant's newest incarnation of the Windows operating system, dubbed Vista. Microsoft is now scrambling to decide whether it should ship the program to Europe along with the rest of the world later this year, or delay to avoid upsetting the European Commission. After the EU fined Microsoft half a billion euros in 2004 for alleged antitrust violations with Windows, and another €280.5 million ($356.8 million) earlier this year for failing to comply with its vague and ever-changing orders, Ms. Kroes has warned Microsoft not to cross the line with Vista.

DOJ_NMG_0068769

The problem is figuring out what that line is. Ms. Kroes earlier this year named five areas of concern with Vista, ranging from built-in security software to the way PDFs are handled. The company proposed changes to address her worries, but Ms. Kroes has declined to say whether they would suffice. Her spokesman says only that "the Commission has been giving guidance to Microsoft for over a year. But ultimately it is for Microsoft to decide how they package and sell Vista."

In other words, the Commission is all but certain to nail Microsoft once Vista comes out, based on some unknowable notion of what is and isn't permissible. Take Adobe, whose PDF format for electronic documents is the industry standard. Adobe has asked the EU to examine Microsoft's inclusion in Vista of new Microsoft programs that perform functions similar to Adobe's, at no cost to consumers. Adobe also objects to Microsoft's free inclusion of a command to save files in non-Adobe programs, such as Word, as PDFs; currently, users must buy Adobe software to create PDFs, although the software for reading them is free. Microsoft has offered to make the PDF-creating plug-in for Vista available as a separate, but still free, download. But Adobe wants the Commission to require Microsoft to charge for the download -- even though Adobe wouldn't get any of the proceeds.

Of course, if Adobe were to make such a request of Microsoft privately, this would be considered collusion. And consumers will pay more and have less choice if Adobe gets its way. From a regulatory standpoint, in other words, Adobe is asking the EU to protect its total monopoly in the electronic-document market by acting against Microsoft's near monopoly in the operating-system market.

Ms. Kroes claims she's simply trying to ensure a level playing field and protect incentives for innovation. But her actions actually stifle creativity: In essence, she is telling Microsoft to proceed with the utmost caution when trying to improve its products, lest it incur her wrath. This precautionary principle doesn't encourage innovation in other fields, and the result won't be any different in software. With her Microsoft obsession, Ms. Kroes is demonstrating that once a company finds itself in the EU's crosshairs, Brussels will go to any length to pursue it.

Ms. Kroes made headlines a year ago by indicating, in a speech in New York, that she favored an American-style antitrust philosophy: namely, judging whether a company's practices help or harm consumers, rather than their competitors. She was back in Manhattan this month, insisting that she still adheres to the consumer-harm standard. But her actions make it hard to believe she means it.

DOJ_NMG_0068770

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

White House Takes Issue With Intelligence Assessment (LAT) ... 3
Negroponte Highlights U.S. Successes (WP) ... 3
Study Of Iraq War And Terror Stirs Strong Political Response (NYT) ... 4
Democrats Use Intelligence Report To Attack GOP On Iraq (USAT/AP) ... 5
Leaked Intelligence Report Rocks Bush Election Stance (AFP-Y) ... 5
Intelligence Findings Present Political Obstacle For Republicans (MCT) ... 6
White House Blamed On Terror Bill (RC) ... 7
Do Unto Your Enemy... (NYT) ... 8
Firing Potent Words, From A Tank (NYT) ... 9
McCain Names Practices Detainee Bill Would Bar (WP) ... 10
McConnell: Democrats AWOL In Terror War (WT) ... 11
Specter Decries Detainee Bill Provision (AP-Y) ... 12
Specter Criticizes Deal Reached On Detainee Treatment (WT) ... 12
Habeas Corpus Not Needed (USAT) ... 13
Scepticism Over Bin Laden 'death' (FT) ... 14
World Leaders Skeptical Of Bin Laden Death Report (USAT) ... 14
Karzai Says Bin Laden Not In Afghanistan (AP-Y) ... 15
Experts See Lower Threat From Al-Qaida (AP-Y) ... 15
Chris Wallace, Caught Off Balance? (WP) ... 16
Clinton Defends How He Handled Al-Qaeda Threat (USAT) ... 18
Clinton Defends Pre-9/11 Actions (WT) ... 19
Torture Victim Had No Terror Link, Canada Told U.S. (NYT) ... 20
CIA: Probe Into Renditions (NSWK) ... 21
Inquiry Slows Giving To Islamic Charity (AP-Y) ... 22

Homeland Response:

Chemical-Security Legislation Nears Approval (WSJ) ... 23
Chemical Plants, Still Unprotected (NYT) ... 24
TSA To Lower Registered Traveler Fee (USAT) ... 24
TSA Backtracks, Projects $30 Fee For Airport Pass (WSJ) ... 25
FBI Is Casting A Wider Net In Anthrax Attacks (WP) ... 25
A Year Later, Rita's Wrath Lingers (USAT) ... 27

War News:

For Bush, War Anguish Expressed Privately (WP) ... 28
Army Considers More Combat Units For Iraq (WT) ... 30
'Iraq Is Not In Chaos' (WP) ... 31
U.S. Soldiers See Inept Output By Iraqi Troops (WT/AP) ... 32
Dangerous Neighborhood (NSWK) ... 33
My Right Hand (TIME) ... 35
The Men Of Ward 57 (TIME) ... 40
Iraqi Parties Reach Deal Postponing Federalism (WP) ... 40
Iraqis Break 2-week Deadlock On Federalism (USAT/AP) ... 41
Iraqis To Debate Bill On Creating Autonomous States (NYT) ... 42
Iraq Puts Autonomy Issue On Hold, Heading Off Crisis (LAT) ... 43
As Iraqi Lights Flicker, 'Generator Man' Feels Heat (NYT) ... 44
Unit Makes Do As Army Strives To Plug Gaps (NYT) ... 46
British Soldiers Allegedly Traded Guns For Cocaine (WP) ... 47
Due Process, Bulldozed (NYT) ... 48
The Rise Of Jihadistan (NSWK) ... 49
NATO Details Airstrikes In Afghanistan (AP) ... 51
Losing Afghanistan (WSJ) ... 52
Two Deaths Were A 'Clue That Something's Wrong' (LAT) ... 53
Army Explores Issue Of Living Wills As More Return From War In Comas (USAT) ... 60
Families Bear Catastrophic War Wounds (USAT) ... 60
Backstory: Enlisting Churches To Help Soldiers (CSM) ... 62

DOJ:

Wainstein Confirmed For New DOJ Post (LAW) ... 63

Corporate Scandals:

HP Chief Tackles Boardroom Scandal Head-on (USAT) ... 64
Dunn's, H-P's Accounts Differ In Leak Probe (WSJ) ... 65
At Hewlett-Packard, A Chief Wounded By Divided Attention (NYT) ... 67
The Changing Rules Of Corporate Spy Games (CSM) ... 69
HP Moves Leave Legal Issues Open (LAW) ... 70
The HP Virus (LAT) ... 71
Regulators Scrutinize Amaranth (WSJ) ... 72
Telos In Turmoil Over Shares (WP) ... 72
Cook The Books, Get Life In Prison: Is Justice Served? (WP) ... 73

Criminal Law:

String Of Heists Raises Fears Bank Jobs Are On Rise (USAT) ... 75
Death Penalty Sought Against D.C. Man (WT) ... 76
1st MS-13 Trial To Reveal Hierarchy (WP) ... 77
Potential For Danger At MySpace.com (NSDY) ... 78
Regulating Love: Lawmakers Cracking Down On Web Dating Industry (LAW) ... 79
DA Sez Feds Won't Hand Over Data (NYDN) ... 80

In Tiny Courts Of New York, Abuses Of Law And Power (NYT). 81
Credit Firms Push To Thwart Fraud (WSJ) 87
93,754,333 Examples Of Data Nonchalance (NYT)..... 88
Perjury Trial Of Ex-SBC Worker Goes To Jury (LAT) 89

Civil Law:

US Judge To Rule On 'light' Cigarettes Action (FT) 90

Civil Rights:

Disputing Citizenship's Role For Hispanics In Government Service (WP)..... 91
Minority Program At WSSC In Limbo (WP) 92
No On Proposition 85 (LAT)..... 93

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Source Of Outbreak No Easily Solved Mystery (USAT)..... 93
Center Of E. Coli Outbreak Is Also Center Of Anxiety (NYT)..... 94
System Set Up After '93 Outbreak Pointed To Spinach In E. Coli Cases (WSJ)..... 95
Voters Get A Say On Land Rights (USAT)..... 96
Seeking Expansion In Urban Areas, Wal-Mart Stores Gets Cold Shoulder (WSJ) 97
Wal-Mart Grows 'green' Strategies (USAT)..... 100
Texas-Size Hunger For Power Worries State's Grid Boss (WSJ)102
2 Years Later, What Has Changed? (USAT)..... 103
The Roadless Rule Takes A New Turn (NYT)..... 105
Green Virgin (WSJ)..... 105

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Letter To Bush Culminates In Major Pontiac Drug Raid (FREEP)105
Bush Letter Cited In Michigan Drug Sweep (WT/UPI)..... 106

Immigration:

Frist Expects Dems Will Fight Border Bill (USAT) 106
Border Bills Come Down To Last Minute (LAT)..... 107
Immigration Work Force Fights Corruption (WP/AP)..... 108

Congress-Administration:

House-Senate Disagreement Could Halt Defense Bill (WP)..... 111
Army's Top Officer Signals Pentagon Budget Revolt (LAT)..... 112
Congress Is Winding Down, But Much Is Left Undone (NYT)... 114
Hopes Sag At Prospects For Lame Duck (RC) 115
Round 2 For Rumsfeld: In For The Long Haul (USAT) 116
McCain Wants Bolton Confirmed Quickly (AP-Y)..... 119
Millions Of Seniors Facing Medicare 'Doughnut Hole' (WP) 119
Medicare Refund Mixup Part Of Larger Tangle (NYT) 121
New Coalition Urges More Money For FDA (USAT) 122
Public Service Academy (WP)..... 122
Constitution 101 A Federal Mandate (WT) 123
Familiar Battles (USNEWS)..... 124
All Laptops Present And Accounted For? Um, We'll Get Back To You On That . . . (WP) 124
Inside The Beltway (WT)..... 125
Progress On Judicial Ethics (WP)..... 126
Routine Testing For The AIDS Virus (NYT)..... 126

Other News:

Construction Job Market's Still Robust (USAT) 127
This Winter, Cost Of Heating Homes Is Forecast To Drop (CSM)128
Falwell Acknowledges Clinton Comment (AP-Y)..... 129
Christian Conservatives Look To Re-energize Base (NYT) 129
Free Trade At The Fore Of Races (LAT)..... 130
Don't Make Me Say I Told You So: It's A Bump, Not A Surge (RC)..... 131
Hawaii Senator Wins Tough Primary Battle (WP/AP) 132
A Senator Bets On Party's Clout In Pennsylvania (NYT) 133
Antiwar Democrat In Connecticut Adds Planks To Platform (NYT) 134
Allen Struggles To Alter Message (WT) 136
Everyone's Jewish (WP) 137
Why The Democratic Wave Could Be A Washout (TIME)..... 138
Washington Whispers (USNEWS)..... 138
In Rove's Footsteps (NSWK) 139
Liberal 527s Find Shortfall (RC)..... 140
Blasé Guardians At The Money Trough (NYT)..... 142
'Battleground' Gets Late Push (RC)..... 142
In Kentucky's 4th, Democrats Are Banking On A Familiar Face (WP)..... 143
Tight Race In Georgia Highlights Dems' Battle (USAT) 144
Contender May Become First Muslim In US Congress (CSM) . 146
Swift Boat Veterans 2.0 (TIME) 147
10 Questions For Elizabeth Edwards (TIME) 148
Anti-Immigration Movement Finds An Articulate Voice (WP) 149
Your Vote Counts (LAT)..... 150
Corporate America Takes On Spitzerism (WSJ)..... 151
Producer Accuses Clintons Of 'Looting' (WT)..... 152
New Premium When Employees Pay For Health Care, The Boss Pays Too (WSJ) 153
Widespread Outage Spurs Coup Rumors In Pakistan (WP)..... 156
Hamas Says It's Serious About Coalition (AP) 157
War Turns The Tide For Israeli Settlers (WP) 158
International Investors See More Opportunities Than Risk In Postwar Israel (WSJ)..... 159
U.N. Force Is Treading Lightly On Lebanese Soil (NYT)..... 160
Lebanese Christians Protest Hezbollah (AP) 162
Iran Unplugged (USNEWS)..... 163
Iranian Clerics' Angling Stirs Worry On Absolute Rule (NYT) ... 164
For Iran, A Policy Of Patience (WP) 165
North Korea To Challenge U.S. On Nuclear Fuel (NYT)..... 166
Nuclear Engagement (WSJ)..... 167
Affirmative Action In India Flips Caste Roles (WT)..... 168
Somalia's Islamists Seize Seaport (AP)..... 169
U.S. Envoy Says Sudan One Of His Toughest Tasks (USAT) . 170
A NATO Solution For Sudan's Genocide (WSJ) 171
Official Claims Abuse At N.Y. Airport (WT/AP)..... 172
Crazy Like A Fox (TIME)..... 173
The Sound & The Fury (TIME) 174
Chávez's Inferno (WSJ)..... 175
As Brazil Prepares To Vote, Scandal's Taint Seems To Fade (NYT) 176
Zimbabwe's Leaders Want To Delay Presidential Vote Until 2010 (NYT) 178
Now What? (USAT) 178

DOJ_NMG_0068772

Play By The Rules (WSJ) 179
Corruption? Ho-Hum (WSJ)..... 181
Japan's Future -- And Past (WP) 181
Europe V. Microsoft (WSJ) 182

TERRORISM NEWS:

White House Takes Issue With Intelligence Assessment (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON --The White House on Sunday sharply disagreed with a new U.S. intelligence assessment that the war in Iraq is encouraging global terrorism, as Bush administration officials stressed that anti-American fervor in the Muslim world began long before the Sept. 11 attacks.

Peter Watkins, a White House spokesman, declined to talk specifically about the National Intelligence Estimate, a classified analysis that represents a consensus perspective of all 16 U.S. intelligence agencies.

The highly classified report, delivered to policymakers in April, is the first of its kind since the start of the Iraq war in March 2003. In it, the agencies concluded that the war has only worsened the U.S. effort to defeat global terrorism. They said that the war is spreading radicalism from Iraq throughout the Middle East and that the longer it continues, the more likely it is that it will provide fresh training grounds for future terrorist plots.

But the White House view, according to Watkins, is that much of the radical fundamentalists' deep anger at the U.S. and Israel goes back generations and cannot be linked to the U.S. invasion and occupation of Iraq.

"Their hatred for freedom and liberty did not develop overnight," Watkins said. "Those seeds were planted decades ago."

He said the administration has sought in Iraq to root out hotbeds of terrorism before they grow. "Instead of waiting while they plot and plan attacks to kill innocent Americans, the United States has taken the initiative to fight back," Watkins said.

President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney also have highlighted the war in Iraq as the main thrust in the fight against terrorism, contending that the world is safer overall without Saddam Hussein in power in Iraq.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee and a likely presidential candidate in 2008, agreed with the White House view that radicalism pre-dates the toppling of Saddam, and that fundamentalists are always looking for reasons to recruit new jihadists.

"If it wasn't Iraq, it'd be Afghanistan," he said on CBS's "Face the Nation." "If it wasn't Afghanistan, it would be others that they would use as a method of continuing their recruitment."

But McCain also cautioned that the longer the war continues, "the more likely they are to have more recruits."

He added, "It's obvious that the difficulties we've experienced in Iraq have certainly emboldened (terrorists). Lack of success always does that."

The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said he was "very concerned" by the reports on the NIE, which were published in the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times and The Washington Post.

"My feel is that the war in Iraq has intensified Islam fundamentalism and radicalism," he told CNN's "Late Edition."

On the other political side, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he agreed with the intelligence assessment that the war is breeding more terrorists.

"President Bush's repeated missteps in Iraq and his stubborn refusal to change course have made America less safe," Reid said in a statement issued by his office Sunday. "No election-year White House PR campaign can hide this truth.

"It is crystal clear," he added, "that America's security demands we change course in Iraq."

And Rep. Jane Harman, the top Democrat on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, said on "Late Edition" that "every intelligence analyst I speak to confirms" that Iraq has made matters worse.

The war in Iraq is "a failed policy," she said.

Negroponte Highlights U.S. Successes (WP)

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

The conclusion of U.S. intelligence analysts that the Iraq war has increased the threat from terrorism is only "a fraction of judgments" in a newly disclosed National Intelligence Estimate, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0068773

The NIE, completed in April, reflects the consensus view of 16 government intelligence services, including the CIA. The Washington Post, New York Times and Los Angeles Times reported yesterday that the classified document concludes that the invasion and occupation of Iraq has fueled Islamic extremism and contributed to the spread of terrorist cells.

"What we have said, time and again, is that while there is much that remains to be done in the war on terror, we have achieved some notable successes against the global jihadist threat," Negroponte said in a statement. "The conclusions of the intelligence community are designed to be comprehensive, and viewing them through the narrow prism of a fraction of judgments distorts the broad framework they create."

Democrats yesterday seized on the intelligence community's assessment.

The document, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) said in a statement, "should be the final nail in the coffin for President Bush's phony argument about the Iraq war."

Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said on CNN's "Late Edition": "Even capturing the remaining top al-Qaeda leadership isn't going to prevent copycat cells, and it isn't going to change a failed policy in Iraq."

But leading Senate Republicans said that the intelligence finding shouldn't cause the United States to abandon military operations in Iraq.

"We need to prevail in Iraq and . . . if we fail, then our problems will be much more complicated," Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

Study Of Iraq War And Terror Stirs Strong Political Response (NYT)

By Philip Shenon And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 24 — Democratic lawmakers, responding to an intelligence report that found that the Iraq war has invigorated Islamic radicalism and worsened the global terrorist threat, said the assessment by American spy agencies demonstrated that the Bush administration needed to devise a new strategy for its handling of the war.

Representative Jane Harman of California, the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said that while she could not discuss details of the classified National Intelligence Estimate, “Every intelligence analyst I speak to confirms that” the Iraq war had contributed to the increased terrorist threat.

“Even capturing the remaining top Al Qaeda leadership isn’t going to prevent copycat cells, and it isn’t going to change a failed policy in Iraq,” Ms. Harman said on CNN’s “Late Edition.” “This administration is trying to change the subject. I don’t think voters are going to buy that.”

In public comments on Sunday, Republican Congressional leaders did not dispute the accuracy of the reports about the intelligence estimate, although they continued to defend the American presence in Iraq.

”I think it’s obvious that the difficulties we’ve experienced in Iraq have certainly emboldened” terrorist groups, Senator John McCain, an Arizona Republican, said on the CBS News program “Face the Nation.”

“But I would also argue that these people didn’t need any motivation to attack us on Sept. 11,” he said.

The intelligence estimate, an assessment by America’s 16 intelligence agencies, found that the war in Iraq, rather than stemming the growth of terrorism, had helped fuel its spread across the globe.

The estimate was completed in April, and is the first formal review of global terrorism by the United States since the Iraq war began. More than a dozen government officials and terrorism experts described the estimate to The New York Times, but spoke on condition of anonymity because its contents are classified.

Several of the lawmakers who appeared on Sunday talk shows said they had not seen the classified document, whose disclosure comes weeks before the Nov. 7 elections. Intelligence reports from American spy agencies are not circulated widely on Capitol Hill, and Congressional officials said neither the House nor the Senate intelligence committees had been formally briefed on the report.

In a statement released Sunday, the White House said the characterization of the report in The New York Times “is not representative of the complete document.” The White House did not release any specifics about the report, citing the fact that it was classified.

John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, said in a statement on Sunday that conclusions about the Iraq war are only a part of the overall intelligence assessment, and that viewing the reports conclusions “through the narrow prism of a fraction of judgments distorts the broad framework they create.”

“While there is much that remains to be done in the war on terror, we have achieved some notable successes against the global jihadist threat,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068774

The White House also issued three pages of excerpts from recent speeches by President Bush, including remarks about the continuing threats from terrorist groups inspired by Al Qaeda.

The House Democratic leader, Nancy Pelosi of California, said in a statement that news reports about the intelligence estimate were "further proof that the war in Iraq is making it harder for America to fight and win the war on terror."

Her Senate Democratic counterpart, Harry Reid of Nevada, said that "no election-year White House P.R. campaign can hide this truth — it is crystal clear that America's security demands we change course in Iraq."

Democrats Use Intelligence Report To Attack GOP On Iraq (USAT/AP)

By Nedra Pickler

USA Today, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats on Sunday seized on an intelligence assessment that said the Iraq war has increased the terrorist threat. They said it was further evidence that Americans should choose new leadership in the November elections.

The Democrats hoped the report would undermine the GOP's image as the party more capable of handing terrorism as the campaign enters its final six-week stretch.

Their criticisms came in a collection of statements sent to reporters Sunday after the disclosure of a National Intelligence Estimate that concluded the war has helped create a new generation of Islamic radicalism and that the overall terrorist threat has grown since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The report was completed in April and represented a consensus view of the 16 disparate spy services inside government, according to an intelligence official. The official, confirming accounts first published in Sunday's New York Times and Washington Post, spoke on condition of anonymity on Sunday because the report is classified.

"Unfortunately this report is just confirmation that the Bush administration's stay-the-course approach to the Iraq war has not just made the war more difficult and more deadly for our troops but has also made the war on terror more dangerous for every American," said Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, head of the Democratic effort to take control of the House.

A White House spokesman, Blair Jones, said, "We don't comment on classified documents." But he said the published accounts' "characterization of the (National Intelligence Estimate) is not representative of the complete document."

The White House issued a written rebuttal that argued administration officials have been making some of the same arguments as in the intelligence estimate. A White House strategy booklet released this month described the terrorists as more dispersed and still a threat to the United States.

President Bush said on Sept. 5 that "terrorist danger remains" and the broader terrorist movement is becoming more self-directed. The president also has said the United States is safer since the Sept. 11 attacks and that fighting the terrorists in Iraq keeps them from attacking America. He has said leaving Iraq would make the world less safe.

Democrats said Bush had misled people about Iraq's contribution to the terrorist threat. California Rep. Jane Harman, the leading Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee and one of a few lawmakers to have read the report, said she agrees with the findings. "Even capturing the remaining top al-Qaeda leadership isn't going to prevent copycat cells, and it isn't going to change a failed policy in Iraq," she said.

In congressional races across the country, Democratic candidates used the report to attack their opponents and tie them to Bush's faltering strategy. In New York, for example, Democratic challenger Kirsten Gillibrand pointed to the report and said GOP Rep. John Sweeney "has supported President Bush 100% of the time on Iraq, refusing to ask tough questions or push for honest answers."

"Now is the time for a new direction, and real accountability and oversight," she said. Gillibrand called for U.S. forces to be moved out of Iraq within six months to a year.

Three leading Republicans — Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky — said it is vital that U.S. troops stay in Iraq. None of them had seen the classified report, but they were responding to media coverage of it.

Frist said Americans understand the nation must continue to fight terrorists in Iraq and elsewhere. "Either we are going to be fighting this battle, this war overseas, or it's going to be right here in this country," he said on ABC's This Week.

McCain told CBS' Face the Nation that if the United States failed, "then our problems will be much more complicated."

At least one Republican — Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania — said he was very concerned about the intelligence report and agreed that the war had intensified Islamic fundamentalism. "I think there is a much more fundamental issue as to how we respond," he said on CNN's Late Edition. "And that is what we do with the Iraq war itself. That's the focal point for inspiring more radical Islam fundamentalism, and that's a problem that nobody seems to have an answer to."

Leaked Intelligence Report Rocks Bush Election Stance (AFP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0068775

By David Millikin

AFP, September 25, 2006

US spy agencies dropped a political bombshell six weeks before national elections, with the leak of a classified report concluding that the war in Iraq has spawned a new wave of Islamic radicalism and increased the global threat of terrorism.

The intelligence document rocked a central pillar of the Republican Party's campaign platform ahead of November elections: that the 2003 invasion of Iraq and the ouster of Saddam Hussein made America safer, not weaker.

With opinion polls showing President George W. Bush's party possibly losing control of both houses of Congress in the the mid-term polls, in large part due to unhappiness over the war in Iraq, the report stating categorically the opposite will make for painful reading at the White House.

Bush has argued repeatedly in pre-election speeches that Iraq is the central front in the war on terrorism and that demands for a US troop withdrawal from the country by the opposition Democrats underscores why the center-left party should not be trusted with the nation's security.

"The security of the civilized world depends on victory in the war on terror, and that depends on victory in Iraq," Bush said in one speech on August 31.

Such assertions were looking decidedly shaky Sunday after The New York Times and The Washington Post released details of the classified National Intelligence Estimate, the most comprehensive assessment yet of the war, based on analyses of all 16 of America's intelligence agencies.

The report, Trends in Global Terrorism: Implications for the United States, says "the Iraq war has made the overall terrorism problem worse," an official familiar with the document told The Times.

The Washington Post said the report described the Iraq conflict as the primary recruiting vehicle for violent Islamic extremists.

While the US has seriously damaged Al-Qaeda and disrupted its ability to carry out major operations since the September 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington, it noted, radical Islamic networks have spread and decentralized.

Democratic leaders were quick to jump on the report's conclusions as clear evidence of the failure of Bush's policies.

"This intelligence document should put the final nail in the coffin for president Bush's phony argument about the Iraq war," Senator Edward Kennedy said in a statement Sunday.

"The fact that we need a new direction in Iraq to really win the war on terror and make Americans safer could not be clearer or more urgent -- yet this administration stubbornly clings to a failed 'stay-the-course' strategy," he said.

The White House, while reiterating its traditional stance of not commenting on classified reports, said The New York Times story "isn't representative of the complete document."

"We've always said that the terrorists are determined. Keeping the pressure on and staying on the offense is the best way to win the war on terror," a White House spokesman added.

But the leaked intelligence report is hardly good news for Bush and the Republicans, coming on top of a messy revolt by top Republican senators against a Bush plan for legitimizing how the US interrogates and prosecutes terrorist suspects.

The Senate rebels, who included possible candidates to succeed Bush in 2008, reached a compromise agreement with the White House late this week.

But the unseemly row already diverted attention from Republican efforts to present a unified front on the issue of national security during the final stretch of the election campaign.

Republican leaders tried to brush aside the intelligence document, which they said they had not yet seen.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist expressed confidence US voters would not be swayed by the intelligence report.

"I think the American people, when they read an article like that ... say, 'Listen, just keep me safe -- I just want to be safe in Nashville, Tennessee, I want to be safe in Memphis, New York City, Washington, DC,' that's what they want."

However, one moderate Republican, Arlen Specter, told CNN, "The war in Iraq has intensified Islam fundamentalism and radicalism."

"There is a much more fundamental issue as to how we respond. And that is, what we do with the Iraq war itself," he said.

"That's the focal point for inspiring more radical Islam fundamentalism, and that's a problem that nobody seems to have an answer to," Specter said.

Intelligence Findings Present Political Obstacle For Republicans (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - A newly disclosed intelligence assessment that contradicts President Bush's claim that the war in Iraq has made America safer also casts doubt on the Republican campaign strategy for the November elections.

DOJ_NMG_0068776

Democrats seized on the intelligence findings Sunday to challenge Republican assertions that Bush and his congressional allies offer the best protection against terrorists. The assessment, the consensus opinion of the entire federal intelligence network, concluded that the Iraq war has fueled Islamic extremism and contributed to the spread of terror cells.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said in a prepared statement that the intelligence analysis "should be the final nail in the coffin for President Bush's phony argument about the Iraq war."

"Despite what President Bush says," Kennedy said, "the intelligence community has reported the plain truth - the misguided war in Iraq has metastasized and spread terrorism like cancer around the world."

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi said the analysis is "further proof that the war in Iraq is making it harder for America to fight and win the war on terror." She said Bush "should read the intelligence carefully before giving another misleading speech about progress in the war on terrorism."

White House officials declined to discuss the classified intelligence findings, which were disclosed in Sunday editions of The New York Times and The Washington Post. The assessment came in a report known as a National Intelligence Estimate, which reflects the consensus view of 16 government intelligence services, including the CIA.

The newspapers did not offer direct quotations from the report, relying instead on characterizations of the document by unnamed government officials. White House spokesman Peter Watkins suggested that the newspaper accounts did not provide the full story, but he declined to elaborate because the report remains classified.

The classified report was completed in April, but disclosed just six weeks before congressional elections that are likely to hinge on national security issues.

Republican strategists are hoping that voter confidence in Bush's handling of terrorism will help their party retain control of Congress.

"The Bush administration lives or dies, in terms of national security, on the claim that they have indeed made America safer," said Dennis Goldford, a political science professor at Drake University in Des Moines, Iowa. "This is at the heart of the Republican rationale for continued control of government." He called the report "kryptonite for Superman," referring to the substance that disabled the comic book hero.

But Goldford said the political impact depends on "how skillful the Democrats are in exploiting" the newly disclosed intelligence findings.

"Never underestimate the Republicans' ability to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear, and never underestimate the Democrats' ability to make a sow's ear out of a silk purse," he said.

Polls indicate that Bush's handling of the war on terrorism remains a strong point for Republicans, despite widespread discontent with the war in Iraq. A recent Gallup Poll found that 57 percent of Americans think the war on terrorism is going well.

Bush has played up his strength with a series of recent speeches linking Iraq to the broader war on terrorism and defending his national security record. Watkins, the White House spokesman, echoed the president's previous remarks when asked Sunday to respond to the intelligence assessment.

"Terrorists are determined, and we're taking the fight to them," Watkins said. "We're keeping the pressure on and staying on the offensive, and that's the best way to win the war on terror."

But even some Republicans acknowledged that the intelligence report undermines Bush's claims that his decision to invade Iraq has made America safer. Appearing on CNN, Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, agreed that the Iraq war has become "a focal point for inspiring more radical Islam fundamentalism."

The Gallup Poll was based on phone interviews with 1,003 adults on Sept 15-17. The range of accuracy is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

White House Blamed On Terror Bill (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, September 25, 2006

While much of the attention on last week's intraparty Republican dispute over the interrogation of terror suspects focused on a standoff between the White House and moderate Senate Republicans, Congressional Republicans and Democrats say the Bush administration's continued misreading of Capitol Hill had at least as much to do with the scuffle.

Although a full-scale political disaster was avoided late last week when moderates, led by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), agreed to a modified version of President Bush's tribunal system and rules governing interrogation techniques, the skirmish also resulted in the squandering of several legislative days, which makes it more difficult — if not impossible — for Congress to pass a number of big-ticket items, including a package of lobbying and ethics reforms that Members might have been able to tout when they hit the campaign trail back home.

DOJ_NMG_0068777

In late July, sources said, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) pressed the White House to propose legislation before lawmakers left for the August recess, so that talks could begin during the break and allow the worst of the infighting to occur while the public wasn't focused on Congress.

Frist had hoped to engineer a floor schedule that allowed for passage of the terrorism tribunal bill as well as a handful of appropriations bills and any other measures he could squeeze in.

"Sending the bill up before the August recess would have likely locked in the three Senators who ultimately decided to head their own way," a senior GOP aide said. Those three were McCain, Armed Services Chairman John Warner (R-Va.) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

The aide added that the bill Frist and Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) drafted "was based on representations from those three Members on some of the critical issues that got into play. Additionally, any fights kicked off during the sleepy days of summer would have been ignored by the general public and given us extra time to set the fight up, because the complaints would have come from Democrats and liberal interest groups —great opponents in a debate like this."

The White House rejected that timeline. A White House spokeswoman said the timing of the bill was strictly a matter of the issue's complexity.

"This is something that's never been done before," the spokeswoman said, adding that at the time of the August recess, the White House was still in the process of consulting with Members of Congress and other legal experts. "At the beginning of August the cake hadn't been fully baked," the spokeswoman said.

However, "people [on Capitol Hill] felt as though they were being gamed at the time, and in retrospect, some argue that the administration clearly stalled on the bill to help set up the play on moving the 14 terrorists and demanding a bill so they could go to trial," a GOP source close to the issue said.

Personality conflicts that have plagued Bush's relations with the Senate also played a role in delaying the talks, aides said.

During most of Bush's tenure as president, his relations with Congress, especially with the Senate, have been marked by what many Members and aides of both parties characterize as indifference on the part of the president to the role of Congress as an independent branch of government.

"Unfortunately, it seemed to get a little too personal at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue for a while, which also contributed to a real slow down and needless confrontation," one aide said, adding that "folks got a little too invested in specific legislative language, rather than keeping their eye on the big picture and looking at different ways to skin the cat to keep the program open and classified information protected."

Do Unto Your Enemy... (NYT)

By Paul Rieckhoff

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

IN 2002, I attended the Infantry Officer Basic Course at Fort Benning, Ga. At "the Schoolhouse," every new Army infantry officer spent six months studying the basics of his craft, including the rules of war.

I remember a seasoned senior officer explaining the importance of the Geneva Conventions. He said, "When an enemy fighter knows he'll be treated well by United States forces if he is captured, he is more likely to give up."

A year later on the streets of Baghdad, I saw countless insurgents surrender when faced with the prospect of a hot meal, a pack of cigarettes and air-conditioning. America's moral integrity was the single most important weapon my platoon had on the streets of Iraq. It saved innumerable lives, encouraged cooperation with our allies and deterred Iraqis from joining the growing insurgency.

But those days are over. America's moral standing has eroded, thanks to its flawed rationale for war and scandals like Abu Ghraib, Guantánamo and Haditha. The last thing we can afford now is to leave Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions open to reinterpretation, as President Bush proposed to do and can still do under the compromise bill that emerged last week.

Blurring the lines on the letter of Article 3 — it governs the treatment of prisoners of war, prohibiting "violence to life and person, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture" and "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment" — will only make our troops' tough fight even tougher. It will undermine the power of all the Geneva Conventions, immediately endanger American troops captured by the enemy and create a powerful recruiting tool for Al Qaeda.

But the fight over Article 3 concerns not only Al Qaeda and the war in Iraq. It also affects future wars, because when we lower the bar for the treatment of our prisoners, other countries feel justified in doing the same. Four years ago in Liberia, in an attempt to preserve his corrupt authority, President Charles Taylor adopted the Bush administration's phrase "unlawful combatants" to describe prisoners he wished to try outside of civilian courts. Today Mr. Taylor stands before The Hague accused of war crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0068778

It is not hard to imagine that one of our Special Forces soldiers might one day be captured by Iranian forces while investigating a potential nuclear weapons program. What is to stop that soldier from being water-boarded, locked in a cold room for days without sleep as Iranian pop music blares all around him — and finally sentenced to die without a fair trial or the right to see the evidence against him?

If America continues to erode the meaning of the Geneva Conventions, we will cede the ground upon which to prosecute dictators and warlords. We will also become unable to protect our troops if they are perceived as being no more bound by the rule of law than dictators and warlords themselves.

The question facing America is not whether to continue fighting our enemies in Iraq and beyond but how to do it best. My soldiers and I learned the hard way that policy at the point of a gun cannot, by itself, create democracy. The success of America's fight against terrorism depends more on the strength of its moral integrity than on troop numbers in Iraq or the flexibility of interrogation options.

Several Republican combat veterans, including former Secretary of State Colin Powell and Senators Lindsay Graham, John McCain and John Warner, have recognized that the president's stance on Article 3 is a threat to our troops and to our interests. It would be insulting for the president to assume he knows more about war than they do.

But the compromise the president struck with the senators last week leaves the most significant questions unresolved. The veterans must hold their ground — and the White House must recognize that our troops need all the moral authority they can get.

Firing Potent Words, From A Tank (NYT)

By Arthur T. Hadley

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

I'M pleased that President Bush has said he will enforce the letter and spirit of the Geneva Conventions. I hope he stays true to his word.

My great respect for the conventions developed not from afar, but from the ground, in the Second World War, at the dirty-boot level, where the bullet meets the soldier.

As a young Army lieutenant, I had the job of making clear to the enemy, via loud speaker or leaflet-filled artillery shells, that the accords would be honored. Over and over, from Normandy to the Elbe, in tanks and in foxholes, my sergeants and I would say in German, "You will be well handled according to the Geneva Conventions."

How did I find myself in this line of work? I started out with the Tank Destroyer Forces. But in one of Gen. George Marshall's few mistakes, the destroyers were disbanded. Noting that I spoke some German, the Army then placed me as a second lieutenant in a German-speaking unit. Some of us made broadcasts; others interviewed captured German soldiers to discover ways to damage their morale.

This work was new to us and the Army, and we made up our rules as we went along. Through interviews with prisoners, we soon discovered that reminding Germans that they would be treated according to the Geneva Conventions was one of the most effective ways to persuade them to surrender.

Our broadcasts, then, took on the following structure: first, we'd outline what we knew about the German position; second, we'd describe the weight of artillery and air power that was about to fall on them; finally, we'd end with assurances that those troops who surrendered would be well treated under the Geneva Conventions.

Loudspeaker missions were not popular, as the Germans most often tried to shut them up with heavy fire. Initially, we'd place our speakers near the front lines and then run cables to the relative safety of the foxhole from which we'd broadcast.

Having trained as a "tanker," I hoped to get loudspeakers off the ground and mounted on tanks, where they would be mobile and infinitely more effective during an attack. It was a wish that would not be fulfilled overnight: I was a young lieutenant in the position of having to persuade a tank general to give up a fighting vehicle for a loudspeaker.

Eventually, and somewhat to my surprise, I succeeded. After the Battle of the Bulge, I received the O.K. to mount a loudspeaker on a light tank of the Second Armored Division. At the same time an O.S.S. agent placed a loudspeaker on a Third Armored Division tank. He unfortunately was soon killed. This left my "talking tank," as the Second Armored Division tank became known, as a pioneer.

At last, we could broadcast our message during an attack. This was an advantage because the enemy was more likely to surrender during an attack than after the battle had quieted down.

The jury-rigged tank also worked remarkably well. The loudspeaker itself was mounted on the forward slope of the turret and partly covered by a metal casing that resisted light machine-gun fire. The generator was set over the engine in the rear, totally covered. All the tank's weapons could operate, though the wires attached to the speaker limited turret motion. Some of the ammunition racks inside the tank were removed and the amplifiers for the loudspeaker fastened to the steel insides.

DOJ_NMG_0068779

We broadcasters lived in the turret, the tank driver was forward in the driver's compartment and the electrician who maintained the loudspeaker and electronic equipment occupied the assistant driver's seat.

Having trained as a tanker, I was familiar with tank combat. I could work the radios and fire the guns. I usually placed the tank as No. 3 in an attack column. There, it could broadcast immediately without interfering with the two point tanks as they checked right and left.

We were a success. In three weeks fighting beyond the Rhine in 1945, the Second Armored Division credited the talking tank for the surrender of 5,000 prisoners. The actions of the other tankers were also crucial. Their willingness to hold their fire gave surrenders a chance to happen. Germans had time to weigh the alternatives: an attack from our tanks versus imprisonment under the Geneva Conventions. In this way, American and German lives were saved.

The British had a similar strategy, though they did not use loudspeakers. They had a truck-drawn trailer with a radio broadcast studio and station inside. Led by Marius Goring (famous, later, as the hero of "The Red Shoes"), this unit would interview cooperative German prisoners and broadcast their reactions to their capture into Germany. In these broadcasts Goring would get prisoners to stress that while being a prisoner was no pleasure, they were treated fairly under the Geneva Conventions.

Yes, times have changed. Yes, we face a different enemy from the one we faced half a century ago. But I've seen firsthand the power of Geneva Conventions, both to compel surrenders and to broadcast, for the world, our determination to live up to our highest ideals.

McCain Names Practices Detainee Bill Would Bar (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

A Republican senator who played a leading role in drafting new rules for U.S. interrogations of terrorism suspects said yesterday that he believes a compromise bill embraced by party leaders and the White House will bar some of most extreme techniques said to have been used by the CIA.

Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) named three measures that he said would no longer be allowed under a provision barring techniques that cause serious mental or physical suffering by U.S. detainees: extreme sleep deprivation, forced hypothermia and "waterboarding," which simulates drowning. He also said other "extreme measures" would be banned.

McCain's remarks were unusual because public officials involved in the lengthy public debate about U.S. interrogation practices have rarely made specific references to the CIA's actions, choosing instead to make general claims about the need for rough interrogations or a desire to stop abusive behavior.

"It's clear we have to have the high moral ground," said McCain, a former POW tortured by prison guards in Vietnam, on CBS's "Face The Nation." "I am confident that some of the abuses that were reportedly committed in the past will be prohibited in the future."

McCain spoke after officials of Human Rights Watch and others pressed him to spell out ways in which the controversial draft legislation would constrain the CIA's actions. The bill, introduced in the Senate on Friday, does not mention specific interrogation methods, causing some experts to say it would leave room for abuses. President Bush endorsed the bill after CIA Director Michael V. Hayden said it meets his agency's needs.

McCain, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) and their staffs were heavily involved in drafting the bill's language, so McCain's reading of it may carry weight in any future court battle over its meaning. Aides said he did not clear his remarks with the Bush administration in advance, and spokesmen for the CIA and the White House declined to say yesterday whether they accepted McCain's conclusions.

"We cannot and will not comment on specific interrogation measures," CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said, adding that the agency will act lawfully. The CIA has claimed unofficially that its most extreme measures were used on only a handful of detainees.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who wants to shepherd the detainee bill to congressional passage this week, also declined to give a specific reading of it yesterday. Asked repeatedly on ABC's "This Week" what the legislation would allow, Frist said, "I'm not going to comment on individual techniques," and he condemned doing so.

"No responsible person is going to come in and basically say, 'These are the 10 techniques we use and these are the 10 that are not used,' " said Frist, who is sometimes mentioned as a McCain rival for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. "It helps the terrorists."

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) yesterday praised the bill as "a big improvement" over the administration's initial proposals. But he said on CNN's "Late Edition" that he opposes provisions in it that would bar terrorism suspects from challenging their detention or treatment in federal court. "That has to be changed," said Specter, who plans to hold a hearing on the issue this morning.

DOJ_NMG_0068780

The proposed legislation does not say what interrogators can do. Instead, it states indirectly, in amendments to the 10-year-old War Crimes Act, that those who cause detainees "severe or serious physical or mental pain or suffering" can be charged with a felony. This includes, according to the bill's definitions, anyone who causes serious physical abuse, a substantial risk of death, extreme physical pain, burns or serious physical disfigurement, or a loss or impairment of "the function of a bodily member, organ, or mental faculty."

The bill would also replace an existing ban on interrogation practices that cause "prolonged" mental pain or suffering with a more sweeping ban on those that inflict "serious and non-transitory mental harm (which need not be prolonged)." This provision would be applicable only to interrogations that occur after the date the legislation is passed -- and thus it would effectively immunize from prosecution any CIA interrogators who have inflicted short-term but serious mental harm on detainees.

The White House had preferred to bar questioning that caused "severe" and "prolonged" harm, while McCain and his allies sought to obstruct interrogations that caused "almost instantaneous" mental harm. "If the detainee faints, that is not what we were trying to capture," said one of the congressional negotiators, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive negotiations. "But we wanted to prohibit anything that would cause a lasting effect, or anything that would go up to that line."

The CIA exposed some of the estimated 100 people held at various times in its foreign prison system to temperature extremes, lengthy sleep deprivation and stress positions such as prolonged forced standing, officials said. But the agency never fully briefed McCain, Graham or their staffs on the interrogations, a circumstance that handicapped the discussions last week.

McCain was nonetheless particularly adamant that the CIA be permanently blocked from using waterboarding, which he regards as torture, even though intelligence officials have said privately that it has not been used for several years. McCain -- who has previously described being beaten and painfully bound by ropes in Vietnam -- said yesterday he recognized that stress positions could be "important" and that while it "was never our intent" to stop the CIA interrogation program, he wanted to stop the "extreme application" of such techniques.

As lawmakers and officials struggled to find compromise language, they consulted a dictionary Web site's entries for the words "momentary," "temporary," "transitory" and "fleeting," two congressional sources said.

The key to the deal, congressional sources said, was the Senate lawmakers' acceptance of national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley's demand that violations of the ban on serious, non-transitory and not necessarily prolonged mental harm could bring prosecution only for future interrogations. The demand grew out of CIA and Justice Department concerns that interrogators would be exposed to war-crimes charges for their past actions.

Alberto J. Mora -- who opposed the administration's interrogation policies while serving as the Navy's judge advocate general from 2001 until the end of last year -- said in May that "we know the treatment may have reached the level of torture in some instances." Mora's remarks referred to detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and elsewhere.

McConnell: Democrats AWOL In Terror War (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

As Republicans patch up their differences over how to handle the terrorism suspects held at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, they are turning their sights on Democrats in time for the November elections.

Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell on Friday took issue with Minority Leader Harry Reid over his comments earlier in the week that Democrats were "on the sidelines watching the catfights" among Republicans on terrorism legislation.

"The minority leader indicated that they were sitting on the sidelines during our internal discussion about how best to craft this proposal," the Kentucky Republican told reporters gathered in his office. "I don't think sitting on the sidelines in the war on terror is a good idea. We have to have as much bipartisan cooperation as possible."

In the wake of last week's deal among Republicans on how to try terrorism suspects, Democrats also sought to gain a political foothold before the November elections.

"Democrats are united behind the need to work on a bipartisan basis to bring terrorists to justice and to do it in a manner consistent with our laws, our values and our national security," Mr. Reid said last week as news spread that a deal had been reached.

"Hopefully, today's press conference means that President Bush and the congressional Republican leadership have changed course and listened to numerous national security experts, such as General Colin Powell," he said. "Five years after 9/11, it is time to make the tough and smart decisions to give the American people the real security they deserve."

But in the sure-to-be hectic final week before Congress adjourns for the elections, fissures remain between the parties and also among Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0068781

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert wants to include this week in the must-pass defense funding bill the Community Protection Act, aimed at deporting members of criminal alien gangs. In addition, the Illinois Republican wants to include bipartisan court-security measures passed in the wake of last year's retaliatory slaying of Chicago federal Judge Joan Lefkow's family.

"The speaker is not going to let the bill move until these critical security items get in," said Ron Bonjean, Mr. Hastert's spokesman.

But despite bipartisan support that includes Minority Whip Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the court-security provisions aren't going anywhere, a Republican leadership aide said. At the request of Democrats on the Armed Services Committee, Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, won't include the measure, the Republican said.

"Senator Warner is kowtowing to liberal Democrats who are rolling over Durbin's ability to get it done," a House GOP leadership aide said. "It looks like Senator Durbin doesn't have the juice to control his own Democrats so we can protect our nation's judges."

Mr. Warner's spokesman declined to comment yesterday.

Regardless of what Republicans accomplish in this final week, Mr. McConnell dismissed Democrat charges that this has been a "do-nothing" Congress. This, he said Friday, is the "most accomplished Congress in the 22 years that I've been here." And he said he's not worried about November's contest.

"This election will not just be about us. It will be a choice -- a choice between us and them," Mr. McConnell said. "A lot of Americans have forgotten what Democrats do when they're in the majority. We're going to remind them. They'll retreat in the war on terror, they'll raise taxes, and they'll impeach the president."

Specter Decries Detainee Bill Provision (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, September 25, 2006

The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Sunday he has a problem with the Republican agreement on rules for the interrogation and trial of suspects in the war on terror.

President Bush is pushing Congress to put the agreement into law before adjourning for the midterm elections, but Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Sunday he "vigorously" disagrees with the habeas corpus provision of the bill.

The provision would allow legal counsel and a day in court to only those detainees selected by the Pentagon for prosecution. Other terror suspects could be held indefinitely without a hearing.

"The courts have traditionally been open to make sure that individual rights are protected, and that is fundamental," Specter said on CNN's "Late Edition. "And the Constitution says when you can suspend the writ of habeas corpus, in time of rebellion or invasion. And we don't have either. So that has to be changed, in my opinion."

Specter scheduled a hearing on the issue for Monday. Otherwise, he said, most of the legislation is a "big improvement" over what Bush originally proposed.

The White House was forced to make concessions by a group of Senate Republicans who objected to the harsh treatment that would be allowed against detainees. The Bush administration agreed to drop one provision narrowly interpreting international standards of prisoner treatment and another allowing defendants to be convicted on evidence they never see.

The bill lists acts that would constitute war crimes, including torture, rape, biological experiments and cruel and inhuman treatment. White House officials said these provisions would provide the CIA the clarity it needs to continue with the interrogation of its most valued suspects.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said Sunday he expected the bill would pass before Congress adjourns.

"It's very important, because right now these detainees that we have down in Guantanamo Bay right now, we can't even try them now," Frist said on ABC's "This Week." "Right now, unless we pass this bill, we cannot have an interrogation program continue that we know has been lifesaving that has uncovered terrorist attacks against the United States."

Specter Criticizes Deal Reached On Detainee Treatment (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

The Republican chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee says the compromise deal on terrorism-detainee legislation reached last week "has to be changed," and that he will "vigorously oppose" a section of the bill that strips the detainees of their right to appeal to the federal courts.

DOJ_NMG_0068782

Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania spoke for the first time yesterday about the compromise reached last week between the White House and three leading Republican senators on legislation that sets standards for interrogating and trying suspected terrorists held in U.S. military custody.

"Most of it is a big improvement," Mr. Specter told CNN of the bill, which was published Friday. "But there's one part that I vigorously disagree with, and that is taking away the jurisdiction of the federal courts on what we call habeas corpus."

Habeas corpus is an ancient legal doctrine dating back to the origins of English common law in the Magna Carta of 1215, under which anyone held by the government can challenge his detention -- forcing the courts to rule on its legality.

The bill would effectively remove the right of those detained outside of the United States or those defined by U.S. authorities as "unlawful enemy combatants" to challenge their detention in court. It would also sweep away a number of cases already proceeding through the courts, according to the Morton Sklar, executive director of the World Organization for Human Rights.

"The absence of any reliable and objective means of challenging the U.S. government action in court makes a mockery of even the more limited protections set out in this proposed bill," Mr. Sklar said. Without habeas corpus, "there is no realistic way for a victim to bring problems to a court's attention and to seek redress."

In advance of hearings on the issue today, Mr. Specter pointed out that habeas petitions to the federal courts by detainees at the U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, had been the basis of the U.S. Supreme Court cases that forced the administration to revise the rules for their treatment and their trial by military commission.

Congress had punted on the issue, he said, calling the matter "too hot to handle."

"The federal courts just have to be open" to these cases, he said, noting that the Constitution allows the suspension of habeas corpus only "in time of rebellion or invasion."

"And we don't have either," Mr. Specter added, "So that has to be changed, in my opinion."

Last week, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, Carl Levin of Michigan, said he would work with Mr. Specter to eliminate the restrictions on habeas. Opposition to the habeas provisions of the detainee bill further complicates an already tricky legislative task for the Republican leadership in the Senate, which will wrap up for the election recess at the end of the week.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, brought the compromise detainee bill to the floor Friday, using a special procedure enabling him to bypass the committees of jurisdiction. But he also brought a bill to the floor combining that measure with one that authorizes President Bush's program of warrantless wiretaps of suspected terrorists.

One senior Democratic Senate staffer said that including the wiretapping provision could complicate the issue because a number of Republicans oppose parts of that bill.

"The question is, if someone objects [to parts of the bill], will he have the votes to make cloture?" the staffer asked, referring to the parliamentary procedure required to vote on the matter.

Habeas Corpus Not Needed (USAT)

By James S. Robbins

USA Today, September 25, 2006

Extending the rights of habeas corpus to individuals detained during the war on terrorism would be an unnecessary and dangerous step.

The foreign detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and elsewhere do not have the same status as criminals. These people are not being held for rehabilitation or as punishment. The detainees are precisely that, detained. Some are useful for purposes of intelligence exploitation. Others are held simply to keep them from returning to the battlefield to kill Americans.

According to the Geneva Conventions, prisoners (even legitimate POWs) may be held for the duration of hostilities without trials. We did not try prisoners during World War II, for example. The notion would have been thought absurd. Some have observed that the detainees potentially face lifetime detention if hostilities continue, but this is because their leaders refuse to end their jihad against the United States.

Furthermore, it is not as though all detainees are held for life. Approximately 315 of the 770 Guantanamo detainees have been determined by review boards not to be threats and have been released. Scores more are awaiting release to whatever countries that will accept them. There are few takers.

Note that our review process is not foolproof; for example, Maulvi Abdul Ghaffar, released from Guantanamo, renewed his career as a Taliban commander before being killed in 2004.

It is not true that the detainees have been held without due process. The debate over the McCain amendment to the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 was an attempt to define exactly what process was due. Congress chose not to include habeas corpus in this bundle of rights, leaving the question of detainee status to the Combatant Status Review Tribunals. The Constitution gives Congress the right to suspend the "privilege" of habeas corpus in the interest of public safety.

DOJ_NMG_0068783

Even if one assumes foreigners who have taken up arms against the United States enjoy the same rights as citizens, in the end Congress makes the call.

James S. Robbins is senior fellow on national security affairs at the American Foreign Policy Council and author of Last in Their Class: Custer, Pickett and the Goats of West Point.

Scepticism Over Bin Laden 'death' (FT)

By Martin Arnold And Farhan Bokhari

Financial Times, September 25, 2006

A leaked French intelligence report claiming Saudi Arabia's secret services had confirmed the death of Osama bin Laden, the leader of the al-Qaeda terrorist network, met with widespread scepticism on Sunday.

Saudi, Pakistani, US and western officials all said they were unable to confirm the death of the world's most wanted man.

The frantic speculation was sparked by publication of a leaked report from the DGSE (France's foreign intelligence agency) by the French regional newspaper L'Est Républicain on Saturday.

The report said: "The information gathered by the Saudis indicates that the head of al-Qaeda fell victim, while he was in Pakistan on August 23 2006, to a very serious case of typhoid that led to a partial paralysis of his lower limbs. They are waiting to get more details, notably the exact place of his burial, before officially announcing the news."

But a statement from the Saudi embassy in Washington said: "The kingdom of Saudi Arabia has no evidence to support recent media reports that Osama bin Laden is dead. Information that has been reported otherwise is purely speculative and cannot be independently verified."

A senior Pakistani security official said: "There was as yet no independent confirmation of this report. Basically, we don't know if bin Laden is alive or dead. Nobody knows for certain."

He said news of Mr bin Laden's death had circulated before, making it difficult to separate fact from fiction. "Right now, no one wants to confirm [bin Laden's death] unless there is hard physical evidence. But everyone is aware that bin Laden may be a dying man if his health is as bad as we have heard in the past."

The timing of the report's publication also raised eyebrows, as it coincided with an informal summit of the leaders of France, Germany and Russia on Saturday.

Jacques Chirac, France's president, ordered the defence ministry to open an investigation into the leaked report, which was sent to the president, prime minister, and defence, foreign and interior ministries.

World Leaders Skeptical Of Bin Laden Death Report (USAT)

USA Today, September 25, 2006

PARIS — France's foreign minister said Sunday that to his knowledge, Osama bin Laden is not dead.

Philippe Douste-Blazy was the latest official to cast doubt on a leaked French intelligence document suggesting the al-Qaeda leader died of typhoid in August.

"To my knowledge, Osama bin Laden is not dead," Douste-Blazy said in a television interview on the station LCI. "To my knowledge, we are absolutely not informed either of a health problem or of the death of bin Laden."

Questions about bin Laden's fate resurfaced with the publication Saturday in L'Est Republicain, a French regional newspaper, of a leaked document from France's DGSE secret service. It cited an uncorroborated report from a "usually reliable source" who said Saudi intelligence services were convinced that bin Laden had died of a severe case of typhoid contracted Aug. 23 in Pakistan.

France's Defense Ministry confirmed that the document, reportedly sent to French President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, was not false. However, French authorities stressed that the raw, unconfirmed information was questionable.

"This information is in no way whatsoever confirmed," Chirac said at a news conference Saturday.

Officials across the globe dismissed the report as speculation.

·The Saudi Arabian Embassy in Washington said it had no evidence to support the report. "Information that has been reported otherwise is purely speculative and cannot be independently verified," the embassy said in a statement on its website.

·"No comment, no knowledge," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said when asked about the French article by reporters in New York.

·British Prime Minister Tony Blair, asked in a BBC interview whether he could shed light on the report, said: "No, I can't. I haven't heard anything that indicates that might be the case."

DOJ_NMG_0068784

·When asked Sunday about the leaked French intelligence document, Afghan President Hamid Karzai told CNN's Late Edition that Afghanistan does not have “accurate information as to the precise location of Osama bin Laden.”

Bin Laden was based in Afghanistan until its Taliban government was overthrown in 2001 by U.S.-backed forces after the 9/11 attacks on the USA. Since then, U.S. and Pakistani officials have said they believe he is hiding somewhere on the Afghanistan-Pakistan border.

Bin Laden's last videotaped message was released in late 2004. Several low-quality audiotapes have been released this year.

Karzai Says Bin Laden Not In Afghanistan (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 25, 2006

Afghan's president asserted on Sunday that Osama bin Laden has not been in his country since being chased out after the Sept. 11 attacks five years ago. But Hamid Karzai acknowledged that the al-Qaida leader's exact location is unknown.

"He has never been in our country after Sept. 11, after the strikes against him, after we chased his organization out of Afghanistan," Karzai told CNN's "Late Edition." He suggested the al-Qaida leader was in Pakistan.

When asked about a leaked French intelligence document that raised the possibility bin Laden died in Pakistan of an illness last month, Karzai said Afghanistan does not have "accurate information as to the precise location" of Osama bin Laden."

Separately, Karzai told NBC's "Meet the Press," in an interview taped last week but broadcast Sunday, that his country would be "heaven in less than a year" if it got the $300 billion the United States has spent in Iraq.

Critics of President Bush say the United States has not been able to finish rebuilding Afghanistan because it is distracted by the increasingly expensive war in Iraq.

"Three hundred billion dollars: You give that to Afghanistan and we will be in heaven in less than a year," Karzai said when asked if the money spent on Iraq would have been better spent in Afghanistan. "We definitely need more money for reconstruction."

Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., said the war in Iraq had hurt the hunt for bin Laden. She said it was a "fair certainty" the al-Qaida chief was in Pakistan's tribal area, not Afghanistan.

"Resources were not focused on this problem as we got bogged down in Iraq," she told CNN. "We should have been able to capture him within the last five years."

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., warned against making the search for bin Laden a political issue with elections weeks away. "Everybody wants to capture Osama bin Laden, and one day we will," he said.

Specter said trying to find bin Laden is "like looking for a needle in a haystack. I don't think you can say that it's anybody's fault. It's a big world. There are lots of places for him to hide."

The issue has caused friction between Karzai and Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf. Last week, they spent much of the U.N. General Assembly meeting trading barbs and criticizing each other's efforts to fight terrorists along their long, remote, mountainous border.

The United States views the region as crucial to stopping terrorism. Bush will try to diffuse tensions when the three leaders meet this week.

Pakistan rejects the accusation that it is not doing enough to stop terrorists, pointing out that it has deployed 80,000 troops along the porous border. Musharraf said last week that "the problem lies in Afghanistan, and that is creating the problem in Pakistan."

Experts See Lower Threat From Al-Qaida (AP-Y)

By Robert H. Reid And Sally Buzbee, Associated Press Writers

AP, September 25, 2006

The threats came in a blizzard around the anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks — a series of videos from al-Qaida's No. 2 warning of more strikes to come.

But U.S. intelligence agencies and many private security analysts doubt al-Qaida or its elusive leader, Osama bin Laden, still maintain much if any operational control over far-flung terror cells.

They see no sign of a direct al-Qaida hand in a flurry of recent attacks, such as the assault on the U.S. Embassy in Damascus, Syria, or the fatal shooting of a British tourist in Jordan. The French intelligence report that bin Laden may have died last month of typhoid merely highlights the uncertainty the West now has about any role he plays in the terror network.

All that means those frightening videos may have been just that — designed to frighten the West and inspire followers — with little real punch behind them.

DOJ_NMG_0068785

Bin Laden and his top deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, are now "less like generals and more like talking heads, disseminating their violent ideology via satellite television in hopes of inspiring others to do their bidding," said Eben Kaplan of the Council on Foreign Relations think tank in New York.

Not everyone agrees. There are ominous signs in Afghanistan that al-Qaida is trying to make an operational comeback as attacks, especially suicide missions, against U.S. and coalition forces increase.

Some experts also fear the absence of a major, Sept. 11-style attack simply means al-Qaida is taking its time to plan a next spectacular strike.

Still, five years after the attack on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, many analysts believe the day-to-day threat from al-Qaida itself has dropped.

Paradoxically, however, the threat from Islamic extremists may have grown — and become broader, more diverse and more complex, and thus harder to combat.

"The absence of a formal, single organizational structure has contributed to making the fight against this brand of terrorism more elusive and difficult," the British think tank Chatham House said in a report this month as the videos were airing.

That view is also expressed in a classified U.S. intelligence report that says the Iraq war has increased the threat of terrorism by stirring up Islamic extremism around the globe. The report, which represented the consensus of 16 U.S. spy services, was completed in April and first reported in Sunday's New York Times and Washington Post.

After the U.S. and its allies ousted the Taliban in 2001, al-Qaida apparently transformed itself into an ideological movement of self-sustaining cells that operate with little or no central direction, many analysts and intelligence officials believe. That makes them difficult to track — until they strike or make a mistake that leads the authorities to them.

It also makes it difficult to determine whether any specific attack was actually directed by al-Qaida.

For example, British authorities insist there is no evidence al-Qaida directed the July 2005 suicide attacks on the London transit system that killed 52 commuters.

Nonetheless, one of the four British Muslim bombers appeared later on a videotape made before his death, declaring his allegiance to bin Laden. That tape bore the logo of al-Qaida's production company.

"Al-Qaida is crippled and is certainly not the organization it was. Al-Qaida, however, has placed extra emphasis on inspiring other groups and trying to mobilize other groups," the State Department's counterterrorism coordinator, Henry Crumpton, told the Council on Foreign Relations recently.

Al-Qaida's efforts to inspire appear to be focused on a worldwide wellspring of young, radicalized Muslims who share broad anger at the West, especially the United States.

But the goals, methods and targets of those far-flung radicals now vary widely. And not all extremist groups share al-Qaida's vision of global struggle against the West, preferring in some cases to fight instead for specific national political aims.

Across the world, that means the threat is fractured into many parts — with the need to tailor defenses accordingly.

In Britain, mostly homegrown militants of Pakistani descent seem intent on staging the kind of big, spectacular attack that bin Laden used on Sept. 11.

Their efforts have focused again and again on jetliners — as during this summer's scare — and other big transportation systems such as subways.

Elsewhere, however, militants have diverged sharply from bin Laden. The assault this month on the U.S. Embassy in Damascus, Syria — which came just a day after al-Zawahri's warning tapes were aired — serves as a prime example.

In Syria, militants have focused on getting rid of President Bashar Assad and there is no sign they receive any operational direction from al-Qaida.

In Iraq, the fight has mostly morphed into a sectarian conflict between Sunnis and Shiites for control of Iraq's future, although some foreign fighters inspired by al-Qaida seem to still be involved.

Meanwhile, militants from Hamas and Hezbollah share the same hatred of the U.S. and Israel — but have sharply different ideologies and goals than al-Qaida.

Hamas is focused on gaining power among the Palestinian community at the expense of its rival Fatah. Hezbollah wants to carve a role for itself as the leader of Shiite Muslims in Lebanon and the dominant political force in that country.

In places like Sudan and Somalia, Muslim militants are fighting for local power and control. They may have links to bin Laden from the past — but their only real connection seems to be when they invoke his name to resist the West.

Chris Wallace, Caught Off Balance? (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0068786

Fox News anchor Chris Wallace said that he was stunned when Bill Clinton accused him of a "conservative hit job" after he challenged the former president on his record in fighting terrorism.

"I thought it was a fair, balanced and not especially inflammatory question," Wallace said yesterday in recounting his "Fox News Sunday" sit-down with Clinton. "I even said, 'I know hindsight is 20/20.' But he went off. And once he went off, there was no bringing him back. He wanted to talk about it in detail. He wanted to conjure up right-wingers and conservative hit jobs and a theory involving Rupert Murdoch that I still don't understand."

Fox had agreed in advance that half the interview would be about Clinton's Global Initiative forum and half about other subjects. Wallace began with a couple of questions about the initiative before citing the 1993 U.S. military withdrawal from Somalia and several bombings connected to al-Qaeda in asking, "Why didn't you do more, connect the dots and put them out of business?"

In an impassioned, finger-wagging answer, Clinton told Wallace, a former ABC News correspondent: "You did Fox's bidding on this show. You did your nice little conservative hit job on me. . . . You set this meeting up because you were going to get a lot of criticism from your viewers because Rupert Murdoch is supporting my work on climate change. And you came here under false pretenses and said that you'd spend half the time talking about . . . what we did out there to raise $7 billion-plus over three days from 215 different commitments. And you don't care."

Murdoch, the billionaire conservative who owns Fox, has recently mended fences with the Clinton family, even attending a fundraiser for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). Fox, which employs a number of high-profile conservative hosts, maintains that its reporting is straightforward but is viewed by many liberals and other critics as leaning to the right. Clinton's appearance was his first on "Fox News Sunday" in the program's 10-year history.

"We're fully aware of Fox News's and Chris Wallace's agenda, and President Clinton came in prepared to respond to any attack on his record," said Jay Carson, his spokesman. "When Wallace questioned his record on terrorism, he responded forcefully, as any Democrat would or should."

In the interview, in which Clinton also accused Wallace of having a "little smirk" on his face, the host said he had planned to spend half the allotted 15 minutes on the Global Initiative and that "I didn't think this was going to set you off on such a tear."

"It set me off on such a tear because you didn't formulate it in an honest way and you people ask me questions you don't ask the other side," Clinton said.

"Sir, that is not true," Wallace replied.

Asked about Clinton's complaint, a Fox spokeswoman pointed to Wallace's interview two weeks ago with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Wallace pressed her about the lack of prewar ties between Osama bin Laden and Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, but he did not ask about U.S. efforts against bin Laden before the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Carson noted that the 2000 bombing of the U.S.S. Cole was officially linked to al-Qaeda after Bush took office.

"I don't think I was fanning the flames here," Wallace said. "It was all generated from within him."

Clinton has on occasion scolded other interviewers, most notably in a 2004 sitdown with ABC's Peter Jennings, who drew this response after alluding to Clinton's personal misconduct: "You don't want to go here, Peter. . . . Not after what you people did and the way you, your network, what you did with Kenneth Starr. The way your people repeated every little sleazy thing he leaked."

Wallace said the surprise is not that he asked Clinton about terrorism but that no other television interviewer did during a round of appearances last week. Clinton, Wallace said, remained "upset" and "angry" after the interview.The 'Jewish' Question

How did having Jewish relatives turn into a gotcha question?

Virginia Sen. George Allen was clearly irritated last week when a WUSA-TV reporter, seemingly out of nowhere, asked at a televised debate whether his mother was Jewish. Allen dismissed the question as "irrelevant," but said a day later he had discovered that his grandfather was Jewish, and the following day that his mother had recently told him that she was raised Jewish as well.

Call it the oy vey factor: Was this yet another attempt by the media to catch a politician covering up some secret personal detail? Or was it the southerner in cowboy boots who invited scrutiny of his background by keeping the information under wraps?

It remains unclear why Channel 9's Peggy Fox posed the question to Allen during his debate with Democratic challenger James Webb. Was this a matter of pressing importance to the voters of Virginia?

Fox, who is described on WUSA's Web site as "a Fairfax County native who married her West Springfield High School sweetheart," declined to be interviewed. In an e-mail, she says: "I would love to talk to you to tell you why I asked the question. But I am not the story. Senator Allen is. I will tell you I asked the question because I wanted to find out if he was hiding a heritage he really should be proud of (like most Americans are) because he felt acknowledging his roots could cost him votes.

"The question had been asked before and not answered. To me, it doesn't matter what religion someone is, but not being genuine does. The voters have a right to know if the candidates are who they say they are."

DOJ_NMG_0068787

In an e-mail response to viewers, Fox also says: "I regret the way I worded the question and the way Senator Allen turned the spotlight onto the question itself without addressing the bigger political issue which could be relevant to the campaign."

But what is the "bigger" issue? When Allen threw the question back at her, demanding to know why it was relevant, she replied, "Honesty." Was Fox essentially accusing the candidate of lying?

In a way, the Allen campaign opened the door to Fox's question by not providing answers to the Jewish newspaper the Forward, which reported late last month that Allen's mother, Henrietta, a French Tunisian, was "likely" Jewish by birth. A week earlier, the senator's staff told Time's Mike Allen that they were not familiar with any Jewish background. The reporter says he suggested that they ask Allen if his mother has Jewish roots, "and the response was that he didn't think she does."

The senator's mother got dragged into public discussion because of speculation that Allen had picked up the word "macaca" from her. As the civilized world knows by now, Allen has apologized for using the word -- a racial slur in some cultures -- to describe an Indian American volunteer for Webb's campaign.

The press may well have overplayed the macaca gaffe -- there was no comparable frenzy over Webb saying three decades ago that the U.S. Naval Academy was "a horny woman's dream" -- but it was a self-inflicted wound that was captured on video and downloaded thousands of times on YouTube.com.

The Post last week quoted Allen's mother as saying she didn't tell her son she was Jewish until he asked about the "rumor" late last month. Why the senator didn't inquire earlier, since he's talked about his grandfather having been imprisoned by the Nazis, is an interesting question.

While politicians understandably resent journalists turning into genealogical detectives, they are rarely shy when it comes to scoring ethnic points. Allen has spoken on the campaign trail about having his "grandfather's bloodlines," namely "French Italian" and "one-sixteenth Spanish." Nor are they above trading on family connections or showcasing their spouses and children. Allen, of course, is the son of the famed football coach whose name he bears.

The list of prominent public figures who acknowledge their Jewish ancestry only after seeking or attaining public office -- John Kerry, Wesley Clark, Madeleine Albright -- is growing longer. Some appear to have made the cold calculation that it would not be a political asset.

And this goes beyond questions of Jewish heritage. When the Massachusetts senator, gearing up to run for president in 2003, said he had never claimed to be Irish, the Boston Globe reported that he had claimed Irish ancestry in a St. Patrick's Day message nearly two decades earlier.

Peggy Fox insists she is not the story. But journalists who appear on television and ask questions at televised debates -- particularly personal questions -- often become part of the story. By leaving out part of his biography for years, Allen gave her a big, fat opening. But for all the media furor, most Virginia voters probably care more about the Iraq war and the economy than the details of the senator's family tree.Liberal Media?

The "mainstream media presents itself as unbiased, when in fact there are built into it many biases, and they are overwhelmingly to the left."

The man who made that comment is not some rabid right-wing critic but Thomas Edsall, a Washington Post political reporter for a quarter-century who recently accepted an early retirement offer.

In an interview with conservative radio host Hugh Hewitt, Edsall said he is pro-choice on abortion and does not think he has ever voted for a Republican presidential candidate. He said he believes that reporters vote Democratic by somewhere between 15 to 1 and 25 to 1.

Edsall, who now writes for the New Republic and has just finished a book called "Building Red America," also said that journalists have an inherent "suspicion" of the military, and he agreed "to a certain degree" with the argument that Fox News and conservative radio became popular because many people, in Hewitt's words, "got sick and tired of being spoon-fed liberal dross" by the New York Times, Los Angeles Times and Washington Post.

In an interview, Edsall says the main problem is "an inability to empathize with the way many people in red states think and feel" but that it is "possible" for journalists to set aside their views and report fairly.

Clinton Defends How He Handled Al-Qaeda Threat (USAT)

USA Today, September 25, 2006

NEW YORK — In a combative interview on Fox News Sunday, former president Bill Clinton defended his handling of Osama bin Laden, saying he tried to have bin Laden killed and was attacked for his efforts by the same people who now criticize him for not doing enough.

“That's the difference in me and some, including all of the right-wingers who are attacking me now,” Clinton said. “They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try, they did not try.”

DOJ_NMG_0068788

Clinton said he “worked hard” to try to kill bin Laden, who orchestrated the Sept. 11 attacks eight months into President Bush's presidency.

“We contracted with people to kill him. I got closer to killing him than anybody's gotten since,” he said.

Clinton accused host Chris Wallace of a “conservative hit job” and asked: “I want to know how many people in the Bush administration you asked, ‘Why didn't you do anything about the Cole?' I want to know how many people you asked, ‘Why did you fire Dick Clarke?' ”

He was referring to the USS Cole, bombed by terrorists in 2000, and former White House anti-terrorism chief Richard Clarke, who resigned in 2003.

Wallace said Sunday that he was surprised by Clinton's “conspiratorial view” of “a very non-confrontational question, ‘Did you do enough to connect the dots and go after al-Qaeda?'”

“All I did was ask him a question, and I think it was a legitimate news question,” Wallace said in a telephone interview.

White House spokesman Peter Watkins said Bush has always been focused on pressing the fight against terrorism. As for Clinton's remarks: “The record paints a different picture than what he is suggesting.”

Terrorism analyst Steven Emerson said Clinton “obviously felt the rawness” of ABC's controversial miniseries, The Path to 9/11, which ran Sept. 7 and 8 and portrayed officials in his administration as failing to act on opportunities to kill or capture bin Laden. Emerson added that bin Laden “was not a high priority” with Bush until after 9/11.

Clinton Defends Pre-9/11 Actions (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

Former President Bill Clinton angrily defended his administration's record of combating terrorism and blamed the Bush White House for not taking Osama bin Laden seriously enough before the terrorist attacks of September 11.

"I think it's very interesting that all the conservative Republicans, who now say I didn't do enough, claimed that I was too obsessed with bin Laden" and the so-called "Wag the Dog" scenario, Mr. Clinton said yesterday during a taped interview with "Fox News Sunday."

"All of President Bush's neo-cons thought I was too obsessed with bin Laden. They had no meetings on bin Laden for nine months after I left office," he said in the contentious interview.

Mr. Clinton became so agitated that he could be seen wagging his right index finger at moderator Chris Wallace, as he did at the start of the Monica Lewinsky scandal, when he shook the same finger and told the American public that "I did not have sexual relations with that woman, Miss Lewinsky."

He later admitted an "inappropriate" relationship with the former White House intern after his DNA matched a stain on her blue dress.

In the heated exchange, he also accused Mr. Wallace of shifting his questions away from a promised discussion of the former president's Clinton Global Initiative project.

"You've got that little smirk on your face, and you think you're so clever," Mr. Clinton said. "You did your nice little conservative hit job on me."

In an interview yesterday with MediaBistro.com, Mr. Wallace noted that Mr. Clinton is "a very big man" and that he thought the former president was trying to intimidate him by getting angry.

"As he leaned forward -- wagging his finger in my face and then poking the notes I was holding -- I felt as if a mountain was coming down in front of me," Mr. Wallace said.

The interview was peppered with references to Mr. Clinton's legacy as viewed through the prism of popular culture. For instance, when defending his efforts to capture or kill bin Laden, Mr. Clinton alluded to the 1997 film "Wag the Dog."

"The people on my political right who say I didn't do enough spent the whole time I was president saying, 'Why is he so obsessed with bin Laden?'" Mr. Clinton said. "That was 'wag the dog' when he tried to kill him."

In the movie, a U.S. president creates a fake war with Albania through the media in order to distract the public from an emerging sex scandal.

Mr. Clinton also took aim at ABC's recent offering, "The Path to 9/11," which depicted his administration as lax in its response to the threat of terrorism.

"ABC just had a right-wing conservative run in their little 'Pathway to 9/11,'" Mr. Clinton said, saying the film was "falsely claiming it was based on the 9/11 commission report, with three things asserted against me directly contradicted by the 9/11 commission report."

During the past week, Mr. Clinton has given a number of other interviews, including stops with CNN's Wolf Blitzer and NBC's Tim Russert. Both segments focused on his recent philanthropic work.

DOJ_NMG_0068789

Mr. Clinton protested the questions from Fox, saying that the interview agreement stipulated that half of the 15-minute segment be devoted to his philanthropic efforts. Mr. Wallace noted in MediaBistro that still left half the time for other subjects and cited the transcripts as showing that he asked the same number of questions -- five -- on philanthropy-related matters as on other issues.

The former president went on to harshly criticize the Bush administration for failing to stop bin Laden before and after September 11.

"They ridiculed me for trying. They had eight months to try. They did not try. I tried. So, I tried and failed," Mr. Clinton said. "Now, I've never criticized President Bush, and I don't think this is useful. But you know we do have a government that thinks Afghanistan is only one-seventh as important as Iraq."

Video excerpts of the interview first surfaced on the Internet on Friday.

The Drudge Report Web site, www.drudgereport.com, provided readers a link to part of the interview, headlined, "Purple Faced Rage."

Torture Victim Had No Terror Link, Canada Told U.S. (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 24 — When the United States sent Maher Arar to Syria, where he was tortured for months, the deportation order stated unequivocally that Mr. Arar, a Canadian software engineer, was a member of Al Qaeda. But a few days earlier, Canadian investigators had told the F.B.I. that they had not been able to link him to the terrorist group.

That is one of the disclosures in the 1,200-page report released last week after a two-year Canadian investigation of Mr. Arar's case found him to be innocent of any terrorist ties. The report urges the Canadian government to formally protest the American treatment of Mr. Arar, a recommendation Canadian officials are considering.

Mr. Arar, 37, who now lives in British Columbia, has a lawsuit against United States officials and agencies that is on appeal, and he has demanded an explanation for his treatment from the Bush administration.

A close reading of the Arar Commission report offers a rare window on American actions in the case, describing seemingly flimsy evidence behind the American decision in 2002 to send Mr. Arar to a country notorious for torture; a deliberate attempt by American officials to deceive Canada about where Mr. Arar was; and lingering confusion among top American officials about the two countries' roles in the case.

President Bush earlier this month acknowledged for the first time that high-level people suspected of being terrorists had been held in secret prisons overseas by the Central Intelligence Agency. But he and other officials have said nothing publicly about the American practice of rendition, in which dozens of suspects have been seized and turned over for interrogation to other countries, including several known to engage routinely in torture.

Cases like that of Mr. Arar would not be affected by the compromise legislation on detainee treatment worked out between the White House and Republican senators last week, since it would have no effect on interrogation methods used by other countries. In fact, the proposed bill would strip non-Americans held overseas under United States control of the right to challenge their detention in federal court.

"It's a huge hole in what Congress is doing," said Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York, which represents Mr. Arar in his lawsuit. "The government can still send people secretly to other countries where they'll be tortured."

For nearly four years, the United States government has refused to make public any information on the case of Mr. Arar, which has become an international symbol of American excesses in the campaign against terrorism. The Bush administration refused to cooperate with the Canadian commission, so many questions about American actions and motives remain unanswered.

But Mr. Arar's case is more public than other cases of rendition, because he was detained inside the United States and legally deported, creating a modest paper trail. The three-volume report describes Canadian contacts with American officials in meticulous detail, offering by far the fullest account of any rendition case to date.

The commission's report says inexperienced Canadian police officials originally passed inaccurate information to the United States linking Mr. Arar to terrorism, based largely on his acquaintance with other men under suspicion.

But in the days after Sept. 26, 2002, when Mr. Arar was detained while changing planes at Kennedy International Airport in New York City, a flurry of calls and faxes between the countries included more equivocal information.

An Oct. 4 fax to the F.B.I. from Canadian counterterrorism officials said that they "had yet to complete either a detailed investigation of Mr. Arar or a link analysis on him," and that "while he has had contact with many individuals of interest to this project we are unable to indicate links to Al Qaeda."

DOJ_NMG_0068790

That was particularly significant because the commission concludes that all, or virtually all, of the United States' knowledge of any threat posed by Mr. Arar came from the Canadians.

The next day, on Saturday, Oct. 5, a Royal Canadian Mounted Police official spoke by phone with an unidentified F.B.I. official. "During this conversation, the FBI official said that the Americans feared they did not have sufficient information to support charges against Mr. Arar," the report says.

The Canadian officer said that likewise, "There was insufficient evidence to charge Mr. Arar in Canada."

Canadian officials told the Americans that if they allowed Mr. Arar to travel home to Canada, he would be kept under surveillance. But by then the Americans were already secretly working on the Syrian option, a legal possibility because Mr. Arar retained his citizenship in Syria, where he was born.

"The American authorities appear to have intentionally kept Canadian officials in the dark about their plans to remove Mr. Arar to Syria," the report says.

Despite the uncertain report from Canada on Mr. Arar and terrorism, on Oct. 7, an Immigration and Naturalization Service official ruled that evidence "clearly and unequivocally reflects that Mr. Arar is a member of a foreign terrorist organization, to wit, Al Qaeda." At 4 a.m. the next day, Mr. Arar was bundled aboard a Gulfstream jet that flew him to Jordan, from which he was driven to a prison in neighboring Syria.

Paul J. J. Cavalluzzo, lead counsel to the Arar Commission, said he found the American actions inconsistent. "On Saturday," Mr. Cavalluzzo said, "you have the F.B.I. saying, 'We don't have enough to charge him.' On Monday, he's a member of Al Qaeda. Well, if he's a member of Al Qaeda, in your country he can be charged."

Even after Mr. Arar arrived in Syria, American officials did not tell their Canadian counterparts. Only two weeks later, on Oct. 21, did Canada get confirmation, when a Syrian military intelligence officer phoned the Canadian ambassador in Damascus to say he was in custody.

Mr. Arar spent 10 months in the custody of Syrian interrogators who beat him repeatedly with a heavy metal cable and held him in a dank cell scarcely larger than a coffin, according to the commission report. In October 2003, he was released and returned to his wife and children in Canada.

But some top American officials appear to have been misinformed about the deportation decision. After Jean Chrétien, then Canadian prime minister, said publicly that the United States had decided unilaterally to send Mr. Arar to Syria, the Canadian ambassador was summoned to the National Security Council and scolded by Frances Townsend, the deputy national security adviser, who said it had been a "joint decision," the report says.

Colin L. Powell, then the secretary of state, had also suggested publicly that the Canadians were complicit in the Syria deportation. But on Dec. 1, 2003, Mr. Powell called Bill Graham, the Canadian foreign minister, to say the United States had not consulted Canada about the decision.

"I was mistaken," Mr. Powell told Mr. Graham, the report says.

The Canadian judge who led the inquiry, Dennis R. O'Connor, urged a formal protest over the American conduct. Peter MacKay, the Canadian foreign affairs minister, said Thursday it was too early to decide on a protest but added that there was an "urgent need" for talks on the issues raised by the case.

A State Department spokeswoman, Janelle Hironimus, said Friday that she knew of no plans for such talks. She said the Bush administration had declined to cooperate with the Arar Commission because its "mandate was to investigate and report on the actions of Canadian officials, and Canadian authorities were therefore the most appropriate entities to respond."

A spokeswoman for the Department of Justice, Tasia Scolinos, said that she could not respond in detail to the commission's findings but that the United States government "removed Mr. Arar in full compliance with the law and all applicable international treaties and conventions." She also said the government "sought assurances with respect to Mr. Arar's treatment" in Syria.

Mr. Cavalluzzo, the commission counsel, noted that the report held Canadian officials accountable for many lapses. But in an interview on Friday from Toronto, he said he remained "troubled" by American actions, chiefly the decision to turn Mr. Arar over to a government whose promises not to torture him had no credibility.

"Even at this time, when terrorism is a real danger," he said, "this case points out how important it is to preserve the democratic rights we have cherished for centuries."

CIA: Probe Into Renditions (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, September 25, 2006

As many as 20 CIA officials and contractors could face legal charges in Germany for their alleged role in the abduction of Khaled el-Masri, a German national once wrongly suspected of involvement with 9/11 conspirators, German officials say. Amid new disclosures last week by a German TV show, a Munich prosecutor confirmed to NEWSWEEK that he is conducting a probe into the people who carried out the abduction—an inquiry that could soon lead to arrest warrants.

The el-Masri case underscores continuing legal threats facing CIA officials overseas despite last week's deal on a bill that would authorize the agency to continue using aggressive interrogation techniques. The White House says the measure is needed to provide legal protection for CIA officials accused of violating the Geneva Conventions. But the bill may do little to protect officers involved in "extraordinary renditions"—a practice under which the agency has flown terror suspects to foreign countries where they have allegedly been harshly interrogated.

El-Masri is among the highest profile of these episodes. He claims he was kidnapped and flown to Afghanistan in 2004 by masked men with American accents. He says he was beaten and confined in a cold cell for four months before being released. A former top German counterterror official, who asked not to be named due to the sensitivity of the matter, told NEWSWEEK his detention was a case of mistaken identity, a "stupid mistake." Tensions escalated last week when the German TV show "Panorama" broadcast a report saying it discovered the true identities of CIA officers involved in the operation. The program aired records showing the officials had massages at a Majorca hotel after the alleged abduction. The former German official said local prosecutors now have little choice but to issue arrest warrants—just as Italian prosecutors have done in a separate rendition case. The cases have created anxiety in CIA ranks; officials hope the administration will quietly persuade foreign governments to drop any prosecutions. Asked about the el-Masri allegations last week, a CIA official declined to comment.

Inquiry Slows Giving To Islamic Charity (AP-Y)

By Sarah Karush

AP, September 25, 2006

Before last week, AbuSayed Mahfuz didn't hesitate to donate to Life for Relief and Development, an international Muslim humanitarian organization that is active in Iraq and Afghanistan and has partnered with the U.S. government.

But an FBI search of the organization's Southfield headquarters is making the Hamtramck resident think twice about future contributions.

Just as the holy month Ramadan, which began Saturday, has many Muslims thinking about their religious obligation to give alms, the investigation of the prominent Islamic aid group has prompted fears that giving to charity could bring scrutiny from the government.

FBI agents assigned to a terrorism task force last Monday searched Life's offices, taking computer servers, donor records and other financial documents. They have also searched the homes of the charity's chief executive, an ex-employee and two board members.

"After hearing this, I don't feel secure at all," said Mahfuz, a computer consultant and editor of a Bangladeshi community newspaper. He said he would still consider supporting the organization, but the investigation would force him to weigh that decision carefully.

No charges have been brought in the case, and Life has sought to reassure the community that it is perfectly legal to donate money to the organization, which was founded in 1992 by Iraqi immigrants.

It is not the first time a Muslim charity has come under investigation. In the months after the Sept. 11 attacks, the government froze the assets of the Texas-based Holy Land Foundation and Illinois-based Global Relief Foundation and Benevolence International, effectively shutting them down. The government has accused those groups of funding terrorists.

The search at Life's offices five days before the start of Ramadan, the month when Life gets about half of its donations, prompted anger among Muslim activists in the Detroit area. They questioned the timing and the involvement of the terrorism task force, which they said led media to draw unfair conclusions.

On Wednesday, Arab-American and Muslim leaders vented that anger at a previously scheduled meeting with federal and local law enforcement officials in Dearborn — home to the nation's largest concentration of Arab-Americans, many of whom are Muslim — as part of a dialogue that began after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Daniel Roberts, special agent in charge of the FBI's Detroit field office, said he could not comment on the case because the matter is sealed. But he said agents were acutely aware of the approaching holy month and would have preferred to conduct the search earlier.

"I would just ask that you give the government the benefit of the doubt," he said at the meeting.

Roberts declined a request by some in attendance to issue a statement reassuring Muslims that they could still donate to the organization.

Khalil Jassemm, the charity's chief executive, said FBI agents focused on three things: possible sanctions violations stemming from the group's work in Iraq before the overthrow of Saddam Hussein, improper involvement in Iraqi politics and use of funds for purposes other than those designated by donors.

DOJ_NMG_0068792

Though he would not comment on the case directly, Roberts said cases that the terrorism task force gets involved in do not always end with terrorism-related charges being filed. In some instances, the government continues to believe terrorism is involved, but cannot prove it, he said.

Ihsan Alkhatib, Life's legal director, said the FBI has told the charity it can continue operating, at least for now. He said investigators returned two computer servers and have promised to return the remaining four in the coming days.

Alkhatib said the government scrutiny is ironic given that some Muslims criticize Life for perceived coziness with the U.S. and Israeli governments.

Life partnered with the Pentagon to distribute wheelchairs in Afghanistan in 2004 and opened an office in Israel to coordinate its efforts in the Palestinian territories, an unusual step for a Muslim group. But those actions don't indicate support for any particular government and were simply efficient ways to help those in need, Alkhatib said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chemical-Security Legislation Nears Approval (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- After years of stalemate, Congress is poised to give the Homeland Security Department power to regulate and even shut down high-risk chemical plants that fail to comply with antiterrorism standards.

The industry won major concessions in the final bargaining, and Democrats accused Republicans of a "backroom" pre-election deal favoring the majority's business contributors. But House-Senate negotiators, meeting Monday evening, are expected to approve the legislation as part of a $34.8 billion homeland security bill slated to go quickly to President Bush.

Eager to go home at the end of the week to campaign for midterm elections, Congress also will approve a larger companion bill, providing $447 billion for defense and intelligence agencies in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1. Meanwhile, most domestic departments will be subject to a stopgap funding resolution until after the elections. And despite pressure from manufacturers, Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) said he expects no further House action before November on a set of expired tax benefits, including the research tax credit for businesses.

The chemical-security legislation mirrors an agreement reached last week between Sen. Susan Collins (R., Maine), who chairs the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee, and her House counterpart, Homeland Security Chairman Peter King (R., N.Y.). Aides to House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton, an industry ally, said the Texas Republican will support the measure. However unhappy with elements of the deal, key Democrats look reluctant to kill what is still a first step toward their goal of addressing chemical-security hazards.

"I have mixed emotions, but it's clearly better than nothing," said Rep. Martin Sabo (D., Minn.), who has taken the lead in the Appropriations Committees in pressing for action on chemical-plant security.

Jack Gerard, president of the American Chemistry Council, the industry trade group, struck a similar tone. "It's not perfect, but under the circumstances it's acceptable and we need to move the ball forward. In the current political environment, we have to quit talking about it and get something done."

The draft legislation would require Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to issue regulations within six months of establishing risk-based performance standards for the security of facilities such as factories where potentially dangerous chemicals are made or used. The secretary may apply these rules to any plant he judges presents "high levels of security risk." If he later determines that a facility has failed to comply, he may, after an opportunity for consultation, order operations to cease until brought into compliance.

Reflecting divisions among lawmakers, this authority would run only three years, allowing Congress to revisit the issue. And the chemicals industry failed to win a clear federal pre-emption of state regulations, which in some cases like New Jersey already are stricter than what Washington may require.

But major concessions were made on several points. For example, the bill goes to great lengths to protect data provided to the government by chemical companies, even treating it as "classified material." And only the secretary may bring civil litigation to enforce the regulations.

The industry also won protection from being forced to change specific chemical processes or adopt potentially costly alternative technologies as long as security goals are met.

House Democrats led by Rep. Edward Markey (D., Mass) said the phrasing renders Mr. Chertoff "toothless." Mr. Gerard accused critics of often pursuing an environmental agenda unrelated to security standards. "They want to take chemicals out of the chemistry industry," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0068793

The underlying homeland budget bill includes $1.82 billion in emergency funds to beef up border security and appease conservatives, angry with the Republican leadership over the course of the immigration debate this year. The defense bill is even heavier with emergency funds: $70 billion for operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and including almost $23 billion to begin to rebuild Army and Marine units worn down by the overseas conflicts.

Working through the weekend, House Republicans were confident of resolving any differences with the Senate over compromise language governing the rules of evidence for military tribunals to try foreign combatants in the war against terror. Given time pressures, it is less likely that the House and Senate can reconcile differences over a terrorist-surveillance bill expanding the administration's authority to carry out warrantless wiretaps.

Chemical Plants, Still Unprotected (NYT)

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

Congress still has done nothing to protect Americans from a terrorist attack on chemical plants. Republican leaders want to give the impression that that has changed. But voters should not fall for the spin. If the leadership goes through with the strategy it seems to have adopted last week to secure these highly vulnerable targets, national security will be the loser.

The federal government is spending extraordinary amounts of money and time protecting air travel from terrorist attacks. But Congress has not yet passed a law to secure the nation's chemical plants, even though an attack on just one plant could kill or injure as many as 100,000 people. The sticking point has been the chemical industry, a heavy contributor to political campaigns, which does not want to pay the cost of reasonable safety measures.

The Senate and the House spent many months carefully developing bipartisan chemical plant security bills. Both measures were far too weak, but they would have finally imposed real safety requirements on the chemical industry. The Republican leadership in Congress blocked both bills from moving forward. Instead, whatever gets done about chemical plant security will apparently be decided behind closed doors, and inserted as a rider to a Department of Homeland Security appropriations bill.

It is outrageous that something as important as chemical plant security is being decided in a back-room deal. It is regrettable that Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, the chairwoman of the committee that produced the Senate bill, does not carry enough influence with her own party's leadership to get a strong chemical plant security bill passed. The deal itself, the likely details of which have emerged in recent days, is a near-complete cave-in to industry, and yet more proof that when it comes to a choice between homeland security and the desires of corporate America, the Republican leadership always goes with big business.

Any federal chemical plant law should make it clear that states have the right to impose stricter requirements to protect their citizens from harm. The Senate and House bills said this, but the rider apparently will not. A reasonable law would make it clear that the secretary of homeland security can order chemical plants to adopt specific safety measures, like replacing highly dangerous chemicals with ones that pose less of a danger to people in the surrounding area. The House bill did this, but the rider apparently will not give the secretary this basic power.

It is likely that the backroom deal will also exempt water treatment and drinking water facilities from regulation, meaning that millions of Americans could needlessly be put at risk of an attack on a chlorine tank, and that it will make the rules about when and how chemical plants must submit safety plans hopelessly vague.

It is not too late to abandon this bad deal and pass a strong law. In a recent New York Times/CBS News poll, just 25 percent of those asked approved of the job Congress is doing. Its handling of the chemical plant security issue gives a good indication why.

TSA To Lower Registered Traveler Fee (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Transportation Security Administration is backing off its plan to require travelers who want a fast trip through airport security to pay nearly $200 a year.

The move comes days after representatives of companies seeking contracts to manage special security lines made their case for lower fees to TSA chief Kip Hawley at his offices in Arlington, Va.

The companies said a $200 annual charge could deter millions of people and some airports from signing up for the Registered Traveler program, which could begin in several airports this year.

In response, the TSA lowered to $30 from $100 the fee it plans to charge each person it approves to use Registered Traveler security lines. Travelers would pay an additional $80 or so a year to companies that enroll them, produce fingerprint-embedded ID cards and manage the lines at airports.

DOJ_NMG_0068794

The total annual cost is now estimated at about $110. It could be $20 higher if the TSA requires a criminal background check in addition to the terrorism assessment it now plans for each Registered Traveler applicant.

TSA lowered the fee "based on further analysis and public feedback," spokeswoman Yolanda Clark said.

Tom Blank, head of a coalition of companies seeking to provide services for the Registered Traveler program, said the reduction opens the door to launching the program in 30 to 45 days.

"It should move very quickly," said Blank, a former top TSA official.

About 20 airports and airlines have applied to start Registered Traveler programs.

A company run by Court TV founder Steven Brill has started doing preliminary online registration for programs it wants to start at airports in Cincinnati, Indianapolis and San Jose, Calif., and at Terminal 7 at New York's Kennedy International Airport.

The TSA has not approved any airport to start the Registered Traveler program other than a pilot program at Orlando International Airport, in effect since July 2005.

Brill said it "really wasn't difficult to convince" the TSA to lower its fee during a meeting Wednesday with TSA chief Hawley that Brill said ran two hours. The TSA had wanted to charge $70 for personnel costs at Registered Traveler lines. Brill and others argued against any labor charge, saying Registered Traveler would not require any additional screeners.

"It makes a big difference," Brill said of the lower fee.

The TSA says people in Registered Traveler lines will see no change in how they are screened unless airports add new security measures.

For example, Brill's company is testing machines that could scan shoes while people are wearing them and use a fingerprint sample to determine if they've had contact with explosives.

TSA Backtracks, Projects $30 Fee For Airport Pass (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal officials are backtracking on a plan to charge travelers $100 a year to take part in an expedited airport security screening program.

The Transportation Security Administration now projects that it will charge $30 a year for each person who wants to participate in the "registered traveler" program, the TSA said in a notice on its Web site over the weekend. That is in addition to any fees that private companies operating the programs charge.

Registered Traveler promises faster airport screening to customers who sign up in advance, undergo a background check and pay a fee. It is expected to be offered at about 20 interested airports and run by private companies under guidance issued by the TSA. One program, in Orlando, Fla., is operating.

Participants will get to use special security lines that may move more quickly than regular lines. At some point, TSA may approve technology that would allow for changes in screening procedures; for instance, use of an electronic shoe scanner could let travelers keep their shoes on. These technologies are being tested, with none approved yet.

TSA had created a stir by saying it would charge about $100, including background checks, administrative costs and the cost of paying screeners who run the special lines. Private companies interested in offering the program protested: They had expected to charge about $100 total, including their costs and profits. These companies argued that registered travelers shouldn't have to pay salaries of officers who would be screening them anyway.

On its Web site this weekend, TSA said it wouldn't seek reimbursement for these costs unless the program results in new TSA duties and increased costs.

TSA spokeswoman Amy Kudwa said the change was made "based on further analysis and public feedback."

That feedback included a meeting Wednesday between TSA chief Kip Hawley and the companies that want to provide the program at airports, who pressed TSA to roll back the fee, said Steven Brill, chief executive at Verified Identity Pass Inc., which has begun advanced registration of passengers in four airports. He said "a couple of thousand" people have signed up so far.

FBI Is Casting A Wider Net In Anthrax Attacks (WP)

By Allan Lengel And Joby Warrick

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Five years after the anthrax attacks that killed five people, the FBI is now convinced that the lethal powder sent to the Senate was far less sophisticated than originally believed, widening the pool of possible suspects in a frustratingly slow investigation.

The finding, which resulted from countless scientific tests at numerous laboratories, appears to undermine the widely held belief that the attack was carried out by a government scientist or someone with access to a U.S. biodefense lab.

DOJ_NMG_0068795

What was initially described as a near-military-grade biological weapon was ultimately found to have had a more ordinary pedigree, containing no additives and no signs of special processing to make the anthrax bacteria more deadly, law enforcement officials confirmed. In addition, the strain of anthrax used in the attacks has turned out to be more common than was initially believed, the officials said.

As a result, after a very public focus on government scientists as the likely source of the attacks, the FBI is today casting a far wider net, as investigators face the daunting prospect of an almost endless list of possible suspects in scores of countries around the globe.

"There is no significant signature in the powder that points to a domestic source," said one scientist who has extensively studied the tan, talc-like material that paralyzed much of Washington in the deadliest bioterrorism attack in U.S. history.

The FBI says it remains optimistic that it will find whoever killed five people -- two of them from the Washington area -- in a series of bioterrorism-by-mail attacks that rocked a nation still in shock from the Sept. 11 terrorist strikes. The bureau has assigned fresh leadership to the case -- Special Agent Ed Montooth -- and retains a full-time investigative force of 17 agents and 10 postal inspectors. "There is confidence the case will be solved," said Joseph Persichini Jr., acting assistant director in charge of the FBI's Washington field office.

The prevailing views about the anthrax powder, meanwhile, have been coalescing among a small group of scientists and FBI officials over several years but rarely have been discussed publicly. In interviews and a recently published scientific article, law enforcement authorities have acknowledged that much of the conventional wisdom about the attacks turned out to be wrong.

Specifically, law enforcement authorities have refuted the widely reported claim that the anthrax spores had been "weaponized" -- specially treated or processed to allow them to disperse more easily. They also have rejected reports that the powder was milled, or ground, to create finer particles that can penetrate deeply into the lungs. Such processing or additives might have suggested that the maker had access to the recipes of biological weapons made by the United States in the 1950s and 1960s.

In fact, the anthrax powder used in the 2001 attacks had no additives, writes Douglas J. Beecher, a scientist in the FBI laboratory's Hazardous Materials Response Unit, in an article in the science journal Applied and Environmental Microbiology.

"A widely circulated misconception is that the spores were produced using additives and sophisticated engineering supposedly akin to military weapons production," Beecher writes in the journal's August edition, in what is believed to be the most expansive public comment on the nature of the powder by any FBI official. "The idea is usually the basis for implying that the powders were inordinately dangerous compared to spores alone."

The FBI would not allow Beecher to be interviewed about his article. But other scientists familiar with the forensic investigation echoed his description. Whoever made the powder produced a deadly project of exceptional purity and quality -- up to a trillion spores per gram -- but used none of the tricks known to military bioweapons scientists to increase the lethality of the product. Officials stressed that the terrorist would have had to have considerable skills in microbiology and access to equipment.

"It wasn't weaponized. It was just nicely cleaned up," said one knowledgeable scientist who spoke on the condition he not be identified by name because the investigation is continuing. "Whoever did it was proud of their biology. They grew the spores, spun them down, cleaned up the debris. But there were no additives."

Moreover, scientists say, the particular strain of anthrax used in the attacks has turned to out to be a less significant clue than first believed. The highly virulent Ames strain was first isolated in the United States and was the basis for the anthrax weapons formerly created by the United States. The use of the Ames strain in the 2001 attack was initially seen as a strong clue linking the terrorist to the U.S. biodefense network.

But the more the FBI investigated, the more ubiquitous the Ames strain seemed, appearing in labs around the world including nations of the former Soviet Union.

"Ames was available in the Soviet Union," said former Soviet bioweapons scientist Sergei Popov, now a biodefense expert at George Mason University. "It could have come from anywhere in the world."

Many law enforcement officials believe that ever-improving technology eventually could lead to a break in the case. Ongoing tests could lead authorities to the lab where the anthrax originated -- something authorities have said for years could help close the case.

More traditional tactics are still being used: The FBI has conducted 9,100 interviews and issued 6,000 subpoenas in one of the most exhaustive and expensive investigations in the bureau's history. Authorities say investigators continue to have a number of specific individuals in their sights, describing the suspect list as "fluid."

One prevailing theory among investigators is that the attacks came from within the United States rather than from an overseas terrorist organization.

However, a law enforcement official said, "we have not closed the door on any possibilities. There's a discrete number of individuals who continue to be investigated, both internationally and domestically."

DOJ_NMG_0068796

Over the years, officials have publicly identified only one "person of interest," and that was more than four years ago. Steven J. Hatfill, a former Army scientist, has denied wrongdoing and has never been charged. He is suing the Justice Department, alleging that officials leaked false information about him that caused great harm.

Law enforcement officials won't talk about Hatfill.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, in a meeting this month with Washington Post reporters and editors, would not say whether any single individual continues to draw special attention as a "person of interest."

"I'm not telling you that right now the bureau is focused on someone or not focused on someone," Chertoff said. "There are in my experience a lot of instances where we might know or have a good reason to believe who committed a criminal act, but we may not be able to prove it. So when you say something is not solved, you should not assume from the fact that there is no criminal prosecution we don't have a good idea of what we think happened."

Persichini, of the FBI's Washington office, acknowledged frustrations but said that "no one in the FBI has for a moment stopped thinking about the innocent victims of these attacks, nor has the effort to solve this case in any way been slowed.

"While not well known to the public, the scientific advances gained from this investigation are unprecedented and have greatly strengthened the government's ability to prepare for -- and prevent -- biological attacks in the future," Persichini said.

Nonetheless, failure to solve the mystery has bred public skepticism.

"If the FBI's investigation has become a cold case, then it's time for [FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III] to acknowledge that and take steps to deal with it," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), a frequent critic of the FBI. "I'm concerned that the FBI may have spent too much time focusing [on] one theory of what happened and too little effort on the other possibilities."

Staff writer Spencer S. Hsu and staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

A Year Later, Rita's Wrath Lingers (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, September 25, 2006

CAMERON, La. — Some recall Hurricane Rita as the storm that just missed Houston. Others vaguely remember it as the one that came after Katrina.

The widespread anonymity of Rita has somehow reached the point where people along the Texas-Louisiana border — the ones whose towns and crops and neighbors were annihilated by Rita's 120-mph winds and 20-foot storm surge — have given Rita a new name: the Forgotten Hurricane.

“Nobody says anything about Rita. It's all Katrina, Katrina, Katrina,” said Paul Martin, 47, whose home in southwestern Louisiana was washed away along with the other 35 homes in his neighborhood. “Hey, we lost everything too.”

It was one year ago Sunday that Rita roared into the Texas-Louisiana border and devastated a swampy, brackish area dotted by wooden houses built long before hurricane building codes existed. About 100 people died either during the storm or trying to escape from it — including 23 seniors who died in a bus blaze during the chaotic evacuation of Houston.

Although Katrina cost more in lives and damage, Rita swamped a broad area. More than 600,000 homes across 85,000 square miles were damaged or destroyed, the Federal Emergency Management Agency estimates.

Rita forced what could be the largest evacuation in U.S. history. Three million people fled in two states. Only Hurricane Floyd, which struck near Cape Fear, N.C., in 1999, comes close with an estimated evacuation of about the same number of people.

And while Katrina's $40 billion price tag is the largest for any hurricane hitting the USA, Rita ranked as the seventh-costliest storm, according to the Insurance Information Institute. Damage estimates for Rita from the institute are over $5 billion.

The area hit by Rita is dotted with shoreline communities that depend on shrimping and fishing in the Gulf of Mexico.

“Venice still looks like a giant trash pile. Only the courthouse is still standing in Cameron,” Debra Segura, a central Louisiana truck driver, said. “Holly Beach is wiped out. Delcambre is ruined.”

Many of the hard-hit areas are on a slow track to recovery. People in those areas believe the storm's timing — hitting just four weeks after Katrina — is a big reason why that recovery has taken so long.

Shelters and apartments around Houston and southwestern Louisiana were already filled by Katrina evacuees, leaving few residents there to find temporary housing of their own. FEMA and insurance companies were already deluged with Katrina-related cases when Rita hit.

Martin said FEMA officials told him in January he would get a trailer in seven to 10 days.

“How about seven to 10 months?” he said. Martin received his trailer nine days ago, after spending the past year in a friend's apartment.

Louis Arceneaux, a Lake Charles, La., high school chemistry teacher, said the damage to his home was about $10,000. He had no flood insurance, and he moved in with his mother after the storm so he did not receive housing money.

DOJ_NMG_0068797

"Rita broke me," he said. "I can't afford to teach anymore."

Insurance companies acknowledge that the two hurricanes put a strain on the insurance adjusters who were working long hours in harsh conditions — many of them who were helping Katrina transplants had to evacuate when Rita came ashore.

Even so, they point back to the summer of 2004, when Florida was hit by four hurricanes, as proof that they've learned to react to multiple storms in short periods.

Robert Hartwig, chief economist for the Insurance Information Institute, said 95% of Katrina-related insurance claims are settled. He said that number is "as high if not higher" for Rita.

FEMA says it has provided more than 15,000 travel trailers and given housing assistance to more than 450,000 people.

The Small Business Administration has granted more than $500 million in loans, the National Flood Insurance Program has given out more than $370 million in Louisiana, and FEMA has provided $360 million for cleanup in Texas.

What Rita may be remembered for most is the evacuation. As it swelled to a Category 5 with a predicted path over Galveston and Houston more than 3 million people hit the roads almost simultaneously.

People were stopped in traffic for hours. Many ran out of gas waiting to get out. Some just returned home.

Joe Laud with the Houston Office of Emergency Management, whose wife and kids couldn't get out of Houston, said evacuating a major city is difficult. He conceded that government agencies along the evacuation routes need to work better to ease that traffic.

"Rita showed the dents in our armor," he said.

Laud said they've had several exercises to get traffic lanes moving away from Houston faster. Government officials are working with gas stations to ensure that some remain open during an evacuation. A task force created by Texas Gov. Rick Perry suggested consolidating more power into his office for better statewide coordination.

So far, the calm hurricane season has allowed residents along the Gulf Coast to focus instead on the task of rebuilding.

Richard and Nancy Burbank are the first Constance Beach family to rebuild their home, a lone structure surrounded by 20-foot wooden silts that once propped up dozens of homes.

"If you live on the coast and you don't think hurricanes are going to hit you, you're stupid," Nancy Burbank said. "When I came back, I accepted what I saw and immediately wanted to rebuild."

For others, the decision isn't so simple.

Paul England, a welder at a Port Arthur, Texas, oil refinery who skins alligators on weekends, decided not to rebuild and to move 20 miles inland.

"I won't move back down here," England said. "Rita scared the hell out of a lot of people."

WAR NEWS:

For Bush, War Anguish Expressed Privately (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

FALMOUTH, Maine -- They sat on two frayed chairs in a teacher's lounge, the president and the widow, just the two of them so close that their knees were almost touching.

She was talking about her husband, the soldier who died in a far-off war zone. Tears rolled down her face as she mentioned two children left fatherless. His eyes welled up, too. He hugged her, held her face, kissed her cheek. "I am so sorry for your loss," he kept repeating.

She told him she considers him responsible for her husband's death and begged him to bring home the troops. "It's time to put our pride behind us and stop the bleeding, for all of us," she recalled saying. The president demurred, unwilling to debate a mourning woman. "We see things differently," he said.

But Hildi Halley, a self-described liberal antiwar activist who met with President Bush in Maine last month, said she believes he felt her grief. "It wasn't just a crocodile tear," she said in an interview at her home. "I felt like I moved him. I don't think he's going to wake up tomorrow and say, 'Oh my gosh, I've been wrong this whole time and I'm going to change all my policies because of my meeting with this woman.' I just hope that with each soldier, he remembers my pain."

He has a lot of pain to remember. Now more than five years after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Bush has served as a wartime president longer than any occupant of the White House since Lyndon B. Johnson. He has presided over more U.S. military casualties than any since Richard M. Nixon. While he travels the country defending his policy and arguing to stay the course in Iraq, he also confronts the human burdens of wartime leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0068798

The two sides of Bush as commander in chief can be hard to reconcile. His public persona gives little sense that he dwells on the costs of war. He does not seem to agonize as Johnson did, or even as his father, George H.W. Bush, did before the Persian Gulf War. While he pays tribute to those who have fallen, the president strives to show resolve and avoid displays that might be seen as weak or doubting. His refusal to attend military funerals, while taking long Texas vacations and extended bicycle rides, strikes some critics as callous indifference.

Yet the private Bush comes across differently in the accounts of aides, friends, relatives and military family members who have met with him, including some who do not support him, such as Halley. The first question Bush usually asks national security briefers in the Oval Office each morning is about overnight casualties, aides say, and those who show up for the next round of meetings often find him still stewing about bad news from Iraq.

Bush seems to separate these aspects of war in his mind, advisers say. He expresses no regret even in private for his decision to invade Iraq, they say, while taking seriously the continuing consequences of doing so. "Removing Saddam, he never revisits that in his mind or his heart," said one adviser, who like others spoke on the condition of anonymity because Bush does not want them to discuss his feelings. "Sending troops into harm's way, that's something that weighs on him."

If he does not show that publicly, it's in keeping with a White House practice of not drawing attention to the mounting costs of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, which have killed more than 3,000 U.S. troops and tens of thousands of civilians. Advisers worry that sending the wrong signal would further sap public will and embolden the enemy and Bush's critics. Aides say that Bush does not attend military funerals because the presidential entourage would disrupt solemn events and that, out of respect, the media have been banned from photographing coffins arriving at Dover Air Force Base. But they also know it would draw unwelcome attention to the price of the president's policies.

Bush is less reticent about public displays of grief for victims of Sept. 11. During the recent events marking the fifth anniversary of the attacks, he teared up several times and at one point had to concentrate just to finish a speech. "Your heart breaks for somebody who suffered," he later told Charles Gibson of ABC News. "Tears can get contagious as far as I'm concerned."

For those who have suffered losses in the wars he initiated, Bush prefers to offer comfort in private. He writes letters to families of those killed, visits soldiers at military hospitals and meets with relatives of the dead. Altogether, according to the White House, Bush has met with 1,149 relatives of 336 dead service members. These sessions generate little attention because the White House bars journalists, but some relatives have described them.

"It's absolutely painful for him," said Beth Karlson, 63, a retired school food-service manager whose son died in Iraq and who met with Bush in Wisconsin last month. The president hugged her and held her hand. "He's a genuine person. He wants to reach out to the families and let them know how he feels."

Not everyone agrees. Cindy Sheehan, who would later launch antiwar protests near Bush's Texas ranch, met with him in 2004 and left alienated. She said he came across as overly casual and immune to her pain, referring to her as "Mom," yet uninterested in stories about her dead son, Casey, and calling him "your loved one" instead of by name. When she later sought another meeting, Bush refused.

Said Missy Beattie, a fellow member of Gold Star Families for Peace whose nephew died in Iraq: "He only meets with people who support him. I don't know what I'd say to him. I almost feel like he's not worthy of time and thought because I don't think he cares. I don't think he has any human qualities. I don't think he would listen to me or anyone who's lost someone and feel any empathy."

Many presidents confront the burden of ordering troops into danger. Johnson was tormented by the Vietnam War, padding down to his war room in slippers and robe at night to check on casualty numbers. Taped telephone calls, published by historian Michael Beschloss, reveal the depth of anguish. "I want to be called every time somebody dies," Johnson declared. He took to bed, depressed. Aides consulted psychiatrists. "He suffered," biographer Robert Dallek said. "It certainly took a toll on him. You could see it in his face at the end of his term. He was so old and careworn."

George H.W. Bush wrote an angst-ridden letter to his children before the Gulf War: "I guess what I want you to know as a father is this: Every Human life is precious. When the question is asked 'How many lives are you willing to sacrifice' -- it tears at my heart. The answer, of course, is none -- none at all." He did not sleep well before the bombing began and prayed that an Iraqi child shown on television would not be hit. "There's no way to describe the pressure," he said in a diary entry, later published in a volume of personal correspondence. "I've been plagued with the image of body bags."

Warren Finch, director of the George Bush Presidential Library and Museum, said the former president's service as a pilot shot down over the Pacific shaped his outlook. "The fact that he had served in World War II and lost two crewmen meant he experienced it firsthand. That weighed heavily on him."

His son never served in combat and gives no public indication that he anguishes like his father. White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president, like his predecessors, "lies awake nights asking himself the question: How can I get this done and get our people home?" But Bush controls his feelings around associates. "He keeps a lot of that very, very locked up inside himself," said a longtime friend. "I don't raise it with him. I just don't feel comfortable doing that."

DOJ_NMG_0068799

Bush is more open with confidants about his aggravation over events in Iraq. "He's unbelievably candid in person," said another person close to the president. "Of course it frustrates him. You can't not be frustrated by four car bombs a day and that sort of thing. But I think he's confident it's going to work out. I think he also thinks there's not much of an alternative." Does the president confide much in his father? "Nobody knows," the person said. "It's a steel wall."

Bush deals with stress through vigorous exercise, working out six days a week. When he goes for long bicycle rides, he often invites others to join him, but he asks them not to ride in front of him so he can have the illusion of solitude. "Riding helps clear my head, helps me deal with the stresses of the job," he told reporters last month after an 80-minute ride.

To those angry over the war, that can seem cavalier. "It's important for me to be thoughtful and sensitive to those who have got something to say," Bush said last year when Sheehan began her protest. "But it's also important for me to go on with my life, to keep a balanced life. . . . I'm mindful of what goes on around me. On the other hand, I'm also mindful that I've got a life to live and will do so."

Aides see the impact on Bush after meetings with "families of the fallen," as the White House calls them. Bush typically meets each family separately, joined by one aide, often Deputy Chief of Staff Joseph W. Hagin. He offers commemorative coins, poses for photos or signs autographs. "I do the best I can to cry with them or, you know, laugh with them if they wanna laugh, and hug them," Bush recently told Katie Couric of CBS News.

Karlson, whose son, Staff Sgt. Warren Hansen, died in a helicopter crash in Iraq in 2003, asked Bush for help in obtaining an investigative report. "I just felt I was being stonewalled, I wasn't getting anyplace," she recalled. "He said it will be taken care of. And it was. The next Wednesday, the report was hand-delivered." In the end, the report confirmed what she had been told about her son's death. "It has brought some peace," she said.

After such meetings, aides said, Bush often seems drained. During a trip to Fort Bragg, N.C., last year, he spent three hours with dozens of relatives of troops who were killed. One of them, Crystal Owen, asked him to wear a metal bracelet in honor of her dead husband. He put it on, then went to deliver a nationally televised address. With the widows still on his mind, Bush seemed flat as he began to speak, aides said, and at one point his eyes became watery.

Halley, 41, lost her husband, National Guard Capt. Patrick Damon, also 41, in June in Afghanistan to what officially was ruled a heart attack. When Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) called to offer condolences and asked if she could do anything, Halley requested a telephone call from the president. Instead, when he came to Maine to visit his parents in Kennebunkport, the White House invited her to meet him at a school.

When Bush walked in, Halley told him about Patrick, how they had met at American University, moved to Maine and had a family. "After I spoke about my husband for quite some time, I said, 'And now he's dead. For what? Why? I've lost my soul mate.' " She asked her children, Mikayla, 14, and Jan-Christian, 12, to leave the room, then wept as she told Bush how hard life had become for them. "He started crying. I said, 'These two children do not like you and they have good reason for that. And I hold you responsible for the death of my husband.' "

Bush seemed surprised that she opposes even the war in Afghanistan and cited the Taliban. "And I said, 'Who put them in power?' And he got a little defensive and said, 'I'm really not here to discuss public policy with you.' And I said, 'That's probably wise, and I'm not here to talk about public policy, either.' "

Bush said he hoped their meeting helped her healing. "You know what would help my healing?" she recalled responding. "If you change your policies in the Mideast." Bush smiled, she said, but did not reply.

Halley said the meeting did not change either of their minds. She would still vote against him. But she said she appreciated that he opened himself up to her. "I don't think he's a heartless man," she said. "I think he's pulled in a lot of different directions by very intelligent people. . . . I don't think it's going to change his policies, but I hope it does make him think about it. I hope I'm in his dreams."

Army Considers More Combat Units For Iraq (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

The Army is studying whether to add more combat units to the rotation plan for Iraq and is considering accelerating the deployments for some brigades to meet a top commander's decision to keep more than 140,000 troops in the country through at least the spring of 2007, Pentagon officials say.

Rather than planning for a big drawdown of 30,000 Army soldiers and Marines this year to a level of 100,000, as field commanders had expected, the two services are now trying to figure out how to keep the equivalent of two extra divisions, or 40,000 troops, in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0068800

Army Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander in the region, said last week he needed to maintain the higher-than-expected level because of increased sectarian violence in greater Baghdad between warring Sunni and Shi'ite Muslims.

The Army has met Gen. Abizaid's immediate need for more forces by delaying the departure of a Stryker armored vehicle brigade to Alaska and by calling in a fast-reaction brigade combat team from Kuwait. But a longer-term solution may require the Army to look at adding more units to the rotation mix.

"It may accelerate the pace of deployments, or it may mean looking at calling up additional units," said a Pentagon official who asked not to be named.

That option may become reality in November, when the Pentagon is expected to identify units that will go to Iraq next year. Currently, Army units deploy for about a year, then spend one year at their home base before going back to Iraq or Afghanistan. The Marine Corps, which patrols restive Anbar Province west of Baghdad, rotates two expeditionary forces every seven months.

The Army is facing more demand for troops at a time when military analysts say it is nearly stressed to the breaking point.

Non-deployed combat brigades are experiencing low readiness ratings due mostly to a lack of usable weapons and equipment. The wear and tear in Iraq is ruining M1A1 tanks, Bradley fighting vehicles, Humvee vehicles and other equipment at such a fast pace that the Army has neither the money nor the industrial base to replace them. A unit's functioning weapons systems are left in Iraq for use by replacement soldiers, leaving the stateside brigade well below the highest combat rating, according to Army officials and retired officers.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, Army chief of staff, this summer asked Congress for nearly $50 billion over three years to replace broken equipment in a process known as "resetting" the force.

"We have inadequate Army and Marine Corps combat power to sustain this level of deployment," said retired Army Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey, a highly decorated Vietnam combatant who led the 24th Infantry Division in Desert Storm.

Gen. McCaffrey, who has traveled to Iraq in his role as a West Point professor, said the Army needs an immediate infusion of 80,000 new soldiers added to the active force of about 500,000.

"Not since World War II have we asked the Army and Marine Corps to operate at such a high intensity of deployments with such an under-resourced force," Gen. McCaffrey said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has rejected calls from Gen. McCaffrey and other retired generals to increase what is referred to as the authorized end strength approved by Congress each year. Instead, he opted for authorizing the Army a temporary increase of 482,000 to 512,000 active-duty soldiers.

Paul Boyce, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon, said, "The Army has been planning rotation of forces through the year 2007 and is fully prepared to maintain the commitment to press the fight against the enemy while also giving the soldiers as much predictability on future missions as possible. We will meet any need the American public asks."

Gen. McCaffrey said he considers the ongoing battle for Baghdad a "tipping point" which would decide the war's outcome. He applauded Gen. Abizaid for upping the force level.

"It clarified the situation," he said. "Abizaid wants to win. Ambassador [Zalmay] Khalilzad wants to win. What they are saying is [Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's] government is in a fragile state ... I think what they are saying is we can't allow this to come apart on us."

'Iraq Is Not In Chaos' (WP)

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Last Wednesday, Newsweek-Washington Post's Lally Weymouth interviewed Iraqi President Jalal Talabani in New York. Excerpts:

Q. What happened in your meeting with President Bush?

A. We told him our progress in trade, the economy, training the army . . . and we asked him to provide the Iraqi army with the necessary arms for improving the capacity of the army. We also thanked him for his continuous support of Iraq. Don't forget, we were living under the worst kind of dictatorship.

What did the president say to you?

That he will continue to support the Iraqi people and will remain there until we ask him to leave.

Reportedly the U.S. government is losing faith in Prime Minister [Nouri al-]Maliki.

President Bush assured us that he will support the Maliki government. We assured him that all Iraqi political parties support Maliki. He has done many important things for Iraq. He has ordered all of the militias to stop their activities.

But they haven't stopped.

They are not operating as before.

When should the U.S. troops leave?

DOJ_NMG_0068801

In seven provinces, the American army has withdrawn. The Iraqi army is replacing American forces in many cities. We hope that at the end of this year we will be able to control 12 provinces. We will remain in need of the American and coalition forces until we've trained our army and will be able to face terrorism and defeat it.

How long will that be?

I think within two years we will be able to train our army and have the capacity to face terrorism. . . . The presence of American forces -- even a symbolic one -- will frighten those who are trying to interfere in our affairs.

Are you talking about Iran?

Our prime minister just came back from Iran. He got good promises from Iran on security -- promises that they will never permit any kind of interference in the internal affairs of Iraq.

Do you believe that?

Our prime minister tells me he got real and serious promises. Let us see.

What do you think of the popular theory that Iraq should split into three parts?

I don't think so. Iraq will not break up into three parts. Iraq will remain united -- we will have a united, federal Iraq. Kurds are struggling for the unity of Iraq -- Sunnis and Shiites, the same. There are differences among the Shiites and Sunnis which must be resolved, but not about the partition of Iraq.

So, while many here in the U.S. believe the war is a mess, you believe the opposite.

Iraq is not in chaos. There are many provinces that are calm -- where people live in prosperity. . . . I want to assure the American people that Iraqis are now enjoying democracy and human rights and are struggling to secure the country.

Would you welcome U.S. bases in Kurdistan?

Yes, they are welcome. Kurdistan wants the Americans to stay. In some places Sunnis want the Americans to stay -- Sunnis think the main danger is coming from Iran now. There is a change in the mind of the Sunnis. The Sunnis are for having good relations with America. The [Shiites] have started to think that.

Will the U.S. put bases in Kurdistan?

I think we will be in need of American forces for a long time -- even two military bases to prevent foreign interference. I don't ask to have 100,000 American soldiers -- 10,000 soldiers and two air bases would be enough. This will be [in] the interest of the Iraqi people and of peace in the Middle East.

U.S. Soldiers See Inept Output By Iraqi Troops (WT/AP)

By Antonio Castaneda

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The plan was simple: Iraqi troops would block escape routes while U.S. soldiers searched for weapons house by house. But the Iraqi troops didn't show up on time.

When they finally did appear, the Iraqis ignored U.S. orders and let dozens of cars -- including an ambulance full of armed militiamen -- pass through checkpoints in eastern Baghdad, American soldiers said in recent interviews.

It wasn't an isolated incident, they added.

U.S. commanders have hailed the performance of Iraqi troops in the crackdown on militias and insurgents in Baghdad. But some U.S. soldiers say the Iraqis serving alongside them are among the worst they've ever seen -- seeming more loyal to militias than the government.

Last week, for example, Sgt. 1st Class Eric Sheehan discovered that barriers and concertina wire that were supposed to bolster defensive positions had been dragged away -- again -- under the noses of nearby Iraqi soldiers.

I "suggest we fire these IAs and get them out of the way," Sgt. Sheehan, of Jennerstown, Pa., reported to senior officers, referring to Iraqi army troops.

"There's nothing we can do," came the reply.

U.S. soldiers from the 4th Squadron, 14th Cavalry Regiment eventually blocked the road again while Iraqi troops watched from a distance.

Some Americans speculated that the missing barriers were dragged off to strengthen militia defenses in nearby Sadr City, a sprawling Shi'ite neighborhood that is a stronghold of anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

"They've been doing this all week. They're working against us," said Sgt. Sheehan, who woke up the senior Iraqi officer at the checkpoint to complain -- futilely.

During another mission, Iraqi soldiers were suspected of looting the house of a wealthy resident, U.S. troops said.

Some Americans said they had seen much better Iraqi troops in the northern cities of Mosul and Tal-Afar, which have more Kurdish soldiers. They have been disappointed by the performance of units committed to the Baghdad fight.

DOJ_NMG_0068802

U.S. officers think the problem has political and sectarian roots: Many of the Iraqi soldiers in the capital are Shi'ites recruited from the Baghdad area.

As the security crackdown focuses on Shi'ite neighborhoods, Iraqi troops come in contact with fellow Shi'ites from some of the 23 known militias. That puts great stress on the soldiers, who grew up in a society where respect for religion runs far deeper than for government institutions.

"From my perspective, you can't make a distinction between Iraq army Shi'ites and the religious militias. You have a lot of soldiers and family members swayed and persuaded by the religious leadership," said Lt. Col. Greg Watt, who advises one of two Iraqi divisions in the city.

He then pointed to the nearby guards, under an Iraqi army division commander.

"There's no doubt in my mind that he has soldiers who are followers of religious leaders," Col. Watt said. "Are they loyal to the division commander? Yes. But they may be loyal to both."

Col. Watt expressed confidence the Iraqi army could win if it came to a pitched battle with militias.

"But what the Iraqi army can't do is protect soldiers when they go home, or protect their families," he added. "It's very, very difficult. That's why a solution has to be a political one and not a military one."

One immediate solution would be to bring in more units from outside Baghdad. Although many of those units are largely Shi'ite, too, the soldiers would be less likely to have family living under militia control.

But many Iraqi troops refuse to serve away from home. The commander of U.S. forces in Baghdad, Maj. Gen. James Thurman, said his requests for 3,000 more Iraqi soldiers have been refused because the troops won't leave their home areas.

That attitude frustrates American soldiers.

"They have to step up, make sacrifices. We've made thousands of sacrifices for our own country's freedom," said Staff Sgt. Jeremy Chinnis, 30, of Richmond. "I think they think the Iraqi people don't support them."

Dangerous Neighborhood (NSWK)

By Lally Weymouth

Newsweek, September 25, 2006

Iran and Iraq go side by side, not only on maps but among America's most urgent challenges. As the U.N. General Assembly convened last week in New York, the two presidents talked separately to NEWSWEEK's Lally Weymouth. While Iraq's president is optimistic about his country's future, Iran's president remains intransigent in his refusal to halt nuclear-related activities as demanded by the United States as a precondition for talks. Excerpts:

IRANIAN PRESIDENT MAHMOUD AHMADINEJAD

WEYMOUTH: Will you stop enrichment and reprocessing activities?

AHMADINEJAD: Why should we agree to that? There is no such provision in the NPT [Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty].

Didn't you put that in question when you violated the NPT for more than 10 years? Do you recognize those violations?

It is the right of all member states of the NPT to have the technology for fuel reprocessing.

But don't responsibilities go with rights?

The problem is some believe that they sit above the law. They produce bombs and use them too. That is where the problem lies.

Do you think it would be in Iran's interest to move toward a normal relationship with the United States?

We are interested in having talks with everyone ... but the U.S. administration—that is, a section of the U.S. administration—does not create the right circumstances. They believe that they own the entire world, so they speak from that position, looking down at us. Some politicians in the United States think that the nuclear issue is a way to put pressure on Iran, but they are wrong. [A country] that has actually produced and used nuclear bombs cannot claim that they now want to stop proliferation.

Are you really serious when you say that Israel should be wiped off the face of the earth?

We need to look at the scene in the Middle East—60 years of war, 60 years of displacement, 60 years of conflict, not even a day of peace. We need to address and resolve the root problem.

Your suggestion is to wipe Israel off the face of the earth?

Our suggestion is very clear ... Let the Palestinian people decide their fate in a free and fair referendum, and the result, whatever it is, should be accepted ... The people with no roots there are now ruling the land.

You've been quoted as saying Israel should be wiped off the face of the earth. Is that your belief?

What I have said has made my position clear. If we look at a map of the Middle East from 70 years ago ...

So the answer is yes?

Is this a test? Do you respect the right to self-determination for the Palestinian nation? Yes or no?

DOJ_NMG_0068803

If the Palestinian people opted for a two-state solution, would you support that decision?

Israel currently occupies Palestine. Where did they come from? They should return.

You've made statements about the Holocaust, saying it was exaggerated. Is that your opinion?

It's not the numbers that are important ... We know this was a historical event that happened. But why is it that people who question it are persecuted and attacked?

There is a crisis of violence in Iraq. Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki recently asked for your help. Will you help him?

We've supported the Iraqi government from the start. We will support the political process in Iraq.

Everyone in the region says the result of the U.S. invasion of Iraq is that Iran is more powerful than ever.

Do you think there is a problem with Iran being a powerful country? A powerful Iran will benefit the region, because Iran is a country with a deep culture and has always been a peaceful country.

Are you going to continue backing terror groups—Hamas, Palestinian Islamic Jihad?

Why do you call them terrorists? If someone occupied the United States and the American people rose to defend their home, would you call the American people terrorists?

I would say they were terrorists if they started killing civilians.

The Palestinian people have the right to live. Gaza is being bombarded. Homes are being destroyed.

What do you want the United States to do?

I sent a very detailed and caring letter [to President Bush]. I truly mean it when I say that I hope Mr. Bush will change his behavior and attitude. It doesn't make us happy that sentiments against him rise on a daily basis around the world.

How can you come to this country and tell our president to change his behavior?

We're just defending our honor.

IRAQI PRESIDENT JALAL TALABANI

WEYMOUTH: Americans are discouraged about Iraq. What is your assessment?

TALABANI: The media focuses only on the negative side of Iraq. We have problems with security, but we have big achievements and victories. People are enjoying a new kind of democracy: they are enjoying freedom of expression, of organization, and of having their own television and radio. We have liberated the economy from the control of the state. Now the private sector is active everywhere. We have 18 provinces, and at least 12 of these are quiet and calm. All over Iraq, schools are open.

Two leading U.S. generals testified recently that there is a civil war going on in Iraq.

This is not civil war. This is terrorist activity concentrated on Iraq by Al Qaeda and other extremists.

Aren't you worried aboutthe violence?

Of course we are worried. But this is one side ...

What about the Sunni militias?

Before the last election for Parliament, Sunnis refused to sit down with Shiites. I was mediating. Afterwards, they were convinced to participate in Parliament. They agreed to have a national unity government, and Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds have agreed to form a council for national security. Now Sunnis and Shiites are governing together. Though differences remain, this is a way of reconciliation.

Reportedly the U.S. government is losing faith in Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

President Bush assured us that he will support the Maliki government. We assured him that all Iraqi political parties support Maliki. He has done many important things for Iraq. He has ordered all of the militias to stop their activities.

But they haven't stopped.

They are not operating as before.

When should the U.S. troops leave?

I think within two years we will be able to train our Army and have the capacity to face terrorism. When we ask our allies to leave Iraq it will depend on being able to keep Iraq's sovereignty and independence free of danger from the outside. The presence of American forces—even a symbolic one—will frighten those who are trying to interfere in our affairs.

Are you talking about Iran?

Our prime minister just came back from Iran. He got good promises from Iran on security—promises that they will never permit any kind of interference in the internal affairs of Iraq.

Do you believe that?

Let us see.

Turkish troops are massed at Iraq's border.

DOJ_NMG_0068804

Yes, but they are not coming in. We convinced the PKK [a radical Kurdish separatist group based in Iraq] to stop fighting, and within days it will officially announce a ceasefire. This will help Iraq open a new chapter in relations with Turkey. We are urging the Turkish Kurds to be moderate, to wage their struggle through democratic means.

What do you think of the American idea of transforming Middle Eastern countries into democracies?

I support this idea. I believe democracy is the panacea for all problems in the Middle East.

So while many Americans believe the war in Iraq is a mess, you believe the opposite.

Iraq is not in chaos. There are many provinces that are calm—where people live in prosperity. We are grateful to your people, to your Army, to your president. You liberated us from a dictatorship.

So this fight is not in vain?

What I want from the American media is to send people to Iraq to see different parts of the country, not just Fallujah and Baghdad. Some places are in trouble, including Baghdad, but we are improving this.

Would you welcome U.S. bases in Kurdistan?

Yes. I think we will be in need of American forces for a long time to prevent foreign interference. Ten thousand soldiers and two air bases would be enough. This will be in the interest of the Iraqi people and of peace in the Middle East.

My Right Hand (TIME)

By Michael Weisskopf

Time, September 25, 2006

In his book Blood Brothers, TIME senior correspondent Michael Weisskopf weaves his own tale of losing a hand in Iraq with the stories of three soldiers who also spent time at Amputee Alley, Ward 57 of Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington. In this excerpt, the action begins on Dec. 10, 2003, as Weisskopf, 57 at the time, is on assignment in Baghdad, riding in the back of an open humvee along with TIME photographer James Nachtwey and two young soldiers, Private Orion Jenks and Private First Class Jim Beverly.

The army convoy rattled through Al-Adhamiya like a carnival roller coaster, each turn as blind as the next. Not that the soldiers could see much anyway. Night had fallen on the old Baghdad quarter, a byzantine maze lit only by kerosene lamps flickering from rugged stone houses. We moved warily in the darkness, patrolling for insurgents in blind alleys custom-made for ambushes and narrow passages perfect for concealing roadside bombs. It was anyone's bet who faced a more dire risk, the hunted in terrorist cells or the hunters in humvees, along with whom I was riding under a half-moon. I was in Iraq to profile the American soldier as "Person of the Year" for TIME magazine. It was a dream assignment, a chance to escape Washington and work in exotic environs on a big story.

We emerged into Al-Adhamiya's main marketplace, a large treeless square that was host to what looked like a block party in full swing. Old men, rocking back and forth on tiny stools, shuffled dominoes. Boys volleyed soccer balls. Women veiled in black fed their children from stalls of roasted chickens and shashlik. No one seemed to notice the foreign invaders passing by.

At first I thought it was a rock, the specialty of street urchins--a harmless shot against an armored humvee. I gazed down and spotted an object on the wooden bench 2 ft. away. The dark oval was as shiny and smooth as a tortoiseshell, roughly 6 in. long and 4 in. wide. None of my fellow passengers seemed to notice. I confronted the intruder alone, a journalist caught in a military moment. Something told me there was no time to consult the soldiers.

I rose halfway, leaned to the right, and cupped the object. I might as well have plucked volcanic lava from a crater. I could feel the flesh of my palm liquefying. Pain bolted up my arm like an electric current. In one fluid motion, I raised my right arm and started to throw the mass over the side of the vehicle, a short backhand toss. Then everything went dark.

The humvee bed was cold and hard, an inhospitable place to awaken. I struggled to sit up and fell back. My right leg burned from knee to hip. Blood was oozing from it; my right arm felt heavy and numb. Was I having a nightmare? The hollow, faraway sound of voices was dreamlike. I shook my right arm, trying to wake it up. Still no response. I elevated it to see why.

My wrist looked like the neck of a decapitated chicken. The wound was jagged, the blood glistening in the light. My mouth was dry, my brow soaked in sweat; my heart beat quickly and weakly, little dings in my chest.

All sound and sight dimmed, as my thoughts turned inward. This is not how I pictured my life ending: futilely and unglamorously, on the frigid floor of a truck, thousands of miles away from anyone I loved.

After medic Billie Grimes stopped the bleeding with an elastic cord, I was rushed in the humvee to a nearby brigade clinic and then medevacked to a U.S. Army hospital elsewhere in Baghdad for surgery to clean what was left of my arm and the shrapnel wounds in my right thigh. There, I learned that everyone else in the back of the humvee had survived, though Jenks had serious leg wounds, Beverly had knee and hand injuries and Nachtwey had taken shrapnel in his knees and abdomen. The next morning, a middle-aged nurse with blond highlights approached my bed.

"You're a hero," she said. "You lost a hand and saved lives."

DOJ_NMG_0068805

Hero? I was feeling anything but valiant. Mangled. Pitiful. Disoriented. Scared. I was anxious about my ability to work again with one hand and to parent my children, who lived with me half-time in Washington. My son Skyler was 11 years old, the same age I had been when my father, a workaholic community newspaper publisher, dropped dead of a heart attack. Olivia was 8, roughly as old as my sister had been. I couldn't bear to think I might let such wrenching family history repeat itself.

Mostly, however, I was angry at myself for getting in the wrong humvee, releasing the grenade too slowly, even grabbing it in the first place. Nothing would have happened if I hadn't picked it up. Why had I been acting like a cowboy? Why hadn't I just left the damn thing alone?

"It was an impulsive act," I told the nurse. "If I hadn't picked it up, I'd still have a hand."

"You probably wouldn't have had a life," she retorted. "You and everyone else in the vehicle would have died. It wasn't an impulse; it was an instinct to survive."

TIME colleagues pushed for my transfer from Baghdad to the U.S. military hospital in Landstuhl, Germany. They then joined my friends and sister Leslie Flesch in lobbying to get acting Secretary of the Army Les Brownlee to admit me to Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, making me the first reporter wounded in combat known to have received such treatment at the premier hospital reserved for soldiers.

Among the pros on the amputees' Ward 57 at Walter Reed, no one seemed fazed by my injury. But just the word amputation made me shudder. It conjured up a disjointed series of images: a childhood friend who had lost his leg in an auto accident; World War II veterans wheeled into ballparks for holiday games, their empty trousers or shirtsleeves pinned up. I had avoided mirrors all week. Now I feared seeing the startling reality in the faces of my family and friends who would be visiting on my first day in the hospital.

My fears turned out to be groundless. The one emotion everyone showed was happiness to see me alive, maimed or not. But two exchanges stood out. My sister surprised me with a gift: a 1900 silver dollar our gambler father had won in Las Vegas and given to her in 1956 when she was 8 years old.

I held my father's winnings and thought of the larger bet he lost. He deferred a family life to business success, and died before he had either. I had almost repeated the mistake. The realization put my father's death in a new light. I understood for the first time why he exited before getting to know me: he had gambled on a future that never materialized. It was a mistake I could begin to forgive.

I had gambled on a job assignment and had my own damage-control problems. Skyler had reacted angrily when he first heard of my injury. "He lied to me, he lied to me," Skyler shouted, referring to my parting words when I left for Iraq. "He promised me he wouldn't get hurt." According to my estranged wife Judith Katz, Skyler had moped and cried every day until I came home.

He was the first one through the door when visiting hours began. He and Olivia bounded onto my bed, showering me with hugs and get-well posters. Dressed in camouflage pants, Skyler before long had grabbed a roll of gauze and wound it around his right hand. He was identifying with my loss, a gesture I saw as a sign of forgiveness. I had shaken his sense of safety, the security blanket only a father can provide. Skyler's act of generosity capped a day of pardons across three generations of Weisskopf males.

Five days after I arrived Ward 57, surgeons removed another 3.3 in. of my forearm. They needed an inch of bone to free up enough loose skin to cover my wound; I had agreed to lose another 2 in. to make room for an electronic component in my future prosthesis so that my artificial hand would have the capacity to rotate rather than just open and close.

Myoelectric is the non-sci-fi name for bionic. A myoelectric hand works off tiny electrical signals released when muscles are contracted. The signals are picked up by electrodes that line the inside of a prosthesis and cover the muscles of a stump. Electrodes send the signal to a computer chip that instructs an electronic hand to open, close or rotate.

For long stumps like mine, forearm muscles located 3 in. below the elbow drove the process. Flexing the one on the outside of my forearm signaled a hand to open. Tensing the inner muscle would close it. My first lesson with an occupational therapist, Captain Kathleen Yancosek, focused on how to isolate those muscles. Using a tool called "Myo-boy," Captain Katie strapped electrodes onto each of my forearm muscles and plugged the other end of a cord into a laptop computer. The object was to generate a spike on the monitor by flexing the right muscle. I jerked, twitched and turned my stump. Nothing happened. I pumped again, hunting for the right spot, but the monitor stayed blank. When I grew frustrated, Katie had me close my eyes to map the muscle in my mind. I contracted. She let out a cheer: "You did it."

I opened my eyes and saw a tiny streak on the monitor. I squeezed, again, sending the spike higher. Unfortunately, as I kept practicing, the computer indicated that I was firing both muscles at the same time. I finally managed to distinguish one muscle from the other. But manipulating those tiny muscles was exhausting. My hospital gown was soaked in sweat.

Over the course of the next week, I spent at least an hour a day working on the Myo-boy, graduating to new levels of virtual reality. Finally, I simulated the mechanics of a virtual hand, including the wrist rotation I had paid for with two extra inches of my arm. It took an extra step, hitting both muscles at the same time.

DOJ_NMG_0068806

Once the pain of surgery had subsided after Christmas, I began to suffer the bane of amputees: phantom limb pain. Sometimes I felt as if my fist was clamping tighter and tighter until my fingers were ready to explode. At other times, the Phantom could create the sensation of twisted fingers or a bent thumb.

Virtually everyone on Ward 57 had some phantom limb pain. Its cause remained as mysterious as it had been when a Civil War doctor coined the term to identify the complaints of soldiers whose injured limbs had been sawed off. Some experts believe the brain has a blueprint of body parts that persists even if they've been cut off. According to one theory, when the brain sends signals and receives no feedback, it bombards the missing limb with more signals. That aggravates the swollen nerves that once served it, inducing pain.

Doctors were as hard-pressed to treat phantom pain as they were to explain it. They resorted to trial and error, using remedies originally intended for other ailments that seemed to relieve nerve pain. I had a sampling on my nightstand: pills to combat seizures and depression, lozenges for bronchitis, allergy nasal spray, arthritis cream, medicated patches for shingles and an electro-stimulation device. It was hard to tell if any of them worked. The crushing, stabbing pain in my right hand flared and subsided--but never went away. Doctors said it might last a month, a year or a lifetime. Every amputee was different.

Phantom pain was a daily topic at OT--occupational therapy, the whittling porch for amputees. I made my first friends there. Most of my neighbors were half my age and from different backgrounds, small-town boys who had passed up college or blue-collar trades for a military life. I was urban, overeducated, untattooed and distrustful of uniforms and blind patriotism. But I soon discovered that I shared something with those soldiers larger than the differences in our biographies. We were men struggling for identity. The psychological scars of amputation ran deeper than those from conventional wounds of war. The blasts took away something deeply personal. None of us felt like the men who had gone to Iraq. We possessed the same minds; they just resided in different bodies.

The loss of my writing hand launched an assault on my self-image. If I couldn't be a reporter, then who was I? What would I do? The questions left me raw and wide open, no more so than my new friends who had honed their bodies for a completely different cause: war. The military represented the perfect synthesis of muscle and discovery, a place to play out feelings of invincibility. Now they confronted the world from a wheelchair or without an arm. Life looked different with no war to fight, orders to follow and comrades to love. The question was how to fill the void, and with what.

The tone in OT could shift from laughter to grave silence in the moment it took a soldier to scream in pain or explode into anger. Captain Katie segregated the angriest amputees. Her morning sessions bristled with tension. Metallica and Motorhead blared from speakers. One specialist who had trouble picking up a peg with his above-the-elbow prosthesis flung the $115,000 device against a wall. "I ain't doing it anymore," he shouted. Another threw the metal pedal of his wheelchair into a costly exercise machine.

My own moods fluctuated between anger and joy, frustration and triumph. But a feeling of melancholy prevailed as I came face to face with the larger tragedy beyond my own: stolen youth. Specialist Hilario Bermanis, 21, had been built like a fullback when he left his home in Micronesia to join the Army. Now he was hunched in a wheelchair, a thick neck and broad shoulders the only reminder of his once muscular body. He had lost his left hand and both legs above the knee to a rocket-propelled grenade in Baghdad.

Specialist James Fair, 22, had the cruelest of all fates; not only had he lost his sight, he had no hands for Braille or a cane. Still recovering from a brain injury in late December, he was wheeled into OT for sensory perception tests. He rolled his head back and forth, unresponsive to the therapists.

Three weeks of hospital life had taken a toll. I was 20 lbs. lighter, stooped, and as pale as a death-row inmate. Lacking a hand and 3 in. of forearm, my right limb hung almost a foot shorter than my left, the length of a child's arm attached to an adult's body. In a light-green hospital gown, I wasn't groomed for the runway or my date of Jan. 2. My girlfriend, Rebekah Edminster, had flown in from California for a 10-day stint.

A professional singer who lived in the artists' colony of Ojai, Rebekah, with whom I'd been romantically involved for a year, had kept her distance from Washington to avoid potential rivalry over my care. My sister had come for the first few days, and Judith, to whom I had been married for a decade, had been a continuous presence.

Rebekah arrived and kissed me as if nothing had changed. After a couple of hours, however, I sensed a little tension. I knew what was coming: a Washington Post story covering the Iraq incident had identified Judith as my wife. We were legally separated, but I apparently had left Rebekah with the idea that I had been divorced. She felt misled, telling a friend, "The grenade didn't kill him, but I'm going to."

I broached the subject, setting off a debate on the definition of marriage. I became angry and defensive. The room got close. I insisted I had never intentionally deceived her and said I needed support now, not doubt. "Listen, are we not friends?" Rebekah asked, locking her eyes on mine. I nodded yes."Then we'll get through this," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0068807

On Jan. 8, 2004, I was released from the hospital and returned to my Washington home. My kids resumed their half-time life with me. Victor Vorobyev, a Russian Ã©migrÃ© hired by TIME as my driver, chauffeured them to and from school. I overcame my nightmare of not being able to produce peanut butter sandwiches, with the help of technology from Captain Katie's OT kitchen. A sheet of sticky, rubbery material held the jar in place while I twisted off the top with my good hand and scooped.

Skyler and Olivia had no adult notions of loss or judgments about helping me. Not long ago I had tied their shoes. Now they were tying mine. I had patched up their cuts and scrapes; now they were changing my dressings. Their sweetness permeated the house. Before Iraq, I had thought of parenting as another job--a lot of work with little payoff. Now it was a love affair. Skyler and I picked up our running chess game. Olivia helped me cook dinners--"one-handed spaghetti" was our specialty.

A blizzard plowed into Washington one day in late January. We packed into Victor's car and went sledding. I stood at the bottom of the hill and watched. The sun sparkled on their snowsuits like tiny stars. They laughed and called out: "Watch this, Dad." "Did you see me, Daddy?" I waved and wept at these beautiful sounds, realizing how close I had come to never hearing them again.

Why did I risk it? I had scrutinized my motivation for picking up a grenade, but not the reason I had put myself in range of it. My rationale for going to Iraq as a career milestone no longer struck me as truthful. I already had scrapbooks full of big stories and enough money in the bank. I realized that something else had driven me, an old problem of self-worth: I was good because of what I did, not because of who I was. I had important roles as father, brother, lover and son. But without achieving in some material way, I felt empty and unseen. Journalism had provided a regular opportunity to reinvent myself. I had gone to Iraq for another fix.

Like any junkie, I thought only of myself, taking on a dangerous mission as if others didn't deserve a say, as if the chance of success for me was more important than the certainty of fatherhood for my kids. I didn't weigh the risk to them until I lay bleeding in the bed of a humvee, too late to spare them the fright.

It had taken a major loss for me to understand what I meant to others. Relationships rescued me. They got me out of Baghdad, into Walter Reed and back home. I received that help not because of a grade I had earned, a story written, or lives saved; it was for being me. I resolved to return the love by being less self-absorbed. I promised my kids I would stay out of war zones. My brother-in-law, Michael Flesch, came for a three-day visit, the longest time we had spent alone together in years. We hung out at Walter Reed by day and frequented Washington haunts by night.

And then there was Rebekah. I had finally realized why the divorce flap was so upsetting. Relationships meant everything to her, and I had shortchanged her on candor. The open heart she had brought to Walter Reed deserved better. I apologized in a couple of long phone calls to California, promising full disclosure as the bedrock of our relationship from here on out.

The arrival of my myoelectric arm in the first week of February was more exciting than a new pair of shoes--but no more comfortable to wear. Just getting it on was painful: my stump was still incredibly tender. If my former right hand had floated lightly, the fake one moved like a dumbbell--fat, clunky and heavy. Its 2 1/2 lbs. were concentrated in the electronic hand--the place farthest from the half-forearm. I kept bumping it into things. I named it Ralph, after the clumsiest kid in my grade school.

Ralph didn't work any better than he looked. The thumb and first two fingers opened and closed like a claw, the grossest of motor skills. The third finger and pinkie, which are employed by natural hands to carry things, were frozen. Ralph's wrist didn't bend. Despite weeks of training on a computer, I had difficulty with the basic functions: my stronger outer forearm muscle kept flexing and involuntarily opening the hand--even when I was trying to close it. I had no more success with the mechanism to rotate the wrist. The simultaneous contraction of both muscles was unnatural and hard to remember in real time. When I did it right, I couldn't keep the hand from spinning 360Ëš, an annoying loss of control--and embarrassing in public.

My disillusionment with Ralph grew. By the fifth day I was so frustrated I was ready to quit, thinking I'd be better off with one hand. On Feb. 11, I was invited to meet with my rehab team of eight people. Lieut. Colonel Paul Pasquina, medical director of the Army's amputee-care program, cited a few options to the myoelectric arm, including a body-powered prosthesis. They were lighter, unencumbered at the elbow, and ended in a hook. Pasquina said I might adopt a hook as a trademark that people would come to respect for its straightforward honesty.

I bristled. I wanted a prosthesis to disguise my deformity, not spotlight it. "The circles I travel in wouldn't be amused," I told Pasquina dismissively. I still was banking on an easy-fitting, lifelike substitute.

Dec. 10 marked the passing of a year since my injury. I knew I'd never regain what I had lost in penmanship, tennis, home repair, lovemaking, freedom from pain and dexterity. Even putting on a tie remained a challenge, one fraught with danger. Rushing to a TV appearance a few weeks earlier, I tried to knot one in the backseat of a taxi. I gripped the short end with my prosthetic hand, which began to spin uncontrollably, almost strangling me before I managed to extricate myself.

Despite occasional disasters, however, I was adjusting to a fake arm--thanks to certain modifications by prosthetist John Miguelez's team. Ralph had bit the dust, replaced by a more tapered, slightly lighter shell made of carbon fiber and acrylic resin. The modifications improved my range of motion and wardrobe--I could now button a dress shirt. But I was hardly wearing a second skin. The rigid shell chafed my forearm and got so hot in the summer that sweat dripped out of a small hole used to put it on.

DOJ_NMG_0068808

Before Iraq, the technology of arm prostheses hadn't changed much since World War II. The tiny population of amputees created little market incentive. Miguelez used the burst in demand from Walter Reed to lean on manufacturers for progress. Before long, he was outfitting Iraq war amputees with an electronic hand that opened and closed 2 1/2 times faster and could be programmed to function at different speeds and grip strength.

The cosmetic arts also had improved. I received a silicone hand that was so lifelike it passed for real in social settings. But Pretty Boy, as I called it, kept tearing and afforded the precision of a boxing glove. It was too spongy to grasp anything small and too slippery to hold most objects for long.

Function was only part of the problem. The idea of trying to pass had begun to trouble me. It made me feel as if I had something to hide or be ashamed of. When I started to go bald, I shaved my head. No comb-overs, transplants or toupees for me. So why try to conceal a handicap? I was now proud of how I had lost my hand. The stump had a story to tell, regardless of my motivations for grabbing a grenade. Why not draw attention to it?

No one could miss my disability now. I put on a hook for Thanksgiving dinner and never took it off. It twisted into the end of my myoelectric prosthesis and turned 360Ëš like an electronic hand. Only it worked better. Two silver talons opened like forceps, locked on to items and could pick a dime off the floor. Occasionally I screwed on a plastic, clawlike device known by the German word for grabber--Greifer--to move heavy objects, and I contemplated the long list of attachments--garden tools, spatulas, hammers and pool-shooting bridges--that were available by special order. I usually sported the hook, however, even if it aroused more fear than friendship among people I passed on the street. Some kids cowered. Friends accepted it and greeted me with a high-two. Rebekah, who had agreed to marry me several months earlier, thought my choice impudent but sexy and advised me on clothing to complement it--black was obviously best.

Half a year after I dismissed the suggestion from a Walter Reed doctor, the hook had become my trademark. It was brash, straightforward and pragmatic, virtues I cherished. I had left a lot of me behind in the Baghdad grenade attack. By its first anniversary, I was starting to reclaim it.

On July 3, Rebekah and I flew to Rancho Mirage, Calif., to celebrate my stepfather's 90th birthday. My mother hosted a party in the main ballroom of a swank hotel, the Lodge, for more than 60 family members and friends. Inevitably, when the subject of my accident came up and led to admiring comments, I felt a familiar twinge of guilt and embarrassment. I still couldn't embrace the notion of my so-called heroism.

Lying awake that night, I was reminded of a conversation I'd had with Hal Wain, a psychologist at Walter Reed. I had sought him out a few months earlier to discuss why I had grabbed the grenade. Wain said I had one overriding objective: self-preservation. "That's what all heroes are made of," he said. "I have learned from guys coming back that the instinct to survive, the instinct to take care of oneself or others, is incredibly potent. I really don't care if you did it for your needs or for others; you did it. The end result would have been the same--you saved people's lives."

Wain defined heroism as quick response to a changing environment, like a driver who swerves into another lane for the purpose of avoiding an oncoming car and, in the process, saves the life of his passenger. "That wasn't his intent," he said. "But being flexible and shifting is a higher level of intelligence. The people who can't change die."

I expressed my frustration that such a major ordeal had seemed to have so little effect on me--I was still the same impatient, competitive and self-critical person I'd always been. If I had acted so nobly, why didn't I feel more content? Wain's response struck me at the time as somewhat facile: the good deed, he said, had left me angry at myself. "You're thinking you could have done the same thing and didn't have to lose the hand. You love a perfect win and didn't get that perfect victory that you wanted and maybe deserved."

As I tossed and turned in the early hours of Independence Day, the simple truth of the psychologist's words hit me. It was true: I was mad at myself for failing to pull off a clean sweep. And it was that anger that was preventing me from savoring the achievement of a lifetime: saving my own skin and that of three others. My failure to get rid of the grenade before it exploded was only the first in a long list of wrongs I would have to pardon before I could finally put the ordeal behind me.

I had gone to Iraq for adventure and glory, discounting the interests of family and friends.

I had blithely ridden into danger with little to gain journalistically.

I had focused more on the loss of my hand than on the higher importance of preserving life.

The shortcomings were tough to swallow. But I was resolved to begin the process, keeping in mind Hal Wain's definition of heroism: self-preservation. By that standard, I had scored a perfect win after all.

The prize was the rest of my life.

Go to time.com to see a video interview with Michael Weisskopf and read a bonus excerpt from his book Blood Brothers

DOJ_NMG_0068809

The Men Of Ward 57 (TIME)

Time, September 25, 2006

Sunday, Sep. 24, 2006

The Men Of Ward 57

It is the signature wound of the Iraq war: limb loss. The potency of insurgent bombs and the proficiency of U.S. lifesavers have produced this result. Of the 20,322 Americans wounded in action, 436 have been amputees--more than 2%, a figure higher than in every war of the previous century except Vietnam, for which there were no good statistics. In his book, Michael Weisskopf chronicles the recoveries of three amputees he met at Walter Reed.

Cpl. Bobby Isaacs

Isaacs was given 72 hours to live after a bomb slammed his humvee in Mosul in December 2003. He arrived at Walter Reed intact, but successive surgeries chipped away at both his legs. After returning home to Roxboro, N.C., Isaacs, 25, was invited to speak at churches and became a minor celebrity among Fundamentalist Baptists

Sgt. Pete Damon

A National Guard aviation mechanic, Damon was inflating a tire on a Black Hawk helicopter in Balad when the tire's metal rim exploded in October 2003. He lost his arms--and his partner Paul Bueche. Two months later, Damon married his longtime girlfriend Jenn, exchanging roses in place of rings. Haunted with guilt over Bueche's death, Damon, 34, began to find peace after meeting Bueche's parents, who absolved him of blame

Msgt. Luis Rodriguez

A bomb in Mosul in November 2003 took Rodriguez's right leg as well as the only job the hard-driving combat medic had ever wanted. But Rodriguez, 37, who won a Bronze Star for bravery in Iraq, found a way to stay in uniform, teaching his craft at Fort Campbell in Kentucky

To see previous coverage in TIME on the casualties of the war, go to this week's cover story on time.com

Iraqi Parties Reach Deal Postponing Federalism (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 24 -- Iraq's fractious political parties reached a deal Sunday meant to prevent the country from splintering into a federation of three autonomous zones until at least 2008.

The agreement forestalled concerns that the debate over federalism, a vague concept enshrined in the constitution but defined differently by various political groups, could cause the country's fragile multi-sect government to collapse.

Sunni Arabs had threatened to boycott parliament over a proposal, introduced by a Shiite Muslim group this month, to create a mechanism that could carve out a predominantly Shiite region in southern Iraq, similar to the semiautonomous Kurdish zone in the north. Sunnis adamantly oppose that plan, which would leave them with a central area devoid of the oil reserves in other regions, and have pushed for a full review of the country's new constitution.

Under the compromise reached Sunday, parliament will form a 27-member committee on Monday to review the constitution and then introduce the Shiite measure on creating federal regions the following day, lawmakers said.

The federalism law would not take effect for at least 18 months after it is enacted, the parliament members said.

The deal appears to have forestalled for now a political crisis over federalism, but lawmakers emphasized that the issue remains unresolved.

"We still need a miracle to save the country," said Dhafer al-Ani, a spokesman for the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni bloc in parliament. "The process of sectarian cleansing is still going on, and the violence is not waning, and this may serve those proponents of federalism who want to make the people believe that living together in a unified country is not possible."

The measure is backed by Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite political party. But lawmakers from several other parties -- including the Iraqi Accordance Front, secular parties and the bloc of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr -- said they would vote against it.

Still, Humam Hamoudi, a lawmaker from Hakim's party, said he was confident the measure would pass by Oct. 22, the constitutionally mandated deadline for establishing a mechanism to create federal regions. He said votes from the Kurdish bloc and the Supreme Council would provide the simple majority needed to approve the law.

The Sunnis are lobbying to have a member of their sect named chairman of the constitutional review committee, which they hope will propose major revisions to the constitution. The charter, approved by voters last fall, was supported only reluctantly by the Sunnis on the condition that the federalism issue would be reexamined.

DOJ_NMG_0068810

"The main issue is the union of Iraq -- that Iraq stays as one Iraq -- and this should lead to articles in the constitution that properly reflect that on the subject of finances, natural resources, oil, the army, police formation and language," said Alaa Makki, a leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party, which is part of the Iraqi Accordance Front, when asked what the Sunnis hoped to change in the charter.

In other developments, Saddam Hussein's chief lawyer said Sunday that the former president's defense team would boycott his genocide trial "indefinitely."

"The court committed several violations of the law, and we will not just sit there gagged to give it legitimacy," said Khalil al-Dulaimi, the head of Hussein's nine-member defense team, according to the Associated Press.

The attorneys walked out of court Wednesday to protest a government attempt to remove the tribunal's chief judge, a move condemned by human rights groups and international legal experts.

Violence continued to rage across the country Sunday. At least 14 people were killed in attacks, including two car bombings that targeted Iraqi security forces, police said.

The U.S. military also announced that two Marines assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 were killed Sunday in combat in volatile Anbar province..

Special correspondents K.I. Ibrahim and Saad al-Izzi contributed to this report.

Iraqis Break 2-week Deadlock On Federalism (USAT/AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

USA Today, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — Political leaders from Iraq's feuding ethnic and religious groups agreed Sunday to consider amending the constitution and to begin debating legislation that would allow the country to become a federation of semiautonomous regions.

The agreement among Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish leaders broke a two-week deadlock in parliament.

The federalism legislation was proposed by Shiite groups. Sunni Arabs have opposed a federal structure for Iraq. They fear that allowing Iraq to become a federation of self-ruling regions — rather than a nation with direct rule by the central government — will splinter the country and deny them a share of the wealth from Iraq's oil resources, which are found in the predominantly Kurdish north and the heavily Shiite south.

Sunni leaders agreed to debate the legislation in parliament after all parties accepted their demand that a committee be set up to study amending the constitution. The committee will be named today, and the bill will be read to the 275-member parliament Tuesday.

Sunni Arabs hope to push through a constitutional amendment that would make it more difficult to establish autonomous regions.

The parliamentary committee will have four months to propose amendments. A majority in parliament would have to approve any amendments before they are put to a national referendum. “I expect the work of the committee will last for about one year,” said Dhafir al-Anihe, a lawmaker with the Sunni Arab National Accordance Front.

Although the constitution approved by Iraqis in a referendum a year ago provides for federalism, separate legislation is needed to turn the country into a federation.

The right to seek amendments to the constitution was a key demand made by Sunni Arabs when they agreed to join Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's national unity government in the spring.

The depth of the divide between Shiites and Sunni Arabs was evident in a disagreement over when the Muslim holy month of Ramadan begins. The holiday, during which Muslims fast from sunup to sundown, is timed to the sighting of the new crescent moon. Sunni Arabs began observing it Saturday. However, Iraq's most influential Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, declared that Ramadan would start today. The Shiite-led government followed Sistani's lead.

Violence among ethnic and religious groups has been intense in Baghdad this year. A bombing Saturday in the Shiite slum of Sadr City killed at least 38 people who were buying fuel for Ramadan. A Sunni Arab group claimed responsibility and said it was revenge for an attack by gunmen Friday on Sunni Arab homes and mosques that killed four people.

Al-Maliki pleaded for peace. “We are all invited to make use of these days to strengthen the bonds of brotherhood and avoid anything that could hurt the social fabric of the Iraqi people,” he said in a statement. “Iraq is living in a very sensitive and historic period, either we live as loving brothers side by side and undivided by sectarianism or Iraq will shift into an area for settling accounts of political parties.”

Despite his call, violence Sunday killed at least 20 Iraqis and wounded 37.

Sunday, four policemen on patrol near the Health Ministry were killed by a roadside bomb, police said. A car bomb targeting another police patrol killed five people, including three policemen, and wounded 17 in the eastern part of the capital, police Lt. Bilal Ali said.

DOJ_NMG_0068811

Police also found more apparent victims of death squads in the capital. Five bodies were found bound and blindfolded in eastern Baghdad. In a northeastern part of the city, four bodies of men ages 30-35 were found riddled with bullets.

Two U.S. Marines with Regimental Combat Team 5 died in fighting in Anbar province west of Baghdad, the U.S. military said. It didn't release any further details.

Also Sunday, Saddam Hussein's chief lawyer said the defense team will boycott the former Iraqi leader's genocide trial indefinitely. Khalil al-Dulaimi accused the judges of violating Iraqi law. The move is unlikely to halt the trial. Proceedings resume today.

Al-Dulaimi called last week's decision to replace the chief judge in the case a "flagrant violation of the law" because it was "dictated by the government and not the court." He also accused the court of committing "several violations of the law," including refusing to hear non-Iraqi lawyers and requiring foreign attorneys to seek permission to enter the courtroom. Among Saddam's nine lawyers are a Jordanian, a Spaniard, a Frenchman and two Americans, including former U.S. attorney general Ramsey Clark.

Saddam and seven other defendants have been on trial since Aug. 21 over a crackdown in Kurdish areas in the late 1980s. Saddam could be sentenced to death if convicted of genocide.

Iraqis To Debate Bill On Creating Autonomous States (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Abdul Razzaq Al-Saiedi

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 24 — Iraqi political leaders agreed on Sunday to postpone until at least 2008 any effort to carve up the country into powerful autonomous states, easing concerns that Shiites would move quickly to split off into one large confederation in southern Iraq.

The delay was part of a deal reached over the weekend to start debate on a bill that could eventually allow the country to be broken into autonomous regions.

The fight is at the heart of one of the most critical and divisive issues in Iraq: whether Shiites in the south will be able to form semi-independent regions, like Kurdistan in the north, that would control their own security as well as billions of barrels of oil.

Autonomous states are allowed by the new Iraqi Constitution, but the charter requires Parliament first to pass a bill defining how that would occur. A powerful faction of Shiites and Kurds tried to pass such a proposal three weeks ago. But their move angered Sunni Arabs and some Shiite and secular lawmakers, who united to block the bill and suggested that the issue could endanger Iraq's fragile government.

During a meeting of political leaders on Sunday, Sunni parties and other critics won two important concessions from the Shiite and Kurdish factions in return for allowing the proposal to be debated in Parliament this week.

The first postpones for 18 months the effective date of any legislation allowing the creation of autonomous regions. The second requires Parliament to form a committee immediately to consider amendments to the Constitution, including Sunni proposals to restrict autonomous states.

Moreover, Sunni negotiators emphasized that they did not agree to support the legislation that would be introduced this week but only to allow it to be debated, said Dhafir al-Ani, a leading Sunni lawmaker. "The issue is just to consider it and go with the process," Mr. Ani said.

The deal does allow supporters to put the issue before Parliament with a promise from rivals to debate the issue in good faith. When the bill was brought up earlier, it spurred an acrimonious fight. Mahmoud Mashhadani, the speaker of Parliament and a Sunni Arab, accused supporters of trying to sneak the bill past him, while other Sunni legislators said they had been double-crossed.

The political progress came as violence continued throughout Iraq. Two marines were killed as a result of "enemy action" in Anbar Province on Sunday, the United States military said.

At least 20 Iraqis were slain in bombings and other attacks, The Associated Press reported. The A.P. also reported that Saddam Hussein's legal team said it would continue to boycott the deposed leader's genocide trial in Baghdad. The lawyers are angry that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki fired a judge who prosecutors had charged was biased toward Mr. Hussein.

In one of Sunday's worst attacks, a bomb exploded near a Christian church in Baghdad, killing at least one person and wounding more than a dozen. Almaz Yunadim, a 34-year-old homemaker who witnessed the attack, said the attack was probably spurred by comments made by Pope Benedict XVI that many Muslims found offensive.

"People are being killed because of what the pope has said," she said. "The person who doesn't know how to speak should step down."

DOJ_NMG_0068812

The political deal reached on Sunday says the legislation defining how autonomous states are formed will not take effect until 18 months after it is approved, said Khalid al-Atiya, a deputy speaker of Parliament who is a negotiator for one of the Shiite factions. The constitutional committee is expected to complete its work within a year, Mr. Atiya said through an aide.

The most ardent supporter of the proposal is Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite party. Mr. Hakim wants to carve out a nine-province state that would include most of the people and oil in southern Iraq.

Sunni Arabs are suspicious of the plan, believing that it is sure to rob them of their share of Iraq's oil wealth. And some Shiite leaders worry that Mr. Hakim's plan for one giant Shiite state would create a dynasty for Mr. Hakim and leave their parties marginalized. They would prefer smaller autonomous states in areas where their influence is more concentrated.

The fight over autonomous regions threatened to doom the entire Constitution until a deal was worked out just before Iraqis voted on the charter last October. In that deal, Sunni leaders dropped their opposition to the idea in return for a provision requiring Parliament to renegotiate the parts that trouble the Sunnis. Now, with the formation of the committee, that process will begin.

Mr. Ani, the Sunni lawmaker, said 27 committee members would be selected Tuesday. Another Sunni politician, Khalaf al-Alyan, said Sunni parties would get 5 seats, the Kurds 5 seats, the secular coalition of the former interim prime minister, Ayad Allawi, 2 seats and the dominant Shiite coalition, the United Iraqi Alliance, 12. Other parties would get the remaining 3 seats.

Divisions remain within the Shiite coalition. Opposition from legislators loyal to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, as well as members of the Fadhila Party, helped derail the legislation three weeks ago.

Fadhila has agreed to debate the bill, but its members will vote for the measure only if it discourages the creation of one huge federation across southern Iraq, said Hassan al-Shimiri, a party official. Its stance is at odds with that of Mr. Hakim's party, but such a provision "would ease the fears of people who are afraid of fragmenting the country," Mr. Shimiri said.

Iraq Puts Autonomy Issue On Hold, Heading Off Crisis (LAT)

By Doug Smith And Saif Rasheed

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's leaders stepped back from a simmering constitutional crisis Sunday, agreeing to wait at least 18 months before setting up autonomous regions that would shift power away from the central government.

During the cooling-off period, parliament would consider amendments to the constitution, providing a public forum for the divisive issue of autonomy.

The deal, which was still being fine-tuned Sunday night, allows lawmakers to avoid a looming deadline that threatened to exacerbate the sectarian violence ravaging the country.

The compromise leaves intact southern Shiite Muslims' and northern Kurds' goal of creating a federal system that would strengthen their hold on the vast oil resources of their two regions. At the same time, Sunni Arabs, who dominate in the resource-poor central and western provinces, would have time to seek constitutional changes to limit the effects of autonomy.

The breakthrough occurred on a day in which bombings and killings claimed dozens of lives and Iraqi TV broadcast a videotape of two dead American soldiers being mutilated.

The military reported the deaths of two Marines in Al Anbar province Sunday. It did not release their names.

The video, a longer version of a clip aired in the summer, purported to show the two soldiers killed in June in an area south of Baghdad. The Mujahedin Shura Council, a group linked to Al Qaeda in Iraq, claimed responsibility for that attack.

The group said the deaths were in retaliation for the March raid in which U.S. soldiers allegedly raped an Iraqi girl and killed her and members of her family. Five U.S. soldiers and a former member of their unit face charges that range from failure to report the incident to rape and murder.

The video aired several times Sunday on the Al Arabiya channel. It showed masked men tying the partly unclad bodies to a truck by their heels and driving off. A later scene showed the bodies engulfed in flames. A narrator said the soldiers should be shown no mercy.

Lawmakers of all the major political blocs participated in the closed-door talks that led to the constitutional compromise. The deal will be put before the parliament this week for approval.

"I feel this agreement has ended a political crisis," said Dhafir Ani of the minority Sunni bloc that opposed the federal system. "I think for us this deal is good but not perfect."

Those present said the agreement called for the parliament to appoint a committee that would have a year to recommend amendments to the constitution. The members are to be named today.

DOJ_NMG_0068813

On Tuesday, the parliament is to begin debate on proposals for forming a federal system. At least four groups have offered their own drafts of the power-sharing law, but the one provided by the majority Shiite bloc is expected to prevail. The 18-month waiting period for implementation will begin once the law is passed.

A clause allowing amendments was added to the constitution as a last-minute concession to Sunnis who objected to the mandate for a federal system. The constitution also set a deadline that would have required implementation of the new federal system by Oct. 22.

Party leaders downplayed the idea that the federalism clause would be the primary item on the new committee's agenda.

Ayad Samaraie, a Sunni member of parliament who was involved in the talks, said the committee would provide an opportunity to put aside sectarian issues and consider a variety of amendments in the national interest.

Authorities in Baghdad, meanwhile, reported that 45 bodies were received at the morgue Sunday — eight victims of assassination and the remainder killed and dumped after being kidnapped.

Several car bombs went off in east Baghdad. Two Iraqi policemen were killed and several officers and civilians injured in a 10:30 a.m. blast in the Rusafa neighborhood, and a second bomb targeting police in Alwiya killed a civilian.

In the afternoon, a car bomb near the Baghdad morgue killed four policemen and two civilians and injured eight.

Health Minister Ali Shammari escaped an assassination attempt when a roadside bomb detonated as his motorcade passed in Yarmouk, in south Baghdad. There were no casualties.

Five people were killed in separate attacks in Baqubah, north of Baghdad.

Police in the northern city of Kirkuk said they found the bodies of four unidentified shooting victims who had been tortured.

A curfew was imposed in the southern city of Samawah after a former Iraqi interpreter for the U.S. military was gunned down late Saturday, the Muthanna provincial police chief said.

Armed men stormed into a government building in Hillah in the south, killing a guard.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, said Sunday that American and Iraqi forces had killed 14 people and detained more than 25 in strikes on terrorist cells last week. The raids, in five provinces, also yielded caches of weapons and explosive devices. In one attack, three men in explosives vests were killed by aircraft fire in Al Anbar, the statement said.

As Iraqi Lights Flicker, 'Generator Man' Feels Heat (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — In offices across Iraq, a ritual plays out every morning during the hottest months. Haggard employees drag themselves into the room, mumble a pleasantry or two and slump into their chairs, moaning about what a bad night's sleep they had: the power went out, the backup generator was broken, the heat was unbearable, the baby would not stop crying, mosquitoes were everywhere.

Inevitably, these grievances, like hornets, will gather in a single cloud of fury and swoop down on one target: the generator man, probably the most vilified figure in Iraqi society after Saddam Hussein.

Iraq has three sources of electrical power. At the low end is the frail national grid, which provides only about one hour of electricity every four hours — a total of six hours a day — and sometimes less.

At the top is the small, personal-size generator, a feature in many homes, though the steadily rising cost of fuel now makes it a luxury for most families.

Filling the gap, and carrying the load for much of urban Iraq, is the generator man, owner and operator of the neighborhood power plant. Throughout Baghdad, for example, there is at least one generator every few blocks to help power nearby homes and businesses.

The machines sit beneath corrugated tin roofs, on patches of sidewalk or in empty lots — hulking contraptions the size of small cars, jury-rigged with tubes and pipes that sputter and belch and make a deafening racket.

Customers run colored wires from their homes to the local generator by way of utility poles, converging with others into one wild, polychromatic river of wire that plunges through the roof of the generator shack, stopping at a makeshift fuse board.

In theory, the generator man provides 10 to 12 hours of power a day during periods of peak demand, seamlessly switching on when the national grid switches off. His services are especially valued during summer, when temperatures usually hover well over 100 degrees and air-conditioners are essential for sleep.

In addition, the generator man offers a better option, theoretically, than the personal generator, allowing families to pay less for a stronger current that will allow them to run all their major appliances simultaneously, rather than having to decide whether to forgo the television and computer for the washing machine or the air-conditioner and hair dryer for the refrigerator.

DOJ_NMG_0068814

A subscription for about 10 amperes from the generator man — typical for an average middle-class family here in the capital — costs about $65 a month, a mere fraction of the cost of drawing a similar current from a personal generator for several hours a day.

But in practice, most here say, the generator man often falls way short of his promises.

"My generator man?" seethed a seemingly well-adjusted, middle-class mother in Baghdad one recent sleep-deprived morning. "I want to cut his head off."

Many Iraqis say the generator man employs various tricks to try to save himself money: he starts his generator late and turns it off early; he prolongs repairs after breakdowns, both real and bogus; he claims he cannot get fuel because of national fuel shortages. Yet, they say, he never reimburses customers for lost hours.

"They are a bunch of thieves!" said Yusra, 47, an industrial engineer who lives in the relatively prosperous Mansour neighborhood in Baghdad and who requested that her last name not be published for fear of reprisals from her generator man. "We are 99.9 percent dependent on them! They are ruling our lives — not day by day, but hour by hour!"

Firas, 19, a university student who lives in Saidiya, a middle-class Baghdad neighborhood, and who asked that his last name not be published, said his generator man fiddled with the wires that lead to the homes of customers who offended him, causing interruptions to the service, or decreasing the current.

Talk to the generator man, however, and you will meet the self-styled savior of the republic.

"It's a tiring job," sighed a generator man who gave his name as Abu Fatma to protect his identity. His generator supplies power to about 95 homes and businesses.

Like the dozen or so other generator men interviewed for this article, Abu Fatma, 28, and his brother and partner, Hatem Abdul Karim, 22, were good-natured and remarkably unfazed by the hate they engendered.

On a recent afternoon, the brothers were hanging out around the corner from the generator, waiting for the national power grid to shut down so they could jump into action. Next to the generator was a small, windowless hut, not much bigger than the generator itself, containing a mattress and a television. This is where Mr. Karim, as the chief operator, lives round-the-clock.

The way the brothers see it, they are providing a very important service and a very difficult one under difficult circumstances. Rather than complain, they say, their clients should appreciate their hard work in the face of mounting fuel prices, chronic fuel shortages, dirty fuel that clogs up the machinery, the uncertainties of the national grid that require 24-hour vigilance, and costly and time-consuming repairs.

"The people, they only think about themselves," said Abu Fatma, his fingers stained with grease, sounding not so much resentful as resigned. "They complain and complain."

During one generator breakdown, his brother's shack was pummeled with sandals and other shoes, one of the worst insults in the Arab world. Mr. Karim and other generator men say they have been physically attacked by furious customers.

Generally, though, customers will vent by telephone.

"We should start the power at 1 p.m.," said Moyid, co-owner of a generator in a residential section of the upscale Karada neighborhood, who gave only his first name. "If it turns 1:05 and we haven't provided the power, the phone won't stop ringing."

As if on cue, his cellphone rang. It was past 1 p.m.

"I'm very sorry," Moyid told the caller, explaining that he had been distracted by a journalist and had lost track of the time. As he cranked up the generator, which erupted in a roar, one of his partners retrieved another cellphone dedicated to the generator and discovered it had received 30 unanswered phone calls in recent minutes. Everyone laughed.

Generator men insist that the laws of the free market apply to their business — the unhappy customer can always run his line to another generator. (Generator men are squirrelly when it comes to questions about earnings and say, simply, that the competition is tough and their profit margins slender.)

But disgruntled customers are often dissuaded from switching by the expense of running a new wire to another generator and paying a new subscription fee. And for many who switch, life remains the same.

"This year we changed our subscription three times, from bad to worse," said Firas, the university student. His family, he said, had fallen victim to a ploy commonly used by new generator men: they begin by offering more hours and lower rates than their competitors, but once they have captured a share of the market, they lower their hours and raise their rates.

Generator men are supposedly regulated by local district councils, which are charged with ensuring fair rates and energy supply. But many Iraqis say this system is a joke and rarely enforced.

The generator man, said Yusra, the industrial engineer, is just one of many travails Iraqis have to deal with daily, from corruption to foreign meddling to poor public services. "You want to smack him but you have to smile at him," she grumbled. "You can't think about dignity."

"We are a humiliated people," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0068815

The generator man, perhaps because of his visibility and accessibility, becomes the embodiment of all that is wrong in Iraq — or, at least, all that is not working as it is supposed to work, which to most people is just about everything.

"Most of our customers are really angry," said Muhammad, a university student and the co-owner of a generator in Karada. He also preferred not to give his full name. He was lounging with his two partners on the carpeted floor of a concrete and brick hut next to their machine, waiting for the national grid to shut down.

"Very few people sympathize with us," he said. "Most care only about themselves."

Unit Makes Do As Army Strives To Plug Gaps (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

FORT STEWART, Ga. — The pressures that the conflict in Iraq is putting on the Army are apparent amid the towering pine trees of southeast Georgia, where the Third Infantry Division is preparing for the likelihood that it will go back to Iraq for a third tour.

Col. Tom James, who commands the division's Second Brigade, acknowledged that his unit's equipment levels had fallen so low that it now had no tanks or other armored vehicles to use in training and that his soldiers were rated as largely untrained in attack and defense.

The rest of the division, which helped lead the invasion of Iraq in 2003 and conducted the first probes into Baghdad, is moving back to full strength after many months of being a shell of its former self.

But at a time when Pentagon officials are saying the Army is stretched so thin that it may be forced to go back on its pledge to limit National Guard deployment overseas, the division's situation is symptomatic of how the shortages are playing out on the ground.

The enormous strains on equipment and personnel, because of longer-than-expected deployments, have left active Army units with little combat power in reserve. The Second Brigade, for example, has only half of the roughly 3,500 soldiers it is supposed to have. The unit trains on computer simulators, meant to recreate the experience of firing a tank's main gun or driving in a convoy under attack.

"It's a good tool before you get the equipment you need," Colonel James said. But a few years ago, he said, having a combat brigade in a mechanized infantry division at such a low state of readiness would have been "unheard of."

Other than the 17 brigades in Iraq and Afghanistan, only two or three combat brigades in the entire Army — perhaps 7,000 to 10,000 troops — are fully trained and sufficiently equipped to respond quickly to crises, said a senior Army general.

Most other units of the active-duty Army, which is growing to 42 brigades, are resting or being refitted at their home bases. But even that cycle, which is supposed to take two years, is being compressed to a year or less because of the need to prepare units quickly to return to Iraq.

After coming from Iraq in 2003, the Third Infantry Division was sent back in 2005. Then, within weeks of returning home last January, it was told by the Army that one of its four brigades had to be ready to go back again, this time in only 11 months. The three other brigades would have to be ready by mid-2007, Army planners said.

Yet almost all of the division's equipment had been left in Iraq for their replacements, and thousands of its soldiers left the Army or were reassigned shortly after coming home, leaving the division largely hollow. Most senior officers were replaced in June.

In addition to preparing for Iraq, the Army assigned the division other missions it had to be ready to execute, including responding to hurricanes and other natural disasters and deploying to Korea if conflict broke out there.

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, who took command in June, says officials at Army headquarters ask him every month how ready his division is to handle a crisis in Korea. The answer, General Lynch says, is that he is getting there.

Since this summer, 1,000 soldiers a month have been arriving at Fort Stewart, 400 of them just out of basic training. As a result, the First and Third Brigades are now at or near their authorized troop strength, but many of the soldiers are raw.

The two brigades started receiving tanks and other equipment to begin training in the field only in the last month, leaving the division only partly able to respond immediately if called to Korea, General Lynch said.

"I'm confident two of the four brigade combat teams would say, 'O.K., let's go,' " General Lynch said in an interview. "The Second and Fourth Brigades would say, 'O.K., boss, but we've got no equipment. What are we going to use?' So we'd have to figure out where we're going to draw their equipment."

Meanwhile, the division is also preparing for deployment to Iraq on an abbreviated timeline.

The brief time at home does not sit well with some soldiers. Specialist George Patterson, who re-enlisted after returning from Iraq in January, said last week that he was surprised to learn he could end up being home with his wife and daughter for only a year.

DOJ_NMG_0068816

"I knew I would be going back," Specialist Patterson said. "Did I think I would leave and go back in the same year? No. It kind of stinks."

Instead of allowing more than a year to prepare to deploy, the First Brigade training schedule has been squeezed into only a few months, so the brigade can be ready to deploy as ordered by early December. Though the unit has not yet been formally designated for Iraq, most soldiers say there is little doubt they are headed there early next year.

Some combat-skills training not likely to be used in Iraq has been shortened substantially, said Col. John Charlton, the brigade commander. "It's about taking all the requirements and compressing them, which is a challenge," he said.

The timetable also leaves officers and their soldiers less time to form close relationships that can be vital, several officers said.

And soldiers have less time to learn their weapons systems. Many of the major weapons systems, like artillery and even tanks, are unlikely to be used frequently in a counterinsurgency fight like Iraq.

The division has only a few dozen fully armored Humvees for training because most of the vehicles are in use in Iraq. Nor does it have all the tanks and trucks it is supposed to have when at full strength.

"There is enough equipment, and I would almost say just enough equipment," said Lt. Col. Sean Morrissey, the division's logistics officer. "We're accustomed to, 'I need 100 trucks. Where's my hundred trucks?' Well, we're nowhere near that."

Last week, in training areas deep in the Fort Stewart woods, First Brigade soldiers were still learning to use other systems important in Iraq, like unmanned aerial vehicles, which are used for conducting surveillance.

Standing at a training airfield with three of the aircraft nearby, Sgt. Mark Melbourne, the senior noncommissioned officer for the brigade's unmanned aerial vehicles platoon, said only 6 of the brigade's 15 operators had qualified so far in operating the aircraft from a ground station.

All of them are supposed to be qualified by next month, but the training has been slowed by frequent rain, Sergeant Melbourne said.

This week, the First Brigade began a full-scale mission rehearsal for Iraq.

Normally, armored units preparing for Iraq are sent to Fort Irwin, Calif., for such training, but transporting a brigade's worth of equipment and soldiers there takes a month, which the schedule would not permit.

So the trainers and Arabic-speaking role players, who will simulate conditions the unit is likely to encounter in Iraq, were brought here to conduct the three-week exercise in a Georgia pine forest, rather than in the California desert.

British Soldiers Allegedly Traded Guns For Cocaine (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

LONDON, Sept. 24 -- A newspaper in Britain reported Sunday that British soldiers had smuggled stolen guns out of Iraq and exchanged them on the black market for cocaine.

A spokesman for the Defense Ministry said Sunday that soldiers had been investigated for the "unlawful possession" of weapons and that prosecutors would decide whether there was enough evidence to file charges. He would not comment on the report that small arms had been exchanged on the black market for drugs.

According to the Sunday Times, the soldiers transported handguns from Iraq to Germany and exchanged some of them for cocaine with a street value of $4,700. The drugs were then sold to soldiers fighting in Iraq, the newspaper reported.

The article said soldiers from the 3rd Battalion, Yorkshire Regiment, which has since returned from Iraq, are at the center of the inquiry.

The allegations come at a time of heightened focus on military misconduct, including reports of increasing drug use among troops in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Additionally, a British soldier pleaded guilty last week to "inhumane" treatment of Iraqi civilians in the death of a hotel receptionist who was allegedly beaten in September 2003 at a British military camp in Basra, a city in southern Iraq. Baha Mousa suffered 93 injuries, prosecutors said, including fractured ribs and a broken nose, before he died.

Six other soldiers charged in connection with his death have pleaded not guilty in the continuing court-martial.

On Saturday, thousands of protesters demanding that Britain withdraw its troops from Iraq and Afghanistan marched in Manchester, England, where Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labor Party opened its annual conference this weekend.

With polls showing public hostility toward Blair and weariness with the ongoing war, the prime minister announced earlier this month that he would step down within a year.

During an interview with the BBC on Sunday, Blair said the war in Afghanistan, where British soldiers have a particularly large presence, must continue.

DOJ_NMG_0068817

"The whole reason we've gone into that as part of the NATO force under the U.N. resolution is because it is essential for the Taliban and al-Qaeda to come back into the southern part of Afghanistan, and it's essential for us to keep them out."

Blair also said the battle with insurgents in southern Afghanistan has been "tougher than anyone expected."

Due Process, Bulldozed (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

Until five months ago, Bilal Hussein was part of a team of Associated Press photographers that had won a Pulitzer Prize for photos documenting the fighting and carnage in Iraq.

Now he's a prisoner, having been seized by the U.S. government.

You might ask: What's he been charged with?

The answer: Nothing.

There was a flurry of interest last week in the case of Maher Arar, a terror suspect who was shipped to Syria and tortured before it was learned that, alas, he was not a terrorist. Mr. Hussein got a little news coverage last week, as well. People who still think there is a place in this world for fairness, justice and due process are calling on the authorities to either charge him with a crime or release him.

Mr. Hussein, an Iraqi hired by The A.P., was taken into custody by U.S. forces in Ramadi last April 12. As in many similar cases, U.S. officials have been saying — without disclosing evidence to back up their comments — that he had improper ties to the insurgents.

But neither the Americans nor the Iraqis have officially charged Mr. Hussein with anything.

Scott Horton, a prominent New York lawyer called in by The A.P. to work on the case, said: "The administration always starts with a broad-brush tarring of these individuals. You'll have officials saying: 'Oh, they're bad dudes. They're evil. We have evidence we can't show you that would demonstrate just how terrible these people are.'

"Well, sometimes they do. But very frequently, alarmingly frequently, they don't."

Mr. Hussein's case closely resembles that of Abdul Ameer Hussein, a cameraman hired by CBS News who was wounded while covering an attack on an American convoy in Mosul on April 5, 2005. He was shot by a U.S. soldier, a sniper who was more than 200 yards away.

Mr. Hussein was taken to a hospital. His camera and videotapes were seized. And despite his CBS press credentials, which were checked out and found to be legitimate, he was arrested by U.S. authorities and imprisoned. Much of his time over the course of the next year was spent in solitary confinement at the Abu Ghraib prison, where he was subjected to coercive interrogation and other indignities.

For what?

American officials were telling reporters, without offering any evidence, that Mr. Hussein had been collaborating with insurgents. He hadn't been. It turned out he was completely innocent. In fact, he was a kind of timid guy who was less than thrilled about having a job that required him to shoot combat footage.

This is a spooky time in history. It's one thing for tyrannical regimes like the old Soviet Union and Communist China to bulldoze the very idea of human rights and human decency by engaging in such atrocities as detention without trial, torture and other forms of state terror. It's something else completely when the United States, the greatest symbol of liberty that the world has ever known, begins to head down that hellish road.

Abdul Ameer Hussein ultimately was able to escape the clutches of the authorities because of the persistent legal effort pushed by CBS News on his behalf. Scott Horton was part of that effort. A year after he was taken into custody, Mr. Hussein, manacled and wearing an orange jumpsuit, was walked into a Baghdad courtroom for a trial. It was quickly determined that the case against him was ludicrous.

"There was absolutely no evidence against this guy," said Mr. Horton. "Even the attorney general of Iraq said there was no basis for proceeding against him."

The case was dismissed.

Several Iraqi journalists working for international news organizations have been held without charge by American and Iraqi forces. The absence of concrete evidence in so many of the cases is disturbing, to say the least.

"I am absolutely convinced," said Mr. Horton, "that the ton of bricks fell on these two guys — Bilal Hussein and Abdul Ameer Hussein — because they were working as professional journalists. They were the eyes of the world, covering things that the Pentagon doesn't want people in America to see."

A legitimate news organization can't help but experience a shudder at hearing that one of its employees may have been collaborating with the enemy. It's a chilling, devastating allegation. To make that charge recklessly is reprehensible.

DOJ_NMG_0068818

The Rise Of Jihadistan (NSWK)

By Ron Moreau, Sami Yousafzai And Michael Hirsh

Newsweek, September 25, 2006

You don't have to drive very far from Kabul these days to find the Taliban. In Ghazni province's Andar district, just over a two-hour trip from the capital on the main southern highway, a thin young man, dressed in brown and wearing a white prayer cap, stands by the roadside waiting for two NEWSWEEK correspondents. It is midday on the central Afghan plains, far from the jihadist-infested mountains to the east and west. Without speaking, the sentinel guides his visitors along a sandy horse trail toward a mud-brick village within sight of the highway. As they get closer a young Taliban fighter carrying a walkie-talkie and an AK-47 rifle pops out from behind a tree. He is manning an improvised explosive device, he explains, in case Afghan or U.S. troops try to enter the village.

In a parched clearing a few hundred yards on, more than 100 Taliban fighters ranging in age from teenagers to a grandfatherly 55-year-old have assembled to meet their provincial commander, Muhammad Sabir. An imposing man with a long, bushy beard, wearing a brown and green turban and a beige shawl over his shoulders, Sabir inspects his troops, all of them armed with AKs and rocket-propelled grenade launchers. He claims to have some 900 fighters, and says the military and psychological tide is turning in their favor. "One year ago we couldn't have had such a meeting at midnight," says Sabir, who is in his mid-40s and looks forward to living out his life as an anti-American jihadist. "Now we gather in broad daylight. The people know we are returning to power."

Not long after NEWSWEEK's visit, U.S. and Afghan National Army forces launched a major attack to dislodge the Taliban from Ghazni and four neighboring provinces. But when NEWSWEEK returned in mid-September, Sabir's fighters were back, performing their afternoon prayers. It is an all too familiar story. Ridge by ridge and valley by valley, the religious zealots who harbored Osama bin Laden before 9/11—and who suffered devastating losses in the U.S. invasion that began five years ago next week—are surging back into the country's center. In the countryside over the past year Taliban guerrillas have filled a power vacuum that had been created by the relatively light NATO and U.S. military footprint of some 40,000 soldiers, and by the weakness of Afghan President Hamid Karzai's administration.

In Ghazni and in six provinces to the south, and in other hot spots to the east, Karzai's government barely exists outside district towns. Hard-core Taliban forces have filled the void by infiltrating from the relatively lawless tribal areas of Pakistan where they had fled at the end of 2001. Once back inside Afghanistan these committed jihadist commanders and fighters, aided by key sympathizers who had remained behind, have raised hundreds, if not thousands, of new, local recruits, many for pay. They feed on the people's disillusion with the lack of economic progress, equity and stability that Karzai's government, NATO, Washington and the international community had promised.

NATO officials say the Taliban seems to be flush with cash, thanks to the guerrillas' alliance with prosperous opium traffickers. The fighters are paid more than $5 a day—good money in Afghanistan, and at least twice what the new Afghan National Army's 30,000 soldiers receive. It's a bad sign, too, that a shortage of local police has led Karzai to approve a plan allowing local warlords—often traffickers themselves—to rebuild their private armies. U.N. officials have spent the past three years trying to disband Afghanistan's irregular militias, which are accused of widespread human-rights abuses. Now the warlords can rearm with the government's blessing. Afghanistan is "unfortunately well on its way" to becoming a "narco-state," NATO's supreme commander, Marine Gen. Jim Jones, said before Congress last week.

Jabar Shilghari, one of Ghazni's members of Parliament, is appalled by his province's rapid reversal of fortune. Only a year ago he was freely stumping for votes throughout the province. Today it's not safe for him to return to his own village. In a recent meeting he asked Karzai for more police and soldiers; he was rebuffed by the deputy director of intelligence, who told him the Taliban threat in Ghazni is minimal. "We have patiently waited five years for change, for an end to official corruption and abuse of power and for economic development," says Shilghari, who now lives in the increasingly sequestered capital of Kabul. "But we've received nothing."

Not long ago, the Bush administration was fond of pointing to Afghanistan as a model of transformation. That mountainous landlocked country, we were told, was being converted from a "failed state"—Al Qaeda's base for the worst ever attacks on U.S. continental soil—into a functioning, responsible member of the international community. In speech after speech, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other senior U.S. officials ticked off the happy stats: the Taliban and Al Qaeda had been routed, democratic presidential and parliamentary elections had been held, more than 3 million refugees had returned and 1.75 million girls were attending school.

But the harsh truth is that five years after the U.S. invasion on Oct. 7, 2001, most of the good news is confined to Kabul, with its choking rush-hour traffic jams, a construction boom and a handful of air-conditioned shopping malls. Much of the rest of Afghanistan appears to be failing again. Most worrisome, a new failed-state sanctuary is emerging across thousands of square miles along the Afghan-Pakistan border: "Jihadistan," it could be called. It's an autonomous quasi state of religious radicals, mostly belonging to Pashtun tribes who don't recognize the Afghan-Pakistan frontier—an arbitrary line drawn by the British colonialists in 1893. The enclave's fluid borders span a widening belt of territory from mountainous hideouts in the southernmost provinces of Afghanistan—Nimruz, Helmand and Farah—up through the agricultural middle of the country in Ghazni, Uruzgan and Zabul, and then north to Paktia and parts of Konar. It extends well across the Pakistan border where, despite close cooperation between the U.S. and Pakistani militaries, jihadist militants in Waziristan province have begun calling themselves "Pakistani Taliban." No longer worried about interference from Islamabad, they openly recruit young men to fight in Afghanistan, and they hold Islamic kangaroo courts that sometimes stage public executions.

DOJ_NMG_0068819

There are not nearly enough U.S., Western or Afghan troops or resources in the field to counter them. At a time when the American president has resurrected Osama bin Laden as public enemy No. 1—comparing him recently to Lenin and Hitler—Bush's own top commander in the field, Army Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, says not enough money is being invested in creating a new Afghanistan. Improving Afghan lives is the only way to drive a stake through the Taliban or put the elusive Qaeda leader out of action, he says. "We need more in terms of investment in Afghan infrastructure. We need more resources, for road building, counternarcotics, good governance, a justice system," Eikenberry told NEWSWEEK last week. As the general is fond of saying: "Where the roads end, the Taliban begin."

Indeed, the aid numbers for the past five years are grim. In the first years of reconstruction, aid amounted to just $67 a year per Afghan, says Beth DeGrasse of the government-funded U.S. Institute of Peace. She compares that figure with other recent nation-building exercises such as Bosnia ($249) and East Timor ($256), citing figures from the International Monetary Fund. "You get what you pay for in these endeavors, and we tried to do Afghanistan on the cheap," she says. "And we are going to pay for it." International conferences since 2002 have pledged some $15 billion, but countries have ponied up less than half of that so far. And the Afghan government estimates it will need $27.5 billion through 2010 to rebuild the country and its institutions.

Some critics point to a jarring mismatch between Bush's rhetoric and the scant attention paid to Afghanistan. Jim Dobbins, Bush's former special envoy to Kabul—he also led the Clinton administration's rebuilding efforts in Bosnia, Kosovo, Haiti and Somalia—calls Afghanistan the "most under-resourced nation-building effort in history." Former Bush reconstruction coordinator Carlos Pascual, who retired in December 2005, does not dispute this assessment. He says the State Department has "maybe 20 to 30 percent" of the people it needs. Even Republican Sen. Richard Lugar, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, fretted last week that for five years the administration and Congress have failed to create a powerful nation-building czar, despite their enthusiasm for regime change. "We have a long way to go," he said.

The dangers of allowing Afghanistan to become a jihadist haven again are too many to count. It's not merely that bin Laden and Zawahiri may now die peacefully in their beds, safe among Pashtun tribesmen, as a senior U.S. military official conceded to NEWSWEEK last week, speaking anonymously because he was discussing classified operations. (A French intelligence report leaked over the weekend suggested bin Laden had done just that in August, dying quietly of typhus, but like many such rumors in the past it could not be confirmed.) Nor is the problem simply that the increasingly confident Taliban is launching ever more brazen attacks—in recent weeks, bombing a convoy scarcely a block from the U.S. Embassy in Kabul and assassinating a major provincial governor.

No: it's that Al Qaeda or other terrorist groups now have a place from which to hatch the next 9/11. "This standoff could go on for 40 or 50 years," says a retired U.S. general who served in Afghanistan, speaking only on condition of anonymity. "It's not going to be a takeover by the Taliban as long as NATO is there. Instead this is going to be like the triborder region of South America, or like Kashmir, a long, drawn-out stalemate where everyone carves out spheres of influence." Eikenberry disagrees, though he refused to put a time frame on Afghanistan's recovery. "It won't be decades," he says.

The Taliban doesn't always share Al Qaeda's goals or tactics, although some units have taken up suicide bombing. But a guerrilla calling himself Commander Hemat, a former anti-Soviet mujahedin fighter who now works closely with the Taliban and Al Qaeda, says foreign Arabs are being welcomed again. "Now the money is flowing again because the insurgencies in Iraq and Afghanistan are producing results," he told NEWSWEEK. Zabibullah, a Taliban operative who has proved reliable in the past, says the Qaeda operatives "feel more secure and can concentrate on their own business other than just surviving."

Pakistan fostered the Taliban movement in the 1990s as a way of holding sway over Afghanistan and undercutting India's influence there. Those ties persist. Despite Bush's praise of Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf—"We're on the hunt together," Bush said at a joint news conference on Friday—U.S. and British military officials say Musharraf has allowed the Taliban to set up headquarters near the southwestern city of Quetta. Musharraf has also cut a deal giving militants free rein in north Waziristan; since then cross-border attacks have increased. Senior U.S. officials say that Musharraf caved in to Qaeda sympathizers who fiercely resisted the Pakistani Army's incursion into the tribal region last year. Musharraf reassured Bush last week that the Waziristan tribal leaders had agreed not to permit Taliban or Qaeda cross-border activity, but the militants say no such commitment was made. "Instead of eliminating the militants, the Pakistani military operation only added to their strength," says

DOJ_NMG_0068820

Ayaz Amir, a respected political columnist for the daily Dawn newspaper. The Afghan Taliban's recent offensive has only raised the morale of their Pakistani brethren.

General Eikenberry says that Al Qaeda or its successors have nothing like the liberty that allowed them to plot 9/11 in the open. "They have no safe haven inside Afghanistan that if we find it, we will not strike against them," he said. But conclusive victory will depend on a "political solution" arising from a far more effective Afghan government, Eikenberry says. Asked whether terrorists will always have a place to root there, Eikenberry pauses for long seconds before answering. "You reach a tipping point" where military superiority no longer counts as much, he said. "There's always going to be another valley for terrorist forces or extremists to hide in."

No one knows this better than Eikenberry himself, a genial soldier-scholar with degrees from Harvard and Stanford. Two weeks after NEWSWEEK's visit to Ghazni province's Andar district, the American general passed through the same area and urged Afghan security forces to be more active in combating the increasingly aggressive, large and visible Taliban presence.

Days later, Eikenberry launched his major Afghan-U.S. operation in Ghazni, code-named Mountain Fury. Most of the Taliban had easily escaped to the east while a number of insurgents remained behind to engage the enemy, firing automatic weapons and RPGs. According to Afghan officials, about 38 Taliban were killed that day. Interviewed after the action, Momin Ahmad, the Taliban's deputy commander for a cluster of Andar villages, disputes that number. He says he lost only four men: a Pakistani, an Iraqi and two local insurgents who were killed by an Apache helicopter that shot up a local vineyard.

And while Ahmad's unit is now regrouping to the east, at least 35 Taliban have stashed their weapons and stayed in the village posing as farmers. They will lay ambushes and plant IEDs to harass Afghan and U.S. troops, Ahmad says, and the larger Taliban force will return when it's safe. He shrugs off the setback, saying it's only temporary. "We never expected the success we've had," says Ahmad. Nor, five years ago, did anyone else.

NATO Details Airstrikes In Afghanistan (AP)

By Rahim Faiez

AP, September 25, 2006

NATO forces killed more than 60 suspected insurgents the last several days in an increasingly volatile southern Afghan province while suffering no casualties, the military alliance said Sunday.

Afghanistan's Ministry of Defense said 40 Taliban fighters were killed by NATO airstrikes that "completely destroyed" a militant base in the district of Grishk on Saturday. Maj. Luke Knittig, a NATO spokesman, said the alliance also estimated about 40 fighters were killed.

A NATO helicopter, meanwhile, fired on about 20 insurgents attacking a NATO patrol in neighboring Naw Zad district Friday, killing 15 of the rebels, the alliance said.

In a third incident, an attack helicopter fired on a group of insurgents who shot at a support helicopter Thursday, killing eight of the militants in nearby Sangin district, the statement said.

NATO troops, mostly from Canada and Britain, moved into southern Afghanistan earlier this summer, taking over from a U.S.-led force in a region that in recent months has seen some of the fiercest fighting since the Taliban regime was defeated in late 2001.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair, whose country has about 5,000 soldiers in southern Helmand province, said Sunday that NATO's battle with Afghan insurgents has been more difficult than anticipated but must continue.

"I think the particular mission was tougher than anyone expected. But I'm not surprised it was tough," Blair said in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corp.

He said the Taliban and al-Qaida are trying hard to gain control in Afghanistan's south and "it's essential for us to keep them out."

Blair's government has had to cope with charges by middle-ranking officers in Afghanistan that ground troops have not received adequate air support and other backing.

Adm. Edmund P. Giambastiani Jr., vice chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, said during a visit to Afghanistan earlier this month that the U.S. military is better able to detect roadside bombs before they detonate thanks in part to the creation of an anti-explosives team.

"Now we must work harder every day toward reducing our numbers of causalities from these horrible attacks," said Giambastiani, according to statements released Sunday by the U.S. military.

Taliban fighters have increasingly used suicide and roadside bombs to attack Western troops and Afghan civilians.

The anti-explosives team focuses on trends, techniques, tactics and procedures used in developing the devices and the information is passed on to troops in the field, the statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0068821

Giambastiani said the Navy and Air Force are sending electronic warfare officers to Afghanistan and Iraq to work on counter-explosives measures. He said the military planned to purchase route-clearing equipment for use in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

NATO has about 20,000 soldiers in Afghanistan, while the United States has an additional 21,000, mostly in the eastern part of the country along the border with Pakistan.

Losing Afghanistan (WSJ)

By John Kerry

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

As we marked the fifth anniversary of the worst attack on American soil, there was enormous discussion of the lessons of 9/11. But after the bagpipes stopped, and news coverage turned to other issues, perhaps the first lesson of that day seemed quickly forgotten: We cannot allow Afghanistan to become a terrorist stronghold and a staging ground for attacks on America.

If Washington seems to have forgotten Afghanistan, it is clear the Taliban and al Qaeda have not. Less than five years after American troops masterfully toppled the Taliban, the disastrous diversion in Iraq has allowed these radicals the chance to rise again. Time is running out to reverse an unfolding disaster in the war we were right to fight after 9/11.

Funded largely by a flourishing opium trade, a resurgent Taliban effectively controls entire swathes of southern Afghanistan. Roadside bomb attacks have more than doubled this year, and suicide attacks have more than tripled. Britain's commander in Afghanistan recently said that "the intensity and ferocity of the fighting is far greater than in Iraq on a daily basis."

Al Qaeda is again taking advantage: The recent plot to blow up U.S.-bound jets was reportedly masterminded by an al Qaeda affiliate operating from Afghanistan. The same killers who attacked us on 9/11 are still plotting against America -- and they're still holed up in Afghanistan. President Karzai put it simply: "The same enemies that blew up themselves in . . . the twin towers in America are still around." And while President Bush frequently quotes Ayman al-Zawahiri, he hasn't mentioned that on the fifth anniversary of 9/11 al Qaeda's No. 2 described the situation in Afghanistan as "very good."

When did denying al Qaeda a safe haven in Afghanistan cease to be an urgent American priority? Somehow, we ended up with seven times more troops in Iraq -- which even the administration now admits had nothing to do with 9/11 -- than in Afghanistan, where the killers still roam free. Even as the president claimed we are on the offensive against terrorists, Gen. James Jones, the U.S. commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan, made an urgent plea for more troops to fight the Taliban. President Karzai has also appealed for more troops and support, and on my trip to Afghanistan this year, he stressed to me the importance of a robust American troop presence. And on Sept. 11 this year, U.S. Col. Michael Harrison noted "more troops would be welcome" in the hunt for bin Laden and his henchmen.

Quite simply, we must change course -- starting with the immediate deployment of at least 5,000 additional U.S. troops. That includes more special forces to defeat the Taliban, more civil affairs troops to bolster the promising Provisional Reconstruction Teams, more infantry to prevent Taliban infiltration from Pakistan, and more clandestine intelligence units to hunt al Qaeda on both sides of the border. That also means more predator drones to provide real-time intelligence, more helicopters and transport aircraft to allow rapid deployment, and more heavy combat equipment to overpower enemy forces.

We must also redouble our reconstruction efforts. The Taliban's resurgence comes as no surprise when 40% of the population is unemployed and 90% lack regular electricity. As Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry recently said, "wherever the road ends, that's where the Taliban starts." That's why our generals are asking for more reconstruction funds to win over the local population. Yet this administration has appropriated nearly four times more in reconstruction funds for Iraq than Afghanistan -- and actually cut Afghan aid by 30% this year. We need to substantially increase development aid and take advantage of the improved security provided by additional troops to ensure that reconstruction efforts reach the remote villages where the Taliban finds support. We must ensure that the elected government in Kabul, helped by the U.S. -- not the Taliban, helped by al Qaeda -- rebuilds Afghanistan.

This is especially important to counter the opium trade, which increased 50% last year and now funds insurgents, warlords and terrorists world-wide. We must provide alternative livelihoods for opium farmers and spur the judicial reforms necessary to prevent drug lords from acting with impunity. We cannot -- and should not -- do this alone. Asked which of the 26 countries in the alliance were dragging their feet in Afghanistan, Gen. Jones replied, "All of them." Where allies have pledged troops and assistance, they must follow through. But we must lead by example. That's how you win hearts and minds, and show the world the true face of America -- and that's how you win the war on terror.

Finally, we must use economic leverage to ensure the Taliban no longer finds sanctuary and recruits in Pakistan. Last year we gave Pakistan only $300 million in economic support, about what we spend in a day in Iraq. We need to give more, in development funds earmarked for specific projects that help undermine radicals, and demand more in return from the Musharraf government. We cannot afford to repeat the mistakes of the past. The U.S. must not cut and run from the real front line in the war on terror. We must recommit to victory in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0068822

Mr. Kerry, a senator from Massachusetts, was the 2004 Democratic nominee for president.

Two Deaths Were A 'Clue That Something's Wrong' (LAT)

By Craig Pyes And Kevin Sack

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

A Special Forces team in Afghanistan failed to alert its superiors. Witnesses tell of torture.

WAZI, Afghanistan — The Green Berets of ODA 2021 were on high alert as their convoy rumbled down the winding, rutted road that day in March 2003. The team had been tipped that armed men loyal to the notoriously volatile warlord Pacha Khan Zadran lay in wait around the bend.

As they approached this mountain village in eastern Afghanistan, the Americans spied the warlord's fighters high on a ridge to their right. They scrambled for cover behind their trucks and Humvees.

Moments later, machine-gun fire and rocket-propelled grenades rained down on their vulnerable position. Though pinned down, the Americans responded with a fusillade of their own.

"The air was snapping like Rice Crispies [sic]," the Special Forces team's newly assigned commander, Chief Warrant Officer Kenneth C. Waller, 32, wrote in a florid after-action report. "So many rounds were flying back and forth that lead was overcoming the oxygen in the air."

The battle raged for 45 minutes, then A-10 attack planes and Apache helicopters flew in and strafed the Afghans into retreat.

There were no casualties among the 17 Americans on patrol that day. "It seemed as if we had an angelic bubble surrounding our position," Waller reported to headquarters.

Though Waller filed several detailed and colorful accounts of the battle, he apparently omitted any mention of what happened next.

As some members of ODA 2021 pursued the warlord's men into the hills, others moved into the village to search the mud-walled houses for fighters.

They detained three unarmed men for questioning. Two of them, brothers Jan and Wakil Mohammed, told the soldiers they were just returning from evening prayers at the mosque and had nothing to do with the shootout.

Suddenly, another band of five or six Green Berets emerged from the hills where they had been chasing Pacha Khan's men. They had no interpreters.

"Those soldiers were running toward us and yelling in English, and we didn't understand what they were saying," Jan Mohammed recalled in an interview. Amid the confusion, he said, his brother grew frantic. Wakil, a woodcutter and father of two, raised his hands and shouted in Pashto, "De Khoday day para ma me vala!" according to his brother. "For God's sake, don't shoot me!"

There was a burst of gunfire from one soldier, Jan Mohammed said, and three rounds ripped into Wakil. One struck him in the mouth. He fell dead at his brother's feet.

At day's end, Waller would report to his chain of command that six enemy fighters had been killed in action.

But the circumstances of Wakil's death were not described in Waller's reports, and Army criminal investigators would later determine that the killing could not be classified as a battlefield casualty. Last year, they listed it as a murder. However, the military has since reopened its probe, and investigators decline to say whether the same charges are being pursued.

It would not be the only questionable death of a detainee in the custody of ODA 2021, nor the only one that leaders of the 10-man field team would fail to disclose to superiors in the Alabama National Guard's 20th Special Forces Group.

Within days of the Wazi killing, an 18-year-old Afghan army recruit named Jamal Naseer died after being interrogated at the team's firebase in Gardez, about 25 miles to the north. Multiple witnesses say his body showed signs of severe beating and other abuse. His brother and six others also held at Gardez say they were tortured.

The commander over all Special Forces in Afghanistan at the time, then-Col. James G. "Greg" Champion, said in a brief interview that neither death was reported up the chain of command. Champion, a National Guardsman who has since been promoted to brigadier general, said he did not hear of the deaths until 18 months later, when he learned that The Times was investigating.

The team's battalion commander also said that neither death was reported to him.

"Two unreported deaths in a few days are a clue that something's wrong" with that team, said a military official familiar with the incidents, who asked not to be identified.

DOJ_NMG_0068823

There were others who helped keep the secrets of the base. The United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan, or UNAMA, which was responsible for monitoring human rights abuses, was informed that Naseer's death in Gardez probably involved "torture and other cruel and inhuman treatment" by Special Forces troops. But U.N. officials acknowledge they did not report it to American authorities for at least 13 months, and U.S. officials say it was never reported at all.

The provincial governor helped conceal the mistreatment by arranging for the late-night removal of Naseer's body from the military base. He also ordered the abrupt transfer of the other detainees from the base to the custody of the local police chief after they had been held many days beyond what military procedures allowed.

Though U.S. commanders in Afghanistan said they did not know about the death, word spread throughout Paktia province, according to Gen. Hajji Abdul Sattar, the Paktia attorney general for intelligence. He said no one spoke out or complained, however, because "people were scared that … the same thing would happen to them."

The Army's Criminal Investigation Command has been examining both deaths and apparent cover-ups for two years, since learning about them from The Times and the Crimes of War Project, a Washington-based nonprofit educational organization, which first confirmed Naseer's death.

ODA 2021's missions and tactics became markedly more aggressive after Waller took charge of the Special Forces detachment in February 2003, a month before the questionable deaths in Wazi and Gardez. He recently had been reassigned from another Special Forces unit, where some of his men complained that his gung-ho leadership style put them at unnecessary risk.

Waller was characterized by several 20th Group officials as deeply affected by the Sept. 11 attacks and having come to Afghanistan "spoiling for a fight."

In Gardez, he was able to set his sights squarely on Pacha Khan, the warlord who had been destabilizing the countryside for months.

Pacha Khan's men were suspected of extorting illegal payments from truckers on the road from Gardez to Khowst, supporting anti-government forces, and staging an ambush that wounded the ODA's battalion chief during a Thanksgiving trip to Gardez.

But at the Pentagon and State Department, Pacha Khan was regarded as a political figure and thus a problem for the new Afghan government, not the U.S. military. The Special Forces team chafed at the political constraints on its freedom to go after him.

Local U.N. officials said they were struck by how deeply personal the conflict between the team and the warlord had become. One of the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity, recalled that one Green Beret likened the team's rivalry with Pacha Khan to a blood feud.

Another U.N. official said the same American soldier had told him that "he was so frustrated with [Pacha Khan] that he was going to kill him."

Tea at Sato Kandaw

Unmanned Predator aircraft patrolled the skies over Paktia province, their cameras trained on the 17 checkpoints along the mountain road linking Khowst and Gardez. What they recorded convinced U.S. intelligence officials that trucks hauling firewood and produce were again being stopped and forced to pay bribes.

At the most infamous checkpoint, atop Sato Kandaw Pass, drivers typically had to pay $10 or $15, according to a March 2, 2003, Army intelligence report. The money was being split between Pacha Khan and a former Taliban official, Jalaludin Haqqani, the report said.

Situated on a bend overlooking a sparsely vegetated valley, the Sato Kandaw checkpoint consisted of living quarters and a small mosque used as an armory. The post was controlled by a former Pacha Khan lieutenant named Ahmad Naseer, better known as Commander Parre. He had recently defected to the Afghan government in exchange for $3,000 and a truck provided by the CIA. He said he saw the future of the country with the Americans, not with Pacha Khan.

Despite the change in management, reports of shakedowns persisted, along with complaints that female travelers were being harassed and that a young boy was being held as a sex slave.

Sato Kandaw was enough of a concern that Raz Mohammed Dalili, then the governor of Paktia, took the unusual step of asking American troops to remove the checkpoint. Dalili, in an interview, said he had made his request to a Special Forces soldier named Mike.

There was no ODA 2021 member named Mike at the time, military documents show. However, Sgt. 1st Class Michael E. MacMillan, an intelligence analyst and member of the regular Army's 7th Special Forces Group at Ft. Bragg, N.C., was then working with the Gardez unit.

DOJ_NMG_0068824

Described in correspondence from Waller as the team's "intelligence agent," MacMillan was assigned to conduct interrogations and collect information for combat operations, including one at Sato Kandaw, according to several people familiar with the team. MacMillan, contacted at his home in North Carolina, declined to be interviewed for this report and shut his door.

Parre and his men had their guards down when the ODA (for Operational Detachment Alpha) arrived at Sato Kandaw on the chilly morning of March 5. He said that they shook hands and that the soldier he knew as Mike asked to talk over green tea.

Parre said he knew Mike because the Americans had stopped by from time to time to collect intelligence. The checkpoint commander thought it odd when some of the Americans scrambled to take positions along the road and on the high bluffs, but Mike assured him it was merely a precaution.

Inside, Parre began cutting chocolate as his cook prepared the tea. Mike asked about his relationship with Pacha Khan. Parre said that before he could respond, two men jumped him from behind, pushing him to the ground so that he could barely breathe.

"They covered me with a hood," Parre said. "The interpreter translated, 'If you move, we'll kill you.' And I told him, 'If there is any problem, we can solve it through negotiation…. We are your friends.' "

In the next room, other American soldiers quickly subdued Parre's men, including his 18-year-old brother, Jamal Naseer. The Afghans were cuffed, hooded and tossed by their bound limbs into vehicles, Parre said.

The Americans also found the boy who allegedly had been pressed into sexual slavery and made plans to return him to his family. Before leaving, ODA 2021 confiscated a stash of munitions and mostly unserviceable weapons and blew them up.

Allegations of Abuse

The detainees said the physical abuse began as soon as they reached the Gardez firebase.

"We were kicked in the small of our back and told to stay straight, and cold water was poured over our body in the open air," Parre told The Times. "They put stones under our knees. We were continuously forced to stay on our knees until we lost the sensation of our legs and couldn't walk."

He said an interrogator ripped off one of his toenails. At another point, he said, someone fired four rounds near his head. The other seven detainees, among them a 23-year-old with one leg, also reported abuse.

Because the detainees were hooded through much of their detention, they said, they could not identify their interrogators, except to note that their speech sounded American.

"They were asking me international questions," Parre said. "Have you met any Al Qaeda leader? Have you gone to Pakistan? To Iran? And who was creating trouble on the highway? But I didn't know any of these things."

He said there were also questions about Pacha Khan. Interrogators had obtained a note from the warlord to Parre promising to make him a division commander. Parre said he told the Americans they no longer had ties.

As the beatings continued, he said, an Afghan interpreter pleaded with him to give the interrogators what they wanted. "Just say anything to get it to stop," Parre quoted the interpreter as saying. He said there were times he felt seconds from death. "I can't tell you the feeling," he said. "Half dead. Half alive."

An American in Gardez at the time said Afghan soldiers working with the Special Forces complained to someone on the team about the mistreatment. The American, who spoke on condition of anonymity, also told The Times that interrogations were taken over after a day or two by a Navy SEAL. The detainees were moved into a tent at a back corner of the base, out of sight, he said.

The Times could not verify any involvement by the Navy commandos, but internal military documents show that SEALs were operating around Gardez during the period. A spokesman for the Naval Criminal Investigative Service said it "was not alerted at any time to the potential of SEAL involvement."

The detention of Parre and his men was no secret in the region. An intelligence summary filed by ODA 2021 shortly after the arrests reported ecstatic reactions from both the Afghan government and the local populace. Gov. Dalili dropped by the firebase to offer congratulations. He reported that President Hamid Karzai was "very pleased," the summary said.

The team's intelligence reports about the operation flashed across computer screens at the Army's operations center in Bagram, said someone who was present. They also were distributed to NATO forces.

As required, the team reported the detentions to the 20th Group's 1st Battalion, and the information was passed along to the Combined Joint Special Operations Task Force, the command over all Special Forces in Afghanistan.

The detainees were "still undergoing interviews," the team reported after a day, adding, "A lot of intelligence is being generated for follow-on operations."

Under Army procedures, Parre and his men should either have been released after four days or sent to a holding facility in Bagram if interrogations yielded evidence of ties to the Taliban or Al Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0068825

Internal military records show that after two days of questioning, the Americans did not plan to send the detainees to Bagram. They had been notified earlier in their tour that the arrival of battered prisoners at that base might prompt an investigation, according to the records.

But ODA 2021 also was reluctant to transfer the detainees to local police custody. A March 6 communique from the Special Forces team expressed doubts about the Gardez police chief's loyalty and reliability and said ODA 2021 was working with the governor to find other ways to keep the Sato Kandaw detainees in custody.

At a meeting of security authorities in Gardez, Mike from ODA 2021 warned the police chief and the other local commanders that he would kill them if they released his prisoners, according to U.N. officials who reacted angrily to the blunt talk.

For the moment, however, Parre and his men remained in custody at the firebase, and the beatings continued.

Mission to Wazi

A week after their successful Sato Kandaw operation, Waller and ODA 2021 were ready to push farther into Pacha Khan country. Col. Champion approved plans for what the team described as a simple reconnaissance patrol of the Wazi district.

However, there are indications Waller wanted his team to be prepared for more.

He borrowed two soldiers from another Special Forces team, a security detachment generally excluded from combat operations. And he tried unsuccessfully to enlist members of a commando unit that reported to a different chain of command.

Waller's men loaded an extra machine gun into each truck and stacked in so much ammunition that there was little room for their feet. "We were going hunting this time," one team member said.

If they left Gardez looking for a fight, they found it with Pacha Khan's men on the road outside Wazi.

In his post-battle reports, Waller took obvious relish in describing one of his team's kills to his battalion commander, Lt. Col. Steven W. Duff, who had been wounded in the Thanksgiving ambush in the same region.

Waller told Duff that the team's weaponry sergeant, Joseph T. "Todd" Henderson, "got one of the bastards associated with shooting you. The bastard nearly exploded as the shell ripped through his chest cavity."

The team leader said that his weaponry sergeant "takes this personally since he was on your convoy when you were shot…. Sorry we could not have got them all."

Waller concluded: "This team does not have any [sissies]. You should have seen them laughing during the fight …. Told you we would find them."

The day's events at Wazi had not ended with the shooting of Wakil Mohammed. The victim's brother, Jan, was taken into custody along with a neighbor, Dawood Khan.

Both men told The Times that while held overnight in Gardez, they were forced to kneel and press their foreheads against a wall. Every time they sat back, they said, they were kicked in the small of the back and the chest.

"At first they didn't ask us any questions," Mohammed said. "Everyone who was there took turns kicking me, and when I fell on the ground from the blows they started to stomp on me. We were forced to stay on our knees, and my knees were injured from the stones on the ground. I felt really bad pain in my chest."

He said the Americans eventually asked him about his brother, but he couldn't concentrate. "I kept seeing my brother's face and the gunshot in his mouth," he said.

Dawood Khan said his interrogators asked whether Mohammed was one of Pacha Khan's commanders. "I told them, 'No, he has no connection,' " he said.

He said that after being beaten he was twice dunked in a tub of icy water and submerged to the verge of drowning. He said he and Mohammed were forced to stay awake through a cold night.

The two villagers were released the next day with clean sets of clothing. A report to headquarters described them as cooperative.

Heroes and 'Idiots'

Waller's bosses at battalion headquarters were thrilled the team had escaped casualties in the attack at Wazi. The National Guardsmen had "performed heroically," a battalion operations officer wrote to Waller, encouraging him to nominate his men for battlefield awards.

He did, later nominating every soldier in the fight, including himself, for either the Silver or Bronze Star, according to military documents.

But in the same laudatory message, the operations officer informed Waller that he had recommended his removal from command of ODA 2021 for, "among other things, the extremely unprofessional remarks" in his reports.

"This is yet another example in a long line of incidents with you that has resulted in this battalion, and more importantly, your teams looking like idiots instead of getting the recognition they rightfully deserve," the battalion officer wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0068826

By this time, Champion's 20th Special Forces Group was in the process of turning over the Special Operations task force to its replacement, the 3rd Special Forces Group, based at Ft. Bragg. The new guys were regular Army all the way, and they did not much care for Waller's references to the air "snapping like Rice Crispies" or the team's "angelic bubble" of protection, the operations officer wrote.

"All they see is that we are a Guard unit operating unprofessionally in a combat zone," he wrote. "If Champion wasn't in command yesterday, you would be in a world of shit right now."

A Death in Gardez

In Gardez, the days of detention for Parre and his men continued to mount.

Parre said he believed his brother, Jamal, was subjected to the harshest interrogation because, at only 18, he was perceived to be the most vulnerable. When he first saw Jamal a few days after their capture, his brother's body was already black and blue and swollen, Parre said.

He said Jamal told him the Americans had forced him to stand with arms and legs outstretched as they took turns beating him. He was moaning about the pain in his kidneys and back, Parre said.

On the afternoon Jamal died — Parre fixes the date at March 16, 2003, though that could not be verified — he saw two men assisting his brother, who was having difficulty walking. There was no interpreter, Parre said, so he and an American soldier pantomimed their way through a discussion of Jamal's condition.

First the American jabbed a finger into his arm to show that Jamal had been given an IV drip, Parre said. Then he shook his head to suggest it hadn't worked. He pumped his fist like a heart, and again shook his head negatively. Parre said he didn't fully understand at the time, but he feared the worst. Eventually, he was escorted into a tent to see his brother.

"I thought he was smiling at me, and so I smiled back," Parre recounted. "I thought Jamal wanted to tell me that I was worrying for nothing. And I went to him and shook him and said, 'Jamalah, Jamalah,' and then I realized that he had been martyred."

Parre adjusted the body so that Jamal's head pointed to Mecca, and started to cry.

Later that night, Parre said, several Americans entered the tent, put their hands over their hearts and offered condolences. But he said the man he knew as Mike asserted that Jamal had died of an illness, not at the hands of the Americans.

"No, my brother was healthy," Parre said he responded. "His brain, his heart, his legs, he was not sick. He had no history of sickness or injury in any part of his body. He died because of your cruelty."

ODA 2021 held a team meeting shortly after Jamal's death, according to an American soldier based in Gardez. The team was advised that the Afghan had died of a sex-related infection that shut down his kidneys, the soldier said. The point of the meeting, he said, was "to make sure everybody's on the same sheet of paper — this is what happened to the man," in case there was an investigation.

Capt. Craig Mallak, medical examiner for the U.S. armed forces, said Naseer's death was never reported to his office. He said it would have been required unless the detainee was deemed to have died of natural causes. Authorities at a civilian hospital in Gardez, where Naseer's body was transferred, said they performed no autopsy.

A hospital worker who prepared the body for burial said in an interview that "it was completely black." Hajji Abdul Qayum said Jamal's face was "dark and looked like it was burned." He said it was "completely swollen, as were his palms, and the soles of his feet were swollen double in size."

"I have no idea what he might have been beaten with," the hospital worker said.

Naseer's mother, Kajala, also viewed her son's body before burial. She told Afghan military investigators that "the entire body was full of injuries."

Dr. Michael Baden, a prominent forensic pathologist who works for the New York State Police, said the descriptions were inconsistent with death by organ failure. "You can't confuse those," he said. "It sounds very much like blunt trauma."

Scars, No Charges

After Jamal died, Gov. Dalili arranged for the late-night transfer of the body to the local hospital, according to an Afghan military inquiry. He also ordered the transfers of Parre and his men to the local jail.

There, local physician Aziz Ulrahman examined the prisoners and described them as battered and bruised, with seeping, unbandaged wounds. He said Parre's feet were black. "We have no terminology for that," he said. "It was caused by blunt-force trauma."

A few days later, a delegation from Afghanistan's Judicial Reform Commission happened to visit the Gardez police station and came face to face with Parre and his men. The delegation, which included a representative from the Italian Embassy and several Afghan jurists, did not report the prisoners' condition, although witnesses said it was discussed.

DOJ_NMG_0068827

A political officer with the U.N. mission in Afghanistan was with the group and interviewed Parre and his men. He wrote a detailed memo noting that one Afghan soldier had died in U.S. custody and raising the possibility that Special Forces might have been involved in "cruel and inhuman treatment" of detainees.

Though his memo cautioned that the detainees' accounts should not be taken at face value, it said their wounds and injuries "seemed consistent with their accounts of beating and torture." He recommended that the U.N. report the incident for investigation.

There is no record that U.N. officials informed U.S. or coalition authorities about the Gardez case for at least 13 months, if at all.

Several U.N. officials acknowledged that the report seemed to have fallen into "a black hole" after making its way to the mission's headquarters in Kabul, the Afghan capital.

It was only in the spring of 2004, U.N. officials said, that they forwarded the information to the U.S. Embassy in Kabul. However, Zalmay Khalilzad, who was then the U.S. ambassador to Afghanistan, said he had no recollection of hearing about the case, and no mention of the death was found in embassy records, a spokesman said.

Both Lakhdar Brahimi, head of the U.N. assistance mission when Jamal Naseer died, and his successor, Jean Arnault, declined to comment on the U.N.'s handling of the matter.

Parre and his companions were later moved secretly to a civilian prison in Kabul, still without any formal charges. Afghan military prosecutors immediately launched an investigation into their unexplained detention.

That inquiry produced a 117-page report asserting that the detainees had been tortured and that there was a "strong probability" that one of the men had been "murdered." The report speculated that the prolonged imprisonment was intended to give the detainees' wounds time to heal.

When the Afghan attorney general ordered all seven released, it came after 58 days of captivity. No charges were ever filed against any of the men.

The Last Laugh

It wasn't long after Parre and his men were ousted from Sato Kandaw that ODA 2021 got word that Pacha Khan had reclaimed the checkpoint. The team mounted another patrol to the mountain pass, where a confrontation on the road erupted in gunfire.

The circumstances remain in dispute. ODA 2021 reported that an enemy vehicle had come barreling toward the American convoy and that the driver had been "engaged and killed," while five other men escaped.

According to Pacha Khan's family, the driver was on his way to get food for the checkpoint's soldiers. The dead driver was the warlord's eldest son, Jalani Khan. His body was left on the roadside.

Several days later, the team reported that every checkpoint along the road from Khowst to Gardez seemed to be clear. Pacha Khan's influence was waning, and much of the credit went to Waller's team.

"The guys in Gardez … are having a significant effect on the area," an official with the Special Operations task force wrote to colleagues.

But with tensions inflamed by the killing of Pacha Khan's son, and with the 20th Group about to head home, Champion reined in the team. Waller's proposals for two patrols targeting the warlord were rejected.

The commander's "gut reaction," explained a March 28 note to Duff from Champion's staff, "is that Chief Waller is just out looking for another fight with PKZ, whom we've been told to back off of …. The [commander] is concerned that guys are rattling the tree, but what they are getting is criminal elements [versus terrorists], and we are not cops."

As they packed their gear in early April, the 20th Group's field commanders were frustrated to be leaving the warlord at large.

"Pacha Khan Zadran is probably now laughing at the Americans," the commander of the Special Forces team in Khowst wrote to superiors.

Maj. Rick Rhyne, the incoming 3rd Group operations chief, shrugged off the complaint.

"There is a reason, most likely political, that we cannot touch him," he wrote. "He can laugh all he wants to."

EPILOGUE: Inquiries Are Underway, so Far Without Charges

In the years since ODA 2021 returned to its red-clay roots, the interrogation methods practiced by some Special Forces units in Afghanistan migrated to Iraq.

Early warnings seem to have been disregarded. In Afghanistan, the International Committee of the Red Cross complained of mistreatment as early as December 2002. It delivered a private report to top U.S. military commanders alleging widespread abuse at the firebases at the very time Parre and his men were being held in Gardez.

DOJ_NMG_0068828

The Red Cross had interviewed more than 40 former firebase detainees who described beatings, kickings, verbal threats, sleep and food deprivation, immersion in icy water and prolonged exposure to extreme cold, according to a copy of the previously undisclosed report, which was obtained from U.S. government sources.

Initially, U.S. officials reacted skeptically, dismissing the Red Cross claims.

"Don't get all spun up on this," advised Maj. Rhyne, the Special Operations officer, in a note to battalion commanders. "Just let the teams know there were allegations but no proof."

Capt. Sean McMahon, a judge advocate general for the Special Operations task force, wrote to others on the headquarters staff that the allegations were vague. But he said Lt. Gen. Dan McNeill, then commander of U.S.-led forces in Afghanistan, wanted all interrogators reminded of proper methods.

The interrogators needed to understand, McMahon wrote, that "if they are implementing certain procedures, they must cease."

Some members of ODA 2021 have come under criminal investigation stemming from the deaths of Jamal Naseer and Wakil Mohammed. No one has been charged, and the names of those targeted by the inquiry have not been released.

The Army's Criminal Investigation Command has no timetable for completing the inquiries into either death, spokesman Christopher P. Grey said.

The investigations have proved challenging, he said, because of difficulties locating witnesses and barriers in language and culture. The families refused to allow the exhumation of either victim, citing religious beliefs.

But the investigators also have been hampered by missteps.

When the CID first looked into Naseer's death, it was unable to identify the victim and dropped the matter quickly. After he was identified by The Times and the Crimes of War Project, the case was reopened. In Mohammed's case, investigators operated for at least a year under the assumption that he had died two months earlier than he did.

Last year, Army investigators recommended that one soldier be charged with murder in the Wazi shooting, and another with dereliction of duty for not reporting the incident. The recommendations were sent to the U.S. Army Special Forces Command at Ft. Bragg.

The case was reopened last year, and the CID spokesman would not say whether the agency was pursuing similar charges more than a year later.

The Times attempted to interview every member of ODA 2021 and others in the chain of command. One who declined to be interviewed was former team leader Waller, who said he preferred to let the military legal system finish its work. "I'm not at liberty to discuss it while it's under investigation," he said. Waller continues to work full time at the 20th Group headquarters. Champion, the National Guard colonel who directed all Special Forces in Afghanistan in 2002-03, was promoted to general in 2004. He recently completed a tour as deputy commanding general over all operations in Afghanistan.

He acknowledged in a telephone interview that he had been contacted by Army investigators, but he declined to comment further.

"We'll see what happens with the investigation and where it goes," he said.

Pacha Khan remained a problem for the American forces well after the 20th Group's departure.

Over the next two years, however, the warlord grudgingly ended hostilities with the Afghan government and became part of it.

In 2004, his youngest son was appointed governor of the new administrative district of Wazi Zadran. And last fall, the warlord himself made a bid for elected office.

Today, the nemesis of ODA 2021 is a member of the new Afghan parliament.

*

About this series

*

"Firebase Gardez" examines the deployment to Afghanistan of a decorated Alabama National Guard unit. It is the result of a yearlong investigation in the U.S. and Afghanistan by Times staff writer Kevin Sack and freelance investigative journalist Craig Pyes. It was written by Sack.

Pyes, a two-time Pulitzer Prize winner and frequent contributor to the newspaper, reported from Afghanistan jointly for The Times and the Crimes of War Project, a Washington-based nonprofit that describes itself as "a collaboration of journalists, lawyers and scholars dedicated to raising public awareness of the laws of war." In 2004, the group provided The Times with the first evidence of an unreported Afghan death in U.S. custody and joined with the newspaper to investigate further. That led to a military inquiry by the Army's Criminal Investigation Command that continues today.

The Times reviewed thousands of pages of internal military documents to reconstruct the period when a 10-member Special Forces combat team called ODA 2021 (for Operational Detachment Alpha) was assigned to the Gardez firebase.

DOJ_NMG_0068829

Every member of the team was contacted. Most declined to be interviewed or referred reporters to public affairs officers. The Army and all of its subordinate commands — the U.S. Central Command, U.S. Special Operations Command, Army Special Forces Command, 20th Special Forces Group and the Alabama National Guard — declined to comment.

Times researchers Nona Yates and Janet Lundblad contributed to these reports.

kevin.sack@latimes.com

craig.pyes@latimes.com

Army Explores Issue Of Living Wills As More Return From War In Comas (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya, Usa Today

USA Today, September 25, 2006

A growing number of troops are returning from Iraq and Afghanistan with severe brain damage, prompting the Army to examine whether living wills or other care directives from soldiers ought to be available to battlefield doctors.

The issue was raised this summer by wounded soldiers and families of casualties during a symposium sponsored by the Army's Wounded Warrior Program.

FAMILIES REORDER LIVES: Catastrophic wounds mean lifetime care

"With technology as good as it is, they can keep that soldier alive, but they can't put their hands on a digitized piece of paper" containing a do-not-resuscitate order, says Ed Salau, a former Army lieutenant who lost his left leg during combat in Iraq. He was one of 40 people at the June symposium.

Army officials say they plan more symposiums to hear from wounded soldiers and their families, but they make no promises about what steps they might take.

From January 2003 through July, the Pentagon identified at least 250 troops who returned from war with head wounds that left them — at least initially — comatose or unable to care for themselves or respond to people. Brain injuries, most from roadside bombs, are the signature wound of the Iraq war.

The number is a small part of the 20,000 troops wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan, but it is "unprecedented," says Dale Smith, professor of medical history at the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences in Bethesda, Md. "All of these (comatose) people died in former wars before they got home."

Troops can fill out living wills instructing doctors to withhold care. Those at the symposium recommended that troops be better educated about the process and that the wills be accessible to doctors.

Today, field surgeons unaware of last wishes say they often keep soldiers with crippling brain injuries alive and fly them to the USA. That allows families a chance to get closure and to make decisions about organ donation, says Brett Schlifka, an Army neurosurgeon. It also might leave relatives to decide whether to withhold life support.

Not every family member favors a move toward living wills. Sarah Wade, whose husband, Ted, suffered a major head injury from a roadside blast in Iraq in 2004, says she has mixed feelings. If her husband had a living will, he might have directed doctors not to take the steps that saved his life, she says. Since he was sent back to the USA, his condition has improved, she says. "I'm leaning against it," she says of giving combat surgeons access to do-not-resuscitate orders.

Army Col. Mary Carstensen, director of the Wounded Warrior Program, says the concerns raised at the symposium are being sent to appropriate offices within the Army, Pentagon and Department of Veterans Affairs.

"There was so much emotion behind each one of these issues that we know we have to do something," she says.

Families Bear Catastrophic War Wounds (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, September 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Army chaplain Kenneth Kaibel touched a cup of Communion wine to the lips of Spc. Ethan Biggers, who lay comatose at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. A drop slipped down his throat. The soldier gagged and coughed twice as his stepmother, Cheryl Biggers, cradled him ever more closely.

"That's all right," she whispered, her left hand gently supporting the base of his head. Depressions revealed where battlefield surgeons peeled back his scalp and removed large sections of skull to relieve swelling from a bullet fired by a sniper in Iraq in March.

His stepmother grasped his clenched fingers and kept her face close to his. "I want to make sure that he knows that I have him," Cheryl Biggers explained.

That was in June. Ethan Biggers, 22, was later transferred to a Department of Veterans Affairs hospital in Tampa and remains in a near-coma state.

DOJ_NMG_0068830

"He can hear us. He opens his eyes. And we think he can follow our voices," says Cheryl Biggers, 51. "But he can't quite focus."

Biggers is part of a small but growing number of catastrophically wounded casualties from Iraq and Afghanistan — many of whom would never have survived this long in previous wars.

According to the Pentagon, at least 250 soldiers and Marines have returned from Iraq and Afghanistan with head wounds that left them — at least initially — comatose or unable to care for themselves.

ARMY MULLS LIVING WILLS: More returning from war with brain damage

"We all look at the amputees and say, 'God, they're really lucky,' " says Liza Biggers, 25, who left her career as a freelance artist to devote all her time to her brother.

Families' lives rearranged

Families of these wrecked young men contend not only with the shock of seeing the physical destruction to their loved ones but also with how their own lives change dramatically. Parents and siblings give up careers, forsake wages and reconstruct homes to care for wounded relatives rather than consign them to a nursing home.

"My son is in such a state," says Edgar Edmundson, 51, who left his job as a pie bakery supervisor to care full time for his son, Eric, 26, an Army sergeant. "He doesn't have control of his bladder or his bowels. He can't walk and he can't talk. ... To me, his father, the life my son knew is over."

Eric Edmundson, married and the father of a 20-month-old girl, was hurt in a roadside explosion Oct. 2 in Iraq. During surgery, his heart stopped and he suffered severe brain damage. His father, who had dreams of one day opening a gun and bait shop with his only son, now bathes and changes him daily and takes him to a rehabilitation center for physical therapy. Edgar Edmundson and his wife, Beth, who works as a state office supervisor, share a three-bedroom rental home in New Bern, N.C., with their son and his family.

"I guess you could say we don't have any disposable income," Edgar Edmundson says. "I live this every day. My son and I were very close. We had big plans."

Families say they also struggle with military and VA medical systems that were unprepared for these severely brain-damaged casualties.

They say the rehabilitation of catastrophic cases has not kept pace with the advances in battlefield medicine that kept these servicemembers alive and brought them home safely.

"They're saving their lives. But there is no system really in place to give them their life back," says Marissa Behee, whose husband, Jarod, 27, was shot in the head by a sniper in Iraq on May 25, 2005.

She says her husband showed little improvement after spending three months in the summer of 2005 in one of the VA's new polytrauma centers in Palo Alto, Calif. The centers are designed specifically to treat servicemembers suffering multiple injuries.

Help for soldiers, families

VA officials defend their programs and say they have made great strides in meeting these severe needs with their polytrauma facilities. By the end of this fiscal year, 21 new outpatient centers designed to monitor and continue treating rehab patients will be operating, officials say. They concede, however, that war has brought new challenges.

"There are some issues about family support, issues about the complexity of the medical and specialized needs that have to be addressed," says Lucille "Lu" Beck, chief consultant to the VA for rehabilitative services. "We have survivors now who come to us with medical conditions, rehab needs, multiple impairments that we've not seen before."

Behee has formed a foundation called Heroes with Head Injuries to provide other families with information on how to navigate the military medical system with a brain-damaged loved one.

In an effort to address concerns about military care, the Army's Wounded Warrior Program, which serves as an advocate for severely disabled soldiers and their families, held the first in a series of symposiums with wounded soldiers and family members. In June, the Army asked the more than 40 attendees to go through dozens of complaints and narrow them to a manageable list. Among the issues raised: problems in the process of notifying families about casualties; a shortage of trained case managers; the adequacy of rehabilitation for severely brain-damaged soldiers; confusion about the medical retirement process; and the need for more financial support for families.

"They are being pushed to the highest level," says Army Col. Mary Carstensen, director of the Wounded Warrior Program.

One recommendation from the symposium was for the military to more aggressively urge soldiers to fill out living wills containing directives about whether medical treatment should be withheld in the event of a dire brain injury.

Ethan Biggers' family is divided. His twin brother, Matt, a former soldier, believes Ethan wouldn't have wanted extraordinary steps taken to preserve his life.

DOJ_NMG_0068831

Army Maj. Ronald Riechers, a neurologist who treated Ethan Biggers at Walter Reed, is grim about his future. He says Biggers could either remain in a near-coma or progress to requiring significant lifelong assistance. Perhaps he would be able to sit in a wheelchair, Riechers says.

Cheryl and Liza Biggers believe they see incremental improvement in Ethan and hold out hope. Ethan Biggers' wife, Britni, hopes her husband will someday recognize the couple's son, Eben, born June 2.

Liza Biggers works with hospital staff to stimulate responses from her brother, using Britni's Cotton Blossom body lotion, peeled oranges and Tootsie Rolls.

"I feel that we're here to get Ethan better," she says. "It's not asking too much to sacrifice a year or two of our lives to get Ethan back."

They suffered a setback July 27 when Ethan's father, Rand Biggers, died in a traffic accident. He had shepherded his son through the military's medical system. "I believe in God," he had said. "Something goodwill come out of it."

Today, the Biggers family continues its vigil at Ethan's bedside.

Cheryl Biggers says that for soldiers like her stepson, their last waking thought was of war. "I want to make sure that he knows where he is, that he's safe. We wouldn't be here with him unless it was safe, and trying to convince him to wake up," she says softly, cradling Ethan.

"Come on out and join us," she tells him. "Everybody's waiting."

Backstory: Enlisting Churches To Help Soldiers (CSM)

By Sean J. Miller

The Christian Science Monitor, September 25, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS

John Morris, a military chaplain, stands at the front of a crowded conference room dressed in desert fatigues and tan combat boots, commanding his audience's attention with a tone barely above a whisper. Addressing some 30 Minnesota church leaders, Major Morris opens with a story about his time in Anbar Province, an insurgent stronghold in western Iraq.

"When the insurgents found out a new unit was there, they would walk a child in front of our convoys," he recalls. "What does a good Minnesota person do? Stop. You only do that one time, because you get ambushed and someone gets maimed or killed."

It's a chilling story, which Morris heard from numerous soldiers in combat, meant to convey the reality of war - and the kind of psychological stress soldiers go through in the field and when they come home.

Morris is on a mission. Since returning from the Middle East, the deputy state chaplain of the Minnesota Army National Guard has labored to convince members of Minnesota's religious community - many of whom oppose the war - to support the soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan. More than that, he wants them to be frontline counselors and comforters.

"Sociologists or psychologists - they're great, they're helpful," Morris tells the audience. "But when I get to this issue, I have to always tell them, 'I'm sorry but there are people better qualified than you to handle this: religious leaders.' You're the healers. You bring reconciliation."

***

Morris is tall, with close-cropped brown hair and smooth features. He projects a calm, commanding presence that comes from experience hard earned. In April 2004, he was deployed with the US troops who surrounded Fallujah in response to four American contractors being killed and mutilated. While the battle for Fallujah raged, Morris circled the area in an armored Humvee offering Protestant Easter sunrise services to the support troops. The brutality of the conflict tested even his Christianity.

"That's probably the closest I've ever come to hate," says Morris."I came so close to the mentality: 'Kill them all and God is on our side.' Spiritual discipline held me back from that abyss."

Morris's spiritual discipline was still being tested two months after he returned home to Roseville, Minn. He was experiencing violent mood swings. His anger erupted at the slightest provocation, as when someone cut in front of him in a line at the airport. Morris wondered what combat soldiers must face after coming home.

"I'm a chaplain and I didn't pull a trigger and didn't take a human life, and I'm this mad," he says.

The horrors of war do shadow American soldiers. According to a 2004 study published in the New England Journal of Medicine, 17 percent of combat veterans arrive home with mental health issues, ranging from depression to posttraumatic stress disorder.

National Guard soldiers face their own peculiar problems. They experience a rapid change from military to civilian life. In less than two weeks, once their tours in Iraq or Afghanistan are up, they can go from dodging roadside bombs and insurgent ambushes, to picking up Starbucks and rushing to a business meeting. Moreover, not since World War II have so many Guard soldiers served in combat and had to reintegrate into civilian life.

DOJ_NMG_0068832

The Pentagon has learned - often the hard way - that returning soldiers need long-term support with the transition. "We didn't do it for the Vietnam vets, and in a sense we're paying for that now," says David Segal, a military sociologist at the University of Maryland.

Guard soldiers are entitled to the same counseling and support services offered to members of other branches of the military. But they often live hundreds of miles from the nearest military post, which can make counseling difficult.

Minnesota's program is unusual because - in addition to offering spiritual counseling - it requires Guard soldiers to report back to their barracks 30, 60, and 90 days after they're home. This is actually in violation of Pentagon policy, which insists that Guard members are "on leave" and cannot be called back. But Morris calls this time the "golden, hour," and feels it's critical to keep members connected and supported.

"I'm proud to tell you that, in Minnesota, we are in open violation of that Department of Defense policy," he says.

In the last year, he's had two soldiers tell him that they planned to kill themselves after they reported back to their barracks. Morris says he got those soldiers counseling, which they may not have received otherwise.

Another soldier Morris helped was Sgt. Ron Huff, an 18-year veteran of the Army National Guard. Sergeant Huff recently spent a year in Iraq clearing improvised explosive devises from the highway between Tikrit and Kirkuk. In his first month home, he couldn't switch out of his Iraq driving style and was ticketed four times for speeding by the same sheriff's deputy. Later, he experienced flashbacks, turned to alcohol, and totaled his motorcycle.

In Iraq, Huff commanded 35 soldiers - who affectionately called him "Huff Daddy" - but back home he didn't know where, or how, to ask for help. That's when Morris walked into his office. As Huff recalls it, Morris made him realize that "I'm not the only one who feels crazy." Huff and Morris now work together. "He's the smart guy and I'm the common sense guy," Huff says.

***

In the year sinc Morris started his church outreach programcalled "Beyond the Yellow Ribbon," Minnesota hasn't lost a Guard to suicide. The idea is to ask churches with soldiers in their congregations to become "military friendly." Morris encourages them to take care of the service members and their families - bringing them meals, providing marital counseling, or just listening.

Pastors, he says, can publicly welcome soldiers home and acknowledge their service. They can also watch for signs of reckless behavior.

The program "is a step in the right direction," says Prof. Segal, the military sociologist. "I think it will make the transition easier."

Yet not everyone is enamored of Morris's program. Gary Kohls, a lay member of Every Church a Peace Church, a national group that encourages churches to preach pacifism, says Christians shouldn't engage in combat, even if they're soldiers. "We take the stance that [combat trauma] could be prevented totally, by refusing to engage in homicidal violence," says Dr. Kohls, the leader of a worship community in Duluth, Minn. "I'm very disappointed when churches are either silent or vocally in support of killing."

It took until late July for Minnesota's religious leaders to accept an invitation to hear Morris address the problems faced by returning Guard soldiers. When the chaplain finished his presentation and the applause died down, he made a heartfelt request. "Please, do not repeat what we did to Vietnam veterans," he said.

One pastor who listened that morning - and won't - was Don Britt. His church, the United Church of Christ, has opposed the war in Iraq. "I hate war and I hate this war in particular," says Mr. Britt. "But I have a son there."

Britt says listening to Morris will help him raise his congregation's awareness of his son, Dan, and other soldiers' experience. "Hopefully, a lot more people will make the distinction between the politicians making the decisions to send these guys to war and our soldiers," he says.

DOJ:

Wainstein Confirmed For New DOJ Post (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz And Brendan Smith, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 25, 2006

The senatorial stalemate over U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia Kenneth Wainstein's nomination to head the new National Security Division in the Justice Department ended last week when Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) backed down, clearing the way for Wainstein's unanimous confirmation.

Levin single-handedly blocked a confirmation vote on Wainstein for months because the Justice Department wouldn't release records Levin wanted concerning FBI agents' objections to Defense Department interrogation techniques used on terrorism detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. Wainstein served as FBI general counsel in 2003 and chief of staff for FBI Director Robert Mueller in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0068833

On the Senate floor Sept. 21, Levin said he was still "troubled by the Department of Justice's stonewalling of my requests," but he acknowledged Wainstein did not control the documents and had been forthcoming during his nomination.

"It really hasn't been that trying," Wainstein says of the delays. "I've been doing the greatest job in the world — as U.S. attorney in D.C."

Wainstein says the consolidation of Justice's national-security assets in one division will improve communication and accountability. "There is no higher priority than counterterrorism these days," he says. As U.S. attorney for the past two years, the 44-year-old Northern Virginia native created a stand-alone homicide unit and a program targeting gangs.

On Friday the Justice Department appointed Jeffrey Taylor, counselor to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, to replace Wainstein. From 1995 to 1999, Taylor was a federal prosecutor in San Diego handling drug cases. He spent the next three years detailed to the Senate Judiciary Committee under Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), where he helped craft the USA Patriot Act. Taylor returned to San Diego before joining then-Attorney General John Ashcroft as counsel for criminal and national security matters.

Some observers question Taylor's lack of experience with the D.C. office, the nation's largest U.S. Attorney's Office and the only one that also handles local criminal cases. But Gonzales said in a statement that Taylor's "legal skills, leadership ability, and personable approach to doing business will make this time of transition for the U.S. Attorney's Office very smooth and productive."

Emma Schwartz can be contacted at eschwartz@alm.com. Brendan Smith can be contacted at blsmith@alm.com.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

HP Chief Tackles Boardroom Scandal Head-on (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins And Jon Swartz

USA Today, September 25, 2006

Mark Hurd admits company ran

covert probes in which investigators spied on directors, journalists, others

PALO ALTO, Calif. — Embattled Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd, trying to seize control of a burgeoning boardroom spying scandal, faces renewed questions this week over a news-leak probe that spurred the forced resignation last week of HP's chairwoman.

Hurd and the tech giant's new criminal defense law firm last week confirmed that he and former chairwoman Patricia Dunn were more deeply involved in some of the probe's unsavory tactics than Dunn and HP had previously acknowledged.

Hurd's remarks, his most extensive so far, capped a searing week in which HP was pummeled by published reports detailing the probe — and Wall Street's unease about Hurd's role in a case that is the focus of growing federal and state law-enforcement probes.

At a news conference drawing dozens of reporters, Hurd said he approved a plan to send an e-mail to a journalist containing false information to trick her into revealing her sources. He said he felt "strongly" that the leaks had hurt HP's reputation but acknowledged he had not read a report on the probe's early findings addressed to him.

"I could have, and I should have," he said.

Hurd and one of HP's new criminal defense attorneys, Michael Holston, left unanswered several key questions about how the news-leak probe went so seriously awry.

Holston said it was unclear whether HP employees had supplied Social Security numbers of journalists, board members and a company employee to private investigators who used that information to get personal phone records. Also, Holston said a review by his firm had not found evidence "so far" that the probe used telephone wiretapping, leaving open the possibility that evidence of such tactics may still emerge as the review continues.

Dunn resigned as director Friday at the board's request; she was to relinquish the chairmanship in January but keep her board seat. Hurd assumed her title immediately.

Media reports over the weekend said two Hewlett-Packard executives who played key roles in the news-leak probe are about to leave the company.

A source familiar with the matter confirmed that those executives are senior counsel Kevin Hunsaker and Anthony Gentilucci, head of global security. Hunsaker directed the probe's second phase, "Kona II," and assured HP the tactics used were legal, said Holston, an attorney with Morgan Lewis & Bockius.

DOJ_NMG_0068834

In a statement, Dunn defended herself anew, saying she had "followed the proper processes" and had not chosen the people who conducted the probe.

"The people HP relied upon to conduct this type of investigation let me and the company down," she said.

Hurd, 49, hired as CEO last year, apologized to the journalists who had been investigated. He did not answer questions at the conference. Dunn did not attend.

Hurd said the probe's intent was "absolutely proper and appropriate." Still, he said, "some of the findings that Morgan Lewis has uncovered are very disturbing to me."

Hurd and Holston gave details of the firm's review — involving more than a million pages of documents — that for the first time confirmed many details reported by news organizations: The company ran two covert probes, code-named "Kona I" and "Kona II," starting early last year, in which private investigators spied on HP directors, journalists, employees, spouses and other relatives. The probes drew on "hundreds" of personal phone calling records of those individuals.

Investigators sent a CNet tech news reporter an e-mail containing hidden software to trick her into revealing her sources and physically followed her and kept an eye on her home, Holston said. Investigators tailed director George Keyworth, his wife and possibly other relatives to his Northern California home and at a meeting in Boulder, Colo. The review found evidence investigators had rifled through individuals' trash.

Gentilucci gave an HP employee's Social Security number to a private investigator to get phone-call records, Holston said. Investigators also got Social Security numbers of three journalists, three directors and an HP employee.

Investigators considered "undercover operations" at the San Francisco offices of The Wall Street Journal and CNet, although Holston said there was no evidence those operations were carried out.

At Friday's conference, Hurd acknowledged what has worried investors: The probe and its aftermath are sapping attention when he and his team should be recharging the company's operations.

"Our job is to fix this and get back to the job of running a business," he said.

HP shares traded higher after hours following Hurd's remarks; they closed at $35.11 a share, up 24 cents, in regular trading. Investors had shown little concern about the scandal's impact until Thursday, when shares fell more than 5% on unusually heavy volume.

HP analysts, who have grown concerned with Hurd's possible role in the scandal, said they were relieved by his upfront comments.

"His reputation is that of a straight-shooter, and that is reflected in the way he has successfully run the company," says Martin Reynolds, an analyst at market researcher Gartner. "I think he's safe."

The scandal is unlikely to affect HP's bottom line, Reynolds and others say, as long as it does not further damage Hurd, who is credited with rejuvenating the $90 billion company after the tech bust and a controversial merger with Compaq Computer.

Hurd said HP has appointed former U.S. prosecutor Bart Schwartz to conduct an independent review of HP's investigative methods. Also, Richard Hackborn, a current board member, has now assumed the additional duties of independent lead director, a position he was to take in January.

Hurd, Dunn and other HP executives are scheduled to testify Thursday before the House Energy and Commerce Committee. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer and federal agencies are investigating whether HP and its executives broke laws. Lockyer on Friday told CNBC there is no evidence yet linking Hurd to criminal wrongdoing.

The Securities and Exchange Commission last week started a new investigation into the matter, joining other probes by the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Francisco.

The spying scandal dates to early last year, when then-chairwoman and CEO Carly Fiorina and other directors began looking into leaks of board meetings. After Fiorina was ousted, her successor as chairperson, Dunn, pursued the investigation, which eventually pointed to director Keyworth. HP first disclosed the investigation on Sept. 6. Five days later, HP announced a boardroom shuffle: Dunn would step down as chairman in January and Keyworth resigned. Director Tom Perkins quit in protest over the probe in May.

Dunn's, H-P's Accounts Differ In Leak Probe (WSJ)

By Don Clark, Peter Waldman And Bruce Orwall

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

Now that Patricia Dunn has severed her ties to Hewlett-Packard Co., the question is whether H-P's former chairman will back the company's version of events in the simmering scandal over an investigation into leaks from its board.

Already, there are signs that Ms. Dunn's account differs in some respects from H-P's, a split that could imperil H-P's efforts to contain the controversy. Any differences could be made clearer Thursday, when Ms. Dunn, H-P Chief Executive Mark Hurd, and at least one other company executive are expected to testify before a House committee.

DOJ_NMG_0068835

Ms. Dunn announced her resignation as a director and chairman Friday, the same day H-P offered its first outline of how an investigation into media leaks from its board had spiraled to include filched phone records, a booby-trapped email and physical surveillance of at least one director and a journalist. Criminal investigations are under way by the FBI and California attorney general.

The company, at a dramatic news conference, focused heavily on the conduct of Ms. Dunn, suggesting she had instigated and closely monitored the probe -- to the extent of directly consulting with private investigators. Mr. Hurd said he supported an investigation to stop board leaks, but termed some tactics "disturbing."

Ms. Dunn referred questions to her lawyer, James Brosnahan, over the weekend. But in Mr. Brosnahan's comments, and her own prepared remarks, Ms. Dunn paints the probe as a collective board action that involved others at H-P.

Ms. Dunn had previously agreed to give up the chairman's role to Mr. Hurd in January, while remaining on the board. Her accelerated departure is a bitter footnote to a career that began in freelance journalism, continued at Wells Fargo & Co. and peaked as Ms. Dunn rose to lead fund management giant Barclays Global Investors, where she remains nonexecutive vice chairman. Ms. Dunn, 53, has twice beaten cancer, and last week was inducted into a San Francisco-area business group's hall of fame.

Mr. Brosnahan says it makes "no sense at all" to think that she would knowingly participate in anything she thought was criminal. "The irony of Pattie's situation," he adds, "is that she's a great devotee of privacy, people's personal rights and so forth. She has been for good corporate governance."

Ms. Dunn joined H-P's board in 1998. She became chairman in February 2005, following the ouster of Chief Executive Carleton Fiorina. The board's initial inquiry into leaks was prompted by a January 2005 Wall Street Journal article detailing board unhappiness with Ms. Fiorina. Ms. Dunn says she continued the probe after she became chairman, with support from other directors.

"There were strong feelings among members of the board that the leaker had to be found," Mr. Brosnahan says, adding that Ms. Dunn told the board several times about the probe.

The board had internal divisions. For one thing, longtime director George Keyworth and Thomas Perkins, a venture capitalist who departed and returned to the board, believed that Mr. Hurd should have been given the chairman's role when he became CEO in March 2005, people familiar with the matter say. Ms. Dunn knew they opposed her retaining the title, those people say.

Michael Holston, a lawyer from Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP leading H-P's internal review of the leak investigation, said Friday that Ms. Dunn in early 2005 contacted Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., a Boston-area detective agency that H-P had used previously.

For a month or so, he said, Ms. Dunn worked directly with Ronald DeLia, who operates SOS, on a probe code-named KONA I. H-P's security unit wasn't brought into the probe for two months, he said. Mr. Holston also said Ms. Dunn had received "regular updates," on a second, broader phase of the leak investigation, dubbed KONA II, begun in early 2006.

Mr. Brosnahan says Ms. Dunn asked people within H-P how to conduct such a probe and was told that Mr. DeLia was someone "who helped the company a great deal." Ms. Dunn then spoke to Mr. DeLia to "give him whatever insight she had into who might be doing this" as background for the investigation, Mr. Brosnahan says.

Mr. Brosnahan will not say whether Ms. Dunn discussed investigative tactics with Mr. DeLia; he expects her to be questioned on that point before the House Energy and Commerce committee Thursday.

H-P staff members became more heavily involved in the second phase of the investigation in 2006. Kevin Hunsaker, an H-P senior counsel, directed the KONA II probe, and provided assurances to H-P general counsel Ann Baskins that the investigative tactics were legal, Mr. Holston said. Others involved included Tony Gentilucci, manager of H-P's global security investigation unit. Mr. Hunsaker and Mr. Gentilucci were described as "in the process of leaving the company" on Friday by a person familiar with the matter. Mr. Gentilucci's lawyer declined to comment.

Mr. Hunsaker's lawyer, Michael Pancer, said Mr. Hunsaker believes his and H-P's conduct in the probe was legal. He said Mr. Hunsaker has been asked to testify at Thursday's House hearing and will decide whether to do so this week.

TRACKING THE SCANDAL

See a graphical timeline1 and key documents in the H-P scandal. Plus, read profiles2 of H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn, former director Thomas Perkins and other key players in the leak-probe controversy. (Complete coverage.3)

Ms. Dunn has also made statements that appear inconsistent with other participants' accounts, as well as internal H-P emails that have emerged. She has said in interviews that she couldn't supervise the leak probes because she was a potential target. But emails show that H-P's investigators consulted extensively with her and Ms. Baskins. Mr. Holston said Friday that Ms. Dunn and Ms. Baskins received "regular updates" on the probe.

Ms. Dunn has also said in interviews that she told Mr. Perkins, before he resigned from the board, that personal phone records were being scrutinized. Mr. Perkins' spokesman, Mark Corallo, has said that is "absolutely not true."

The debate over Ms. Dunn's role isn't only important to her reputation but also to Mr. Hurd's effort to put the scandal behind the company.

On Friday, Mr. Hurd focused his criticism on KONA II, and the failure of managers, including himself, to ensure that proper procedures were followed. But the most legally questionable tactic -- obtaining phone records by impersonating a phone user, or "pretexting" -- apparently was also used during the first phase of the investigation, according to a newly obtained SOS report, dated July 19, 2005.

The report shows that the cellphone records of Wall Street Journal reporter Pui-Wing Tam were obtained for calls made between mid-April and mid-June of 2005. Home phone records of calls made by Ms. Fiorina between late December 2004 and mid-April 2005 were also examined. The latter date is two months after she left the company.

Some of these details could become important in establishing how much Mr. Hurd knew of the tactics employed. While expressing regrets for the way the probe was handled, the H-P CEO didn't flatly deny knowing of the tactics during it.

For example, he said he attended a "brief meeting" in July 2005 concerning the first phase of the investigation, but didn't say if investigative tactics were discussed. Mr. Holston said Mr. Hurd approved a ruse to send a phony email to a reporter at CNET News.com. Mr. Hurd said he didn't recall hearing plans to use tracer technology that would show where the message was forwarded.

Mr. Hurd also said he attended a March 2006 meeting at which a "verbal summary" of KONA II was discussed. He didn't say if pretexting or other tactics were discussed. He expressed regret that he didn't read a written report about KONA II, which may have included mention of the investigative tactics.

At Hewlett-Packard, A Chief Wounded By Divided Attention (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 25, 2006

PALO ALTO, Calif., Sept. 22 — Mark V. Hurd sat at the head of the table in the Hewlett-Packard boardroom, the room that had been the source of leaks and the starting point of a misguided and ultimately embarrassing attempt to plug them.

Mr. Hurd, the chief executive, had wanted to talk about the transformation inside Hewlett-Packard, how it was becoming a lean Silicon Valley growth company instead of a cash cow content to thrive on the high profit margins of its ink and toner cartridges.

But instead, in his first public interview since the spying operation was revealed in early September, Mr. Hurd needed to talk first about the spying investigation that has sullied the company's reputation as well as his own.

"This is just a horrible thing that has happened," Mr. Hurd said Wednesday afternoon, his rimless glasses perched on the end of his nose, "and we have to fix it." He echoed that sentiment in a news conference on Friday at which he expressed regret and then apologized for the actions of company investigators and the detectives they hired.

Mr. Hurd also apologized for his own inaction. As shocking as it has been to hear the methods used — obtaining private phone records, or trying to plant tracking software on a journalist's computer — it is almost as surprising that Mr. Hurd sat on the sidelines while the company's Clouseaus drew up plans to infiltrate newsrooms with spies masquerading as secretaries or janitors.

Mr. Hurd, 49, is known as an operations expert who asks lot of questions. "Mark is very rigorous on operational details," said Shane V. Robison, an executive vice president and chief strategy and technology officer. "He knows what to ask and he knows when to step back and listen," Mr. Robison said in an interview in late August before the furor erupted.

At least twice when he had the opportunity — at meetings in July 2005 and in March 2006 — Mr. Hurd failed to ask critical questions about the methods in the leak investigation.

But some people close to him suggest — though they do not know for certain — that he failed to focus on the leak investigation partly because he was focused on getting the company fixed and partly because he regarded the search as the project of Patricia C. Dunn, the chairwoman.

At Friday's event and in the interview, Mr. Hurd chose not to explain that inattention.

"He said nothing in effect, but he said it very well," said Charles Wolf, a securities analyst who follows Hewlett-Packard for Needham & Company. Mr. Hurd may explain more when he testifies Thursday at a House subcommittee hearing.

The mood inside Hewlett-Packard grew more apprehensive in midweek after Mr. Hurd's name surfaced in documents about the spying operation. And a few corporate governance analysts have wondered whether he might become a victim of the scandal, like Ms. Dunn, whom he succeeded as chairman after her resignation from the board on Friday.

But what has won him the benefit of the doubt within the company and among investors is that he has done so well fixing the company. He was transforming NCR when he was hired in March 2005 to take on the task of righting Hewlett-Packard.

At the time, most analysts and investors said its best days were behind it. But the stock has risen 77.4 percent as he cut costs, restructured operations, hired more salespeople and pushed employees to find new opportunities for growth, like commercial printers, energy-saving blade servers and software to manage data centers.

"He doesn't promise much, but he's delivered five quarters of upside surprises," Mr. Wolf said.

The reason Wall Street remains enamored of him and the company is what Mr. Hurd has done with a business model that employees have taken to calling the Triangle, a regular feature on company whiteboards and PowerPoint presentations.

On one corner is Efficiency. At first that meant reducing headcount. Shortly after Mr. Hurd arrived, he announced that the company would shed 14,500 employees, or about 10 percent of its work force, for about $2 billion a year in savings. But he is not done cutting. The company continues to find places to cut costs, like disposing of some of its real estate.

On another corner is Capital Strategy, which is the $16 billion Hewlett-Packard has hoarded.

On the third corner is Targeted Growth, which is where the savings and the cash hoard are spent.

Growing animated when the Triangle was mentioned, Mr. Hurd said, "It's not rocket science." But as for execution, Mr. Robison, the chief strategist, said, "You have to do all three at the same time, and that is really hard."

The point Mr. Hurd makes to employees is that cutting costs is not enough. "Management's job is to explain that cost-cutting and growth are not two things," he said. "They are really one thing."

A good example is Hewlett-Packard's data centers. It had 85 of them spread around the world. The company is building six of them in two cities to handle all the data processing. It will close the existing centers, sell the real estate and lay off more employees to save $1 billion.

Lower personnel and operating costs free up money to develop the software and equipment that will make the centers more efficient. But there is also a growth opportunity, because Hewlett-Packard will sell similar data centers to other companies that also want to cut costs.

Knowing that cost-cutting and growth are the same objective helps to cushion the pain of never-ending cost-cutting. "The person knows we aren't just taking costs out, we are helping the company grow," Mr. Hurd said. "The employees have to know the plan. Then it is a different attitude. They want to be on a winning team."

"That's what's so horrible about the current situation," he said, returning to the spying scandal. "They want to know they are making progress. The people in the company are working very hard. We've done some tough stuff. I don't want to forget we took 15,000 jobs out of the company and told a lot of employees to go home and tell their families they that no longer have jobs."

The concept could be an important model for any aging behemoth — think of Ford, Coca-Cola or Time Warner — that wants to grow but needs to cut first. He has been at it less than 20 months, and not everyone thinks it can be sustained.

"The jury is very much out on whether Hurd has made any notable progress on growth yet," said A. M. Sacconaghi, a securities analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Company. "That is his next big challenge, and materially boosting revenue growth on a $90 billon company will be much tougher than cutting costs."

The distractions of the spying scandal are certain to test the concentration of the company's top executives. But those who have known Mr. Hurd say they think he can keep morale at the company high.

Dipak C. Jain, the dean of the Kellogg School of Management at Northwestern University, who has known Mr. Hurd for more than a decade, said his style was not to bully or humiliate his lieutenants. "People don't get intimidated working with him," Mr. Jain said. "He believes that if people get intimidated, their best doesn't come out."

Mr. Hurd recognized, for instance, how anxiety-ridden top executives become when they discuss the current quarter. "They get defensive," he said. So when he arrived at the company in 2005, one of his first management meetings was about 2010. "We would take the short-term emotion out of the equation and work backwards," he said.

At the same time, he is not bothered by people who say Carleton S. Fiorina, the former chief executive and chairwoman, should get some credit for the company's current success. "I don't look at things as binary," he said. "It just needed a bit of crystallization."

There is another aspect of his management style that may account for the paradox of his success in running the company's business and his failure to stop the managers overseeing the detectives from getting so far off track. Mr. Hurd trusts his executives to make decisions.

He said he discovered after he arrived at Hewlett-Packard that he was being asked to make too many decisions. For instance, he was mediating disputes between the computer division and the printing division, which shared a sales force. He tore up that matrix system of management and made division executives responsible for their own sales.

Pushing down responsibility and accountability develops products faster, gets them to market faster and makes for more satisfied customers, Mr. Hurd said. That new structure freed Vyomesh Joshi, executive vice president for the printing division, to invest heavily in new areas — like the online photo service Snapfish, copiers, commercial printing and a teleconferencing service called Halo — that have added $1.3 billion in revenue over 12 months.

DOJ_NMG_0068838

Does distributing responsibility have another cost — more detachment from the oversight by the chief executive? It is another unanswered question. But as Mr. Hurd explained a sketch about bureaucracy and how information is shared in an organization, he noted: “The problem isn’t at the bottom. It is near the top.”

He says he thinks a lot about process. To help repair the damage from the scandal, he has appointed Bart M. Schwartz, a former federal prosecutor, to examine the company’s process for investigations.

“We are working as hard as we can to get through this,” Mr. Hurd said Wednesday.

The Changing Rules Of Corporate Spy Games (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 25, 2006

While it may seem like an anomaly, the saga of high-level snooping at Hewlett-Packard sheds light on an ethical balancing act playing out across corporate America.

Companies routinely take measures - including, as in Hewlett Packard's case, retaining the services of outside private investigators - to guard trade secrets and confidential plans. But as technology makes it easier to trace leaks, firms are also seeing the need to avoid cultivating mistrust.

The drama at Hewlett-Packard is highly unusual because clandestine measures focused on top company officials and on journalists, to find which board member was leaking information to the press.

Yet even beyond HP, defining the limits of corporate snooping may be growing in complexity. New technologies are expanding both the opportunities for malfeasance and the ability to chase it down. And in a knowledge-based economy, generating and guarding ideas is now central to any corporation's market value. That involves nurturing loyalty and morale among creative employees, while also monitoring their activities.

"HP had every right to initiate an investigation," says Sean Walsh, a private investigator who works with other corporations in Silicon Valley and the San Francisco area. "Where things went awry was the methodology used in this case."

As the Hewlett-Packard case suggests, sometimes efforts at damage control do more harm than good. HP should be winning plaudits for its recent stock price highs. Instead, the high-tech giant is in the news for the lengths it went to hunt down a board member with loose lips.

By HP's own account on Friday, its leak-tracing efforts crossed a line into "inappropriate" actions. Chief executive officer Mark Hurd gave a news briefing to apologize for investigators' use of techniques such as gaining access to personal phone records under false pretenses.

But questions have continued to emerge about his own role. As a board member who was aware of the investigation, he lent his approval to an attempted e-mail "sting" that targeted a journalist. Investigators hired by HP put a hidden code in the e-mail to trace if it was forwarded to a boardroom leaker. Mr. Hurd was apparently aware of the general stratagem, but not of the tracer code. He has volunteered to talk about the affair at a Capitol Hill hearing Thursday.

A number of cautionary lessons are emerging, say experts, on business ethics, management, and security. While some of the tactics HP used may be illegal, others have landed the company in hot water simply because they were improper.

"The bar of ethics is higher than the bar of the law," says Dean Krehmeyer, who heads the Business Roundtable Institute for Corporate Ethics in Charlottesville, Va.

At the same time, experts say, today's corporations have a need - even a duty - to protect their business secrets.

Mr. Walsh, who helps many corporations with security, says it's not unusual for companies to hire an investigator to go under cover as an employee to stop theft. Walsh's firm has contracts to perform regular "bug sweeps" and other countermeasures to make sure no one is using high-tech means to steal trade secrets. And when crises erupt, in-house security teams often call for outside help from firms like Walsh's.

"We usually are there when the horse is already out of the barn," says Walsh, a past president of the California Association of Licensed Investigators.

About three years ago, he was tapped to track down a leak of sorts. A software company had detected a pattern of large files being downloaded at odd hours. Walsh helped identify which worker was stealing sensitive data.

In fact, it is now routine for companies to use computers or video cameras to monitor all manner of office behavior.

Experts say it's important that companies let employees know what is being tracked and why, so workers will support efforts that may, in the end, help them prosper.

But recognizing boundaries and privacy is also important, experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0068839

"Don't snoop," is generally a good guideline of workplace etiquette, says Barbara Pachter of consulting firm Pachter & Associates in Cherry Hill, N.J. "It might not set the right tone."

Others add that building a tone of trust is especially vital in the boardroom in an era when corporate directors face new duties and heightened scrutiny. Black-bag investigations don't achieve that goal, they say.

"A culture that could produce this kind of thinking ... needs to be seriously reexamined," says Charles Elson, who heads the University of Delaware's Center of Corporate Governance.

At Hewlett-Packard, the boardroom culture was apparently poisoned by personal conflicts during a period that saw the ouster of Carly Fiorina as CEO early in 2005. Next month Ms. Fiorina is publishing a book on her controversial tenure at the iconic Silicon Valley company.

The leaks were a serious matter and each board member denied being the source when asked by HP.

"There was potential for harm," says Craig Dunn, a business ethics expert at San Diego State University.

He doesn't see it as problematic that the probe included surveillance of board members beyond company property. But securing records for personal phone calls under false pretenses, and the phone records of journalists, crossed a line, he says.

"Now you're going outside" the company, he says, beyond where "you have direct control or access." Who's spying on you?

In a survey of 526 US companies:

· 76% monitor workers' website connections.

· 26% have fired workers for misusing the Internet.

· 6% have fired employees for misusing office telephones.

Sources: American Management Association and ePolicy Institute

HP Moves Leave Legal Issues Open (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, September 25, 2006

With the stock market in a lather over Hewlett-Packard's troubled leak investigations, HP CEO Mark Hurd tried on Friday to take control of the situation. But in doing so, he left unanswered key questions about legal representation in the festering matter.

In a brief press conference, Hurd addressed some investor concerns by announcing that Patricia Dunn, the former chairwoman who ordered an aggressive probe of boardroom leaks, would be leaving the board immediately, and that Hurd would be taking over as chairman.

Hurd and Morgan, Lewis & Bockius partner Michael Holston disclosed some details of what a company investigation has found, including the fact that Hurd himself was kept informed of certain parts of the leak probe. It's not clear, though, at what point Hurd knew that investigators "pretexted" -- lied -- to gain access to board member, employee and journalist phone records.

Morgan Lewis was hired Sept. 8 to perform an independent investigation, and to represent the company in talks with federal and state prosecutors.

But one statement by Hurd raised questions for many lawyers: "Morgan Lewis reports to me, not to the HP board," he said.

Such a statement might have been a reassurance Sept. 19. Until then, the leak investigation seemed to be more a board problem than one pointing to Hurd. But by Friday, news reports -- and several remarks by Hurd and Holston at the press conference -- made it clear that Hurd's role in the probe is also being examined.

For example, Hurd acknowledged Friday that he attended a March 2006 meeting at which a summary of the investigation was presented. "I understand there is also a written report of the investigation addressed to me and others, but I did not read it," Hurd said. "I could have, and I should have."

Speaking privately -- largely because they hope to some day be hired in the HP matter -- several lawyers who conduct internal corporate investigations said this could compromise the investigation, since Morgan Lewis is expected to independently investigate potential wrongdoing, and is likely to report to prosecutors on its findings.

But, they added, it's not unheard of for such situations to pop up.

There's no concrete guidance from the federal government on when outside counsel conducting an internal investigation has a conflict.

"There's no statutory definition of what an internal investigation is," said one former federal prosecutor who asked not to be named.

The former prosecutor said that as a probe goes on, questions often come up about seemingly uninvolved parties' role in possible wrongdoing.

"When you're looking into various things, trying to figure out what happened, your initial impression could change," the ex-prosecutor said. "And when your initial impression changes, your opinion of who should do what should change."

That could mean additional counsel must be brought in, said several white-collar lawyers.

Of course, these aren't the first questions about independence to come up in the case.

Morgan Lewis came in at a time when the board's normal outside counsel, Larry Sonsini of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, was under immense press scrutiny for what he knew about the leak probe.

Sonsini had been the one to communicate with former HP director Thomas Perkins -- whose resignation spurred the leak probe crisis -- in the days before it blew up. And e-mails between Sonsini and Perkins that made it into several press outlets showed that Sonsini had some knowledge of the investigation, though it's not clear he knew what tactics were involved.

Over the last few weeks, Sonsini, along with other partners at his firm, seem to have taken a diminished role in the HP matter. While at least one lawyer at the firm went with Morgan Lewis lawyers to meet with federal prosecutors on Sept. 11, the company said in recent days that Morgan Lewis attorneys would be in charge of dealing with the government.

The Hewlett-Packard mess began last year when Dunn -- whose lawyer, James Brosnahan, didn't return calls by press time Friday -- ordered an investigation to identify the source of leaks about board deliberations.

That initial investigation turned up nothing, Hurd and Holston said Friday. But, they added, a subsequent probe conducted last year identified a leaker responsible for providing information used in a Jan. 23 CNet story on the company's overall direction.

While it's been reported in several news outlets that the leaker was former board member George Keyworth -- who stepped down last week -- the CNet story does not appear to contain any company information that had not already been made public.

After the second investigation was announced to the board this past spring, an outraged Perkins quit in protest.

The disclosure of the investigation followed Perkins' resignation. Though Perkins resigned on May 18, it was not until Sept. 6 that the company gave details -- as required by law -- about the director's action. In that filing, the company said it had received a comment letter from the SEC asking for more information about Perkins' resignation.

Perkins' lawyer, Viet Dinh, a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, has said his client engaged in a 3 1/2-month effort to get Hewlett-Packard to come clean about why Perkins quit.

Perkins abruptly quit during an HP board meeting after Keyworth was asked to resign. (Keyworth at first refused to resign, but then agreed to step down as part of a settlement with the company.)

Investigators apparently used legally suspect means -- including impersonating the targets of their probe -- to access the phone records of board members, HP employees, journalists and Sonsini.

A Boston investigative firm has been cited as the one responsible for hiring people to lie in calls to phone company officials to gain access to the phone records of board members. Boston investigative firm Security Outsourcing Solutions reportedly provided HP with an opinion from a Boston lawyer that the "pretexting" was legal.

The legality of such tactics is up for consideration by the San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office and the California attorney general. They're both investigating the issue, and Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to indict people inside and outside HP, and has met with HP representatives more than once since the scandal broke.

The HP Virus (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, September 25, 2006

AS IT TURNS OUT, Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn didn't have to order her minions to invent a disgruntled HP executive. She can now become one herself by adding "former" to her title. That's because the HP board defenestrated her Friday in one of the more satisfying denouements to one of the more embarrassing corporate dramas in recent memory.

The plan to create a fictitious unhappy HP executive, which Dunn approved, was part of an effort to trick a reporter into revealing her sources at the company. The announcement of Dunn's ouster came after two weeks of revelations about the leak investigation, which started under former Chief Executive Carly Fiorina in early 2005 but intensified this year. According to the company, its security contractors obtained personal phone records under false pretenses; sent a kind of spyware to a reporter via e-mail; conducted surveillance on HP board members, relatives and at least one reporter; and even suggested planting spies at news organizations.

For her part, Dunn insisted that she didn't do anything wrong, issuing a statement that HP's click-and-dagger contractors "let me and the company down." It's difficult to gin up much sympathy for Dunn, but it's also hard not to see her as a scapegoat. Evidence abounds that other top HP executives — including Chief Executive Mark V. Hurd, who now adds "chairman" to his nameplate after Dunn's removal — were told about at least some of the deceptions and intrusions planned by its contractors. Hurd admitted Friday that he'd been told about the plan to create a fictitious HP employee to plant stories. A lawyer that Hurd hired to get to the bottom of the mess, Mike Holston, said Friday that HP's chief ethics officer and the firm's lawyers told HP's leadership that the techniques being used were legal.

Setting aside for a moment that some of the methods used were almost certainly illegal, the kinds of deceptions practiced by HP's contractors don't pass the smell test. A key part of the plan, which Hurd said he doesn't recall being told about, was to email the reporter a purported scoop in an attachment that was bugged. Malicious software programs are among the biggest problems faced by the computer industry and its customers, so it's mystifying why a computer manufacturer such as HP would even think about a stunt like this. Then again, maybe HP executives just weren't thinking at all.

Regulators Scrutinize Amaranth (WSJ)

By Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, September 25, 2006

Regulators are examining the circumstances surrounding the multibillion-dollar losses this month by Greenwich, Conn., hedge fund Amaranth Advisors, people familiar with the situation say.

Amaranth said last week it had lost roughly $6 billion, or 65% of its assets, in September, primarily on bad bets in the volatile natural-gas market.

The inquiries are at an early stage, and it isn't clear that any regulators are probing wrongdoing. It is common for market regulators to inquire about major changes at large investment funds that may have an impact on markets. Hedge funds are lightly regulated investment pools for wealthy individuals and institutional investors such as pension funds and college endowments.

Among the details that may arise in the reviews, these people say, are how Amaranth presented its trading strategies and internal controls to investors and whether it followed its policies as it had outlined them. The Securities and Exchange Commission has limited authority over such funds, but it does monitor how the funds represent their operations to investors and can investigate fraud, if any is suspected.

A person close to Amaranth said the firm had been in touch with regulators since first announcing heavy losses on Monday Sept. 18. "Amaranth voluntarily reached out to its various regulators early Monday to apprise them of the situation, to answer any questions they may have and to offer its full cooperation," the person said.

Among the entities Amaranth itself contacted, the person familiar with the firm says, are the SEC; the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, which regulates commodity and energy markets; the New York Mercantile Exchange, the primary U.S. energy market; Britain's Financial Services Authority, which oversees a widely used electronic energy-trading platform; and Canadian securities regulators.

A spokesman for the CFTC said it couldn't comment on what it was or wasn't looking into. Officials at the other regulatory groups couldn't be reached for comment.

Telos In Turmoil Over Shares (WP)

By Terence O'hara

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

The trouble began on the golf course, when unidentified insiders at Telos Corp. began questioning whether director David Borland's use of a company club membership compromised his independence as a member of the firm's audit committee.

The fuse quickly burned, and by August more than half of the company's board had resigned. The imbroglio was the latest in a fight that has gone on for years, with the owners of Telos's preferred stock in revolt trying to collect more than $80 million they say is long overdue.

It didn't matter much when Telos, a small defense contractor that specializes in network and communications security applications, was a languishing technology company. But in recent years, its business with the Defense Department has been booming. Though Telos is unprofitable it is considered a potential takeover target, and its owners are fighting over the possible spoils.

"I'm just insisting on rights I have that are in writing," said Marshall Greenblatt of Potomac, a former Telos director who has owned preferred stock since it was issued 17 years ago, and wants the money he was guaranteed at that time. "A deal is a deal." Preferred stock typically includes a guaranteed dividend and other advantages.

One of Greenblatt's fellow preferred shareholders, New York hedge fund Costa Brava LP, has sued Telos and asked a judge to put the company in receivership. Costa Brava contends that the company's majority shareholder, British millionaire John R. C. Porter, is siphoning cash from the company in the form of fees and high-interest on loans he has made to Telos.

Anger over Porter, and frustration that the company may have favored him over preferred shareholders, prompted some of the directors to resign in August, according to company Securities and Exchange Commission filings.

None of those who resigned could be reached for comment. Requests to interview Porter were made to the company, but a Telos official said he could not be reached.

DOJ_NMG_0068842

Longtime Telos chief executive John B. Wood said the company's problems have been stoked by hedge-fund shareholders who are being too hasty in demanding benefits from their preferred stock -- and hurting the company's chances to become more valuable in a possible future sale.

"We have activist hedge funds who use the cloak of corporate governance to litigate their returns," Wood said of the company's dissident investors. "We as a company have a responsibility and a duty to protect the interest of all of our stakeholders, and not give a priority of one group over another group."

Wood would not comment on any aspect of the resignations. However, he noted that "we reconstituted the board quickly thereafter," and that the incident has not damaged the company's stock price.

At the heart of the dispute is Telos's stock structure, the remnant of a 1989 leveraged buyout. All of Telos's common stock is held by insiders, including Porter, who bought control of the company in 1994. Yet Telos's preferred stock, issued in the 1989 leveraged buyout, is publicly traded on the over-the-counter exchange. It has done well in the past three years, rising from 50 cents a share in 2003 to around $19 a share.

The owners of that preferred stock are owed more than $80 million in dividends and redemptions. If Telos were sold, preferred shareholders, not Porter, would get most, if not all, of the leftover cash from a sale after its lenders are paid off.

The spat on the board began this summer, when fellow directors learned that Borland used a company-owned golf membership. Borland paid the $38,000 in dues and other expenses with his own money. But the fact that the company owned the membership was seen by some board members as a conflict with his duties on the audit committee -- and emblematic of broader problems.

Borland resigned as chairman of the audit committee. But three directors, Geoffrey B. Baker, Malcolm M.B. Sterrett, and Norman P. Byers, thought Borland should have resigned from other board committees as well and possibly left the board altogether. When he didn't, they quit.

They resigned at the same time as three other board members. Langhorne A. Motley said he was quitting for health reasons and because of the workload of being a director. Bruce J. Stewart and Thomas L. Owsley did not say why they resigned.

Most worrisome for Telos, Motley and Byers were the two members of Telos's proxy board, an independent subset of the board of directors required by the Defense Department to make sure that Telos's foreign ownership doesn't compromise national security. Porter is a British citizen.

Byers was the proxy board's chairman, and was on the board since 1994.

"Uppermost in my mind has been my fiduciary duties . . . and to provide the oversight necessary to insure the company's compliance with all federal security laws," Byers wrote in his resignation letter, using language similar to that Sterrett and Baker used. "Unfortunately, on several recent occasions, other important participants in the corporate enterprise have done everything possible to obstruct or prevent the board of directors from taking those actions I believe are absolutely necessary and appropriate to insure good corporate governance and compliance. It has been made abundantly clear to me I will not be allowed to function effectively or independently as a fiduciary for the Department of Defense, the Company, all its stockholders and employees."

Wood, who has worked at Telos for 14 years and became chief executive in 1994, said all he wants to do is build the company, and that he hopes the differences between the two classes of stockholders can be resolved. He also held out hope that the company could reach an out-of-court settlement with the preferred shareholders, but that seems unlikely.

"What it boils down to: One group wants their money now, one group is more patient," he said of the preferred and common shareholders, respectively. "Having said that, would we prefer to reach a settlement that's fair for everybody? Absolutely."

Cook The Books, Get Life In Prison: Is Justice Served? (WP)

By Carrie Johnson And Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

In the category of longest prison sentence, WorldCom Inc. founder Bernard J. Ebbers recently bested the organizer of an armed robbery, the leaders of a Bronx drug gang and the acting boss of the Gambino crime family.

It was a contest Ebbers surely would have preferred to lose.

Tomorrow, the man who once swaggered through the halls of his telecommunications company as a cowboy-booted billionaire is scheduled to surrender to authorities and begin a 25-year sentence. Federal prison policies virtually ensure that Ebbers, who has a heart ailment, will spend the rest of his life in prison for his role in an $11 billion accounting fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0068843

Ebbers, 65, is to report to prison on the same day that former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow will be sentenced by a federal judge in Houston. Fastow, who secretly pocketed more than $45 million in a scheme to disguise mounting financial problems at the energy company, faces a maximum of 10 years in prison as part of his plea deal.

The length of Ebbers's sentence when compared with others touches on one of the most controversial parts of the American criminal justice system: How large a pound of flesh should society exact for serious white-collar crime? When the victims are diffuse, the crime complex and the injuries economic, what kind of punishment constitutes justice?

A top executive who gambles his fate at a trial nowadays risks what amounts to a life term for fraud that can involve as little as $2.5 million in losses, said University of Missouri law professor Frank Bowman. Crimes such as first-degree murder, high-level drug dealing and espionage trigger similar recommendations.

"That means you have to equate fiddling with the corporate books with first-degree murder or treason," Bowman said. "My own sense is that any sentence over 20 years for anybody for an economic crime is hard to justify."

Public revulsion over financial crimes that cost small investors billions of dollars has barely waned since prosecutors began to investigate a string of corporate scandals in late 2001. The death of convicted Enron founder Kenneth L. Lay in July induced profanity-laden outrage from shareholders who felt they had been "cheated" out of seeing Lay sent to prison. Federal prosecutors seized the mood, imploring Congress this month to pass legislation that would make it easier for them to recover $43.5 million from Lay's estate, a process that has been seriously complicated by his death.

The drive to exact punishment even beyond the grave is a sign of vindictiveness in public officials and shareholders, defense lawyers contend.

Reid H. Weingarten, a Washington-based lawyer for Ebbers, said in an e-mail that the judge in his case had public relations, not justice, in mind. "The purpose of the sentence was to please and appease the howling mob demanding Ebbers's head, not a worthy goal of the criminal justice system," he said.

Fastow, 44, assessed the prospect of spending decades behind bars after the government hit him with a 98-count indictment for serving as the architect of the Enron fraud. Prosecutors also accused Fastow of enlisting his wife and using the bank accounts of his two young sons to siphon money from the company undetected. Lea W. Fastow, indicted to pressure her husband to cooperate with investigators, pleaded guilty to a tax charge two years ago for underreporting income from his business partnerships. She served almost a year in a high-security prison.

As part of the couple's package deal, Andrew Fastow pleaded guilty, agreed to testify against Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, and negotiated a substantial break in his prison term. Skilling, 52, was convicted of 19 criminal charges in May and faces decades in prison when he is sentenced next month.

Fordham University law professor Daniel Richman said shorter sentences in exchange for cooperation reflect the reality of white-collar investigations: Prosecutors must rely on tainted insiders to help convict higher-level executives. In this year's Enron trial, for example, lawyers for Skilling and Lay branded Fastow a liar, a thief and the person most responsible for Enron's collapse who avoided his just deserts by signing a deal with prosecutors.

"Sentences are the currency with which the government buys information," said Richman, a former federal prosecutor.

Not accepting a deal can be costly, as former mid-level Dynegy Inc. executive Jamie Olis, now 40, learned two years ago. Olis, who while growing up was physically abused by his mother's boyfriend and spent time in foster care before working his way through college, became a national symbol of inflexible sentencing policies. He lost his case and was sentenced to more than 24 years in prison -- despite the defense's presentation of his background -- for taking part in a $300 million accounting fraud. Olis's former boss at the energy company signed a plea agreement, testified against Olis and was sentenced to 15 months.

A federal appeals court last year threw out Olis's sentence, and a federal judge in Houston on Friday reduced it to six years. That means Olis is likely to spend about two more years in prison.

"Not every case is Enron, and not every white-collar offender is one of the smartest guys in the room," said Washington defense lawyer Barry Boss, referring to the name of a book and documentary film about the Enron scandal. "We're such a vindictive country."

But white-collar criminals are unusually sensitive to deterrence, according to prosecutors and securities regulators. The sight of colleagues in handcuffs, or signing away their homes and fortunes, sends a powerful message.

What's more, legal experts say, former executives do not deserve lighter treatment than drug dealers or burglars simply because they broke accounting rules or lied -- crimes that are harder to unravel and whose victims are more diffuse.

"You want people to understand that just because they're in high places, they make a lot of money and they can hire fabulous lawyers, that they're not going to walk away with a slap on the wrist," said former Securities and Exchange Commission chairman Harvey L. Pitt. "If you ask me, 'Did Bernie Ebbers destroy lives?' I would tell you that his conduct did."

Historically, white-collar criminals have not received long sentences. Probation was common even for crimes that involved large losses, and even the most famous defendants received sentences that by today's standards appear lenient. Junk-bond king Michael Milken was initially sentenced to 10 years on fraud charges, but a judge reduced the sentence to 33 months, and he was paroled after serving only two years.

That began to change in the mid-1990s, after policymakers expressed concern that punitive sentences for nonviolent drug crimes carried life sentences while white-collar criminals often skated. In 1994, financier Tom J. Billman, who bilked savings and loans of $25 million and fled the country, was sentenced to 40 years in prison. He served about 10 years before being paroled in 2005.

Sentences became even longer when parole was abolished in the federal system and sentencing guidelines were repeatedly amended to increase prison terms for white-collar crimes.

Were the WorldCom and Enron scandals to happen today, the sentences for Ebbers and Fastow might be even longer. Angry lawmakers enacted even tougher penalties for corporate fraud after those companies filed for bankruptcy protection. But the stiff new punishments apply only to people who committed crimes after 2002.

"On a personal level, you've got to feel for people" like Ebbers who will probably die in prison, said University of Texas law professor Henry T.C. Hu, "but overall I think the system's got it right."

CRIMINAL LAW:

String Of Heists Raises Fears Bank Jobs Are On Rise (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, September 25, 2006

The Paparazzi Bandit photographs bank tellers as he robs them. The Goofy Hat Bandit wears a black fedora. The Hallmark Bandit writes lengthy notes demanding cash — and sometimes asks tellers if they had a good weekend.

These serial bank robbers, and a few others, are behind what authorities say is an unusual surge in bank robberies during the last few months in Los Angeles, one of several U.S. cities where such crimes have ticked upward recently.

FBI officials say they are concerned that bank robberies — generally a high-risk, low-reward type of crime — might be increasing again after declining nationwide since 2001. Numbers for 2006 won't be available for months.

It's unclear precisely why Los Angeles, Dallas, Chicago and other cities are seeing a jump in bank robberies, but it appears to be part of a general increase in violent crimes nationwide, says Chip Burrus, the FBI's assistant director for criminal investigations.

“There's an awful lot of gang activity out there, and a certain percentage (of gang crimes) are going to be bank robberies,” he says.

The jump in bank robberies does not appear to be nationwide, says John Hall of the American Bankers Association, a trade group based in Washington, D.C.

Regional increases may reflect a particular economic or crime trend in an area, such as an increase in drug trafficking or a spike in unemployment, he says.

Laura Eimiller, spokeswoman for the FBI's Los Angeles field office, says the rise in robberies there comes even as increased security measures have made the risks for bank robbers greater, and the rewards less.

More security cameras and tiny dye packs designed to explode after a robber leaves a bank with cash generally have made it more likely that robbers will be caught. Bank tellers now typically have less than $1,000 in their cash drawers, making huge heists unlikely.

“It is a stupid crime,” Eimiller says. “When you get caught, you're going to go away for a long, long time, particularly if you use a gun.”

Bank robbery is a federal crime. Those who use a weapon — or a fake weapon — while committing such an offense face up to 25 years in prison if convicted.

Los Angeles leads the nation in bank robberies. About two-thirds of the 249 bank robberies that have been committed there this year have been non-violent “note jobs,” in which a robber has approached a teller with a note demanding money, Eimiller says.

One at-large suspect, who has robbed seven banks since May 17, usually waits in the teller line until he is called, chats with other customers and hands tellers long notes demanding cash and threatening to use a weapon.

“He's known as the Hallmark Bandit because in May and June, he asked the tellers how their Mother's Day or Father's Day was,” Eimiller says. “He's very chatty.”

Takeovers, in which armed robbers force customers and employees to the floor or take hostages, have accounted for the remaining one-third of robberies in Los Angeles this year, an unusually large ratio that has alarmed authorities, Eimiller says.

DOJ_NMG_0068845

“We've had a dramatic increase in ‘takeover' robberies, where the bandits are armed or there's an assault,” she says. “Robberies are getting more violent. We're seeing a large percentage associated with Los Angeles street gangs.”

Robbers in a group known as the Big Money Bandits brandish weapons, force everyone in a bank to lie on the floor and yell out, “Give us the big money,” or, “Show us the big money,” Eimiller says.

In some cases, robbers in the Big Money Bandits group have dressed as security guards. The group has been linked to a dozen robberies since April.

In Dallas, the number of bank robberies has tripled this year compared with the same time last year, says FBI Special Agent Beverly Esselbach. The city had 96 bank robberies through September this year. The North Texas area, which includes Dallas, had 172 bank robberies during that period, up from 82 at the same time last year.

Two of the most prolific serial robbers, including one who hit 18 banks, have been caught, she says. Another suspect who has been linked to 20 bank robberies is still on the loose.

“It's kind of cyclical” in the Dallas area, Esselbach says. “Every three years they see an upsurge in bank robberies. Usually it starts before the holidays in November and drops off in January. This year, it didn't drop off. It just kept going.”

Last year, Chicago had a record 240 bank robberies, including a 75% increase in “takeover” robberies, says Special Agent Ross Rice of the FBI's Chicago field office.

“We're on pace to beat that” in 2006, Rice says. During a six-day period this month, the Chicago area had 15 bank robberies.

“There's no rhyme or reason to it,” Rice says. “We've had every type of robbery: note jobs, armed takeovers, hostage situations, suburban, city, serial offenders, first- timers.”

There have been no signs that concern over jobs or the economy, widely believed to be factors in bank robbery rises, is behind the recent spate of robberies, Rice says.

New York City also has seen a rash of robberies recently, including 32 in August, says Jim Margolin of the FBI's field office there.

Death Penalty Sought Against D.C. Man (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, September 25, 2006

Federal authorities are seeking the death penalty against a D.C. man charged in five killings, setting up the prospect of just the third capital murder trial in the city over the past 30 years.

Larry Gooch, described by law-enforcement officials as "an enforcer" in the M Street Crew drug gang, is expected to go on trial in January on felony charges, including first-degree murder and armed robbery.

Though capital punishment is banned in the District, Gooch, 27, could get the death penalty if convicted because he has been charged in a federal case.

The Justice Department last year filed a notice of intent to seek the death penalty against Gooch, a decision requiring the approval of Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

Gooch is charged in the Aug. 1, 2000, shooting deaths of Christopher Lane, 19, and William Cunningham, 27.

He is also charged in the Sept. 13, 2002, shooting death of Miguel Miles, 34, and the Feb. 21, 2003, fatal shootings of Calvin Cooper, 40, and his girlfriend, Yolanda Miller, 32.

Three men identified by prosecutors as leaders in the M Street gang -- John L. Franklin, 33, George "Shug" Wilson, 37, and William Dee Robinson, 30, a former D.C. Public Schools bus driver -- already are serving life sentences in the case. More than 30 people have been arrested, but Gooch is the only defendant facing the death penalty.

Nicknamed "Goo," Gooch was considered "crazy" by other gang members and assumed the role of "enforcer" or "muscle," Assistant U.S. Attorney Darlene M. Soltys wrote in a recent court memo.

"He was perceived as having no regard for life and had as his motto 'live for the block, die for the block,'" Miss Soltys wrote.

Prosecutors say the killings were committed "in furtherance of the M Street Crew's racketeering enterprise," which under federal law, they say, makes Gooch eligible for the death penalty.

Gooch's attorneys, Jensen E. Barber II and Thomas Todd Heslep, declined to comment for this story. However, Mr. Barber recently filed a 104-page memorandum in which he outlined sharp opposition to the death penalty if his client is convicted.

The memorandum argues against capital punishment "on the grounds it violates fundamental fairness in the administration of justice and is at odds with basic notions of human dignity, civility and compassion."

In addition to arguing a host of procedural and constitutional issues, Mr. Barber noted voters in the District have "continually rejected the death penalty."

In Gooch's case, Mr. Barber also argued, "we are dealing with garden-variety murders."

"It may be a sad commentary on our violent society, but those in the system know that there are murders, and there are murders," he wrote. "The law says the death penalty is supposed to be reserved for the 'worst' murders."

Mr. Barber argued the case should be prosecuted in D.C. Superior Court, not federal court.

"Federal jurisdiction in this case is based solely upon allegations of drug trafficking, which, at best, serve only as a background to the alleged murders," he wrote.

If the case were prosecuted in D.C. Superior Court, Gooch would not face the death penalty.

But federal prosecutors say Gooch committed federal crimes.

Citing an organized racketeering conspiracy, they describe the M Street Crew in court memos as "a well-defined, traditional chain conspiracy with various roles assigned to people, such as foot soldiers, runners and lieutenants."

Gang members also held meetings to decide who could sell drugs in the neighborhood, what to do if "the feds" brought charges, and where to stash drugs and how to package them, prosecutors say.

Some gang members were photographed flashing the letter "M" to each other by twisting their fingers, authorities say. And Gooch called meetings, kicked out blackballed members and enforced rules about where dealers could sell drugs, according to prosecutors.

Gooch killed Miss Miller and Mr. Cooper in part amid suspicion they were cooperating with investigators, prosecutors said. The FBI and Metropolitan Police Department investigation into the M Street Crew included thousands of hours of taped phone conversations from a wire tap, video-camera footage, confidential informants and undercover agents, court records show.

Mr. Cooper's sister, Barbara Cooper, said in a telephone interview that she favors the death penalty for Gooch if he is convicted.

"All of them were living the street life," she said. "If you want to sell drugs and be a big time hustler, that's on you. But you still don't have the right to take somebody's life. My brother used to say "I've got to get myself together, I don't want to live like this.

"He never hurt anybody, and they hunted him down like a dog."

Since the reinstatement of the death penalty in 1976, only two capital murder cases have proceeded to trial in federal court in the District.

In both cases, defendants were given life in prison without parole.

In 2003, a federal jury deadlocked on whether to recommend the death penalty for Murder Inc. gang members Kevin L. Gray and Rodney Moore. Gray was convicted in 19 murders and Moore was found guilty in 10 murders. The deadlock meant both received life in prison without parole.

In the other case, a federal jury in 2004 rejected the death penalty for the "1-5 Mob" leader Tommy Edelin, who was convicted in four murders in the prosecution of the Southeast gang.

In another still pending case in federal court in the District, federal authorities in 2004 filed a notice to seek the death penalty against three defendants charged with killing two American tourists in Uganda in 1999.

1st MS-13 Trial To Reveal Hierarchy (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, September 25, 2006

Law enforcement officials say the MS-13 street gang has wreaked violent havoc in parts of Prince George's and Montgomery counties, committing murders, assaults, rapes and robberies as part of a coldly calculated criminal conspiracy.

Starting this week in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, federal prosecutors will get the chance to prove it.

Opening statements are scheduled to begin tomorrow morning as the first two alleged members of MS-13 charged with racketeering in Maryland go on trial.

Twenty-two alleged members were indicted on the federal racketeering charges, and three have pleaded guilty to related charges. Prosecutors have filed papers saying they are seeking the death penalty against nine of the remaining 19 defendants.

The sweeping indictment accuses the gang of six homicides and four attempted homicides between April 2003 and June 2005. Eight were in Prince George's and the others in Montgomery.

MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, is far more structured than typical neighborhood street gangs, federal prosecutors say. In a superseding indictment handed up last week, prosecutors allege that MS-13 operates in 10 states and in the District as well as in El Salvador, Honduras and Mexico and has 10,000 members.

In Prince George's and Montgomery, MS-13 members have conspired to commit rape, kidnapping, robbery and obstruction of justice by attacking or intimidating witnesses, the indictment alleges.

Prosecutors have not yet been explicit about the gang's hierarchy and how it operates. That will change during the trial when prosecutors present their evidence, Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said.

DOJ_NMG_0068847

To obtain convictions under the federal RICO law -- originally written to target Mafia groups -- prosecutors must show that the crimes committed by MS-13 members were part of an ongoing criminal enterprise, rather than isolated, unrelated acts.

"We need to demonstrate what the organization is, how it operates," Rosenstein said. "I think there will be some revelations as to how the group operates. It's one of the most complex prosecutions we've had in this [federal court] district."

The first trial, of Oscar Ramos "Casper" Velasquez, 21, of Baltimore and Edgar Alberto "Pony" Ayala, 29, of Suitland is expected to last at least six weeks. Neither faces the death penalty.

According to the indictment handed up last week, Velasquez and other alleged Mara Salvatrucha gang members sexually assaulted two juvenile girls at an MS-13 "skipping party" -- in which students ditch school -- on May 12, 2003. Velasquez is accused of having a deadly weapon during that assault.

Velasquez is also charged with helping assault rival gang members outside a Langley Park nightclub in September 2004 and of attending an MS-13 meeting at which dues were collected.

Ayala is charged with giving false testimony before a Prince George's grand jury investigating the May 2004 slaying of Ashley Antonio Urias.

He is also accused of driving with fellow gang members to an apartment building in Fairfax County looking for a rival gang member. The same day, two unnamed MS-13 gang members fired at a group of people sitting outside the Fairfax building, killing one man and injuring two juveniles.

Richard C. Bittner, Velasquez's defense attorney, said his client is "upbeat and confident." Velasquez has no criminal record -- "not even a speeding ticket" -- and knows three of the other defendants only because they all attended High Point High School in Adelphi, Bittner said.

Ayala's attorney did not return phone calls.

Legal analysts said prosecutors will have to not only prove the specific allegations but also convince the jury that the acts were part of an organized criminal conspiracy.

The RICO statute gives prosecutors powerful tools, said Aitan D. Goelman, a former assistant U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York who prosecuted RICO cases against New York City street gangs.

For instance, in the vast majority of criminal trials in state court, prosecutors are not allowed to enter as evidence a defendant's past crimes, his association with a gang or gang activities unless the defendant takes the stand. But the RICO statute allows federal prosecutors to introduce evidence of the gang's activities, even if the defendant does not testify and had nothing do with most of the activities alleged, Goelman said.

"The point of RICO is it's a very heavy hammer, to be used when the pinprick of prosecuting individual members of the group in state court isn't working," said Goelman, now a private white-collar defense attorney in Washington.

In March, one or more of the defendants facing the death penalty is scheduled to be tried. The final trial would end next year if there are no delays, officials said.

Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty against defendants accused of committing murder in the aid of racketeering, murdering a potential federal witness, or using a firearm in a crime of violence.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales will decide whether to seek the death penalty for each defendant.

Potential For Danger At MySpace.com (NSDY)

By Jennifer Barrios, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 25, 2006

MySpace.com offers a place to create personal Web pages and socialize but police say it also provides opportunities for criminals

It's a blog, a community, the online equivalent of an afterschool hangout.

But MySpace.com, the popular site where teens and others can create personal Web pages and hook up with new friends, is also reaching a wider audience of parents, school administrators and law enforcement officials, who increasingly monitor the site for stings and leads.

Much of the time, nothing remarkable happens. Friends hook up with friends, details of teen life are debated and discussed.

But along with the photos of prom outfits and sports logos, some also post troubling messages -- like the MySpace user who earlier this month wrote of plans to bring a gun to Holy Trinity High School in Hicksville. In that case, a mother trolling the site noticed and alerted authorities. The plan wasn't carried out, and there have been no arrests.

Det. Sgt. John Cowie, who heads up the computer crimes section of the Suffolk County Police Department, said his unit uses MySpace and other similar sites to seek out criminal activity in the area.

DOJ_NMG_0068848

"It can be a useful tool," Cowie said. "We've seen it in the past where something has happened in the community and the kids are on there talking about it."

Police say they look for more than threats of violence. Pedophiles, too, use social sites to search for victims.

Suffolk Det. Rory Forrestal created a fake profile of a young teenage girl on MySpace, complete with photos, a list of hobbies and even links to other phony teenagers. (The photos are culled from overseas or are computer-altered composites of multiple children.)

His online alter ego receives dozens of solicitations a week, some from adult men looking for more than a new friend.

Last April, Forrestal used MySpace to find David M. Murillo, a 21-year-old from Syosset. They had tips that he was pursuing young girls.

